The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

For the past two or three years the Academy of Music has been quite sold out for the Boston Symphony concerts by subscription, and there is every indication that the same state of affairs will hold during the coming season. The soloists which have been provided are of high rank, comprising Madame Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Anton Witek. As to the quality of the concerts, it is promised that they will be up to the standard of past seasons. Dr. Muck is never satisfied, and always strives for a greater degree of perfection. The orchestra was never in finer condition, and much may be expected.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date SEP 27 1915

Boston Symphony Band Makes a New Recorc

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of th Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his purpose to play this year John Alden Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," said to be humorous music that really is humorous. The orchestra started today on a western tour of seven concerts in as many days in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis and Chicago. All the auditoriums hold from four to five thousand people and are completely sold out, so that the orchestra will play to more people in a given time than is on record in this or perhaps in any other country.

Estab 884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BROOKLYN EDIT

From World
Address: New York City
Date SEP 26 1915

GREAT SINGERS AT ACADEMY.

Will Be Heard With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and another in the second violins. Otherwise the same men that played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This will enable Dr. Muck to start at the beginning of this season at the point where he finished at the end of last season.

In the last two or three years the Academy of Music was sold out for the Boston Symphony concerts by subscription, and the indications are that this will be the case this season. The soloists are of high rank, consisting of Mme. Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Anton Witok. As to the quality of the concerts it is promised that they will be up to the standard of past seasons. Dr. Muck always strives for a greater degree of excellence. The orchestra, it is said, never has been in finer condition.

Esta 1884

BROOKLYN EDIT

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where he finished at the end of the last

E , 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date SEP 26 1915

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The sale of seats for the annual subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music indicates that the Academy will be sold out this year, as usual. The orchestra is said to be in excellent condition. There have been only two changes in personnel, and this has enabled Dr. Karl Muck to take up the work where he left off at the close of last season. There has been one change in the trumpet section and one in the second violins. Mme. Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling, and Anton Witek are among the soloists provided by Dr. Muck.

Estal 84

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date SEP 26 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important, for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

The tickets for both series of concerts which the orchestra is to give in New York the coming season are being prepared in the Boston office of the orchestra and will begin to go out to subscribers by registered mail during the coming week. Subscribers who wish to retain their seats and have not yet sent remittances for them would do well to make haste, as there is a waiting list of several hundred applicants for seats for each series of concerts.

The soloists announced for the season include Paderewski, Bauer, Rosenthal, Schelling, Ruth Deyo, Melba, Farrar and Kreisler.

Esta 1884

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date SEP 19 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announcing for its series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, an extraordinary list of soloists. They are Madame Melba, Miss Farrar, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Bauer, Miss Ruth Dove and Ernest Schelling. In addition to these eight, four members of the orchestra will appear, so that there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. This is about the usual number provided for Boston.

Estab

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 1.

HIGHEST SEAT PRICE $4

Tickets in Row N for Symphony Concert Being Largest Premium of the Day.

Symphony concert ticket prices continued very high at yesterday's auction, although bidding was quiet and entirely without sensational features. The highest premium of the day, $45, brought by seats 18 and 19 in row N. Other in the same row brought $10, $23, $25, $27.50, $28, $30 and $32.

In row M, seats 15, 16, 17 and 18 went as high as $44, and 19 went for $41. Seats on either side of these ranged in price from $22.50 to $39, with $11 and $14 for the extreme ends. Another high figure, $40, was brought by the favorite seat 19 in row O.

Seats 17, 18 and 19 in Row P, which last year brought $139 in all, went yesterday at $43.50 each for the first two and $26 for the other. Seat 20 also went for $26.

In the afternoon good seats at the rear of the hall, both on the floor and in the balcony went for premiums of $1.50 above the stated price of $18.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 30,

AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS RESUN

The auction sale of season tick the Symphony concerts was re this morning in Symphony Hall o'clock. Today there were sold seats for the 24 Saturday evenin certs. These comprise the entire with the exception of the last nin under the first balcony and the first balcony, except the last five which are under the second ba The last sale of the season will tomorrow, when the $10 seats fo concerts are sold. These compris last nine rows on the floor, the las rows in the first balcony and the second balcony.

These sales for the Saturday concerts will be the same as those for the Friday afternoon concerts in that the owners of tickets for the concerts this year will have an option on their seats for the coming year when a subscription at fixed prices is established.

The management wishes to say, in answer to requests, that the prices which will rule in the subscription next year have not yet been decided, but announcement of them will be made in the course of two or three months.

The usual rules cover the sale as to the number of tickets that can be bought on one bid and as to prices added to the upset price held good again today.

BOSTON HERALD,

OCTOBER 1, 1915.

PAY $62 FOR $18 SEATS AT SYMPHONY AUCTION

Sales Close Today When $10 Tickets Are Sold.

Sensational prices were paid as premiums for $18 seats for the Symphony concerts which were sold at auction yesterday. After a lively contest a special agent purchased four seats, 15 16, 17 and 18 in row M, for a total price of $248. The highest premium paid was $45 for seats 18 and 19 in row N.

The sale opened at 10 o'clock and 400 were present. The bidding started as low as $5 and end seats in the first eight rows went for $6.60. The centre aisle seats in these rows brought in premiums ranging from $12 to $17.50. In the centre rows, I, J and K, the prices were a trifle higher.

Fancy prices were paid for seats in rows K, L, M, N, O, P and Q. End seats went for $12 to $20, and the centre seats brought in premiums of $25 to $45. The highest price paid for seats in row K was $28. Seats 15, 16 and 17 in row L were sold on bids of $38, and seat 19 in row O went for $40. Seats 18 and 19 in row P, which brought premiums of $139 each last year went for $43, and seat 20 in the same row, for which a high price was paid last year, went for $26. The sale, on the whole, was considered somewhat better than last year.

The last of the auction sales begin at 7 o'clock today, when the $10 seats will be sold.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 9 - 1915

DR. MUCK'S PLAN

Boston Orchestro Will Give Brahms'

Boston Orchestra Will Give Brahms'

The Boston Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, returns to Baltimore this season with vastly enhanced prestige gained by the astonishing series of concerts which it gave last May at the Panama-Pacfic Exposition. With full complement of over 100 musicians, it went direct to San Francisco from Boston and gave 13 concerts there in as many days. Over 45,000 people paid to hear the orchestra at these concerts, making a record that will not be surpassed for many years to come.

This noted organization will give five Wednesday evening concerts at the Lyric this season, the first one taking place on November 3. The other dates are December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 15.

A splendid group of soloists has been engaged. Melba will sing at the November concert, while later Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling, Anton Witek and Geraldine Farrar will be heard. It will be particularly interesting to hear Mr. Schelling, one of the most distinguished pianists of the day. He will play his own symphonic variations for piano and orchestra.

The program of the November concert has already been announced. Because of more than 50 letters received by Dr. Muck requesting the fourth symphony by Brahms, this great work will be played on this occasion, the other numbers being Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," and the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Meistersinger." Melba will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel, and two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

Estal 84

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Seat Sale Opens

The general sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concerts will open at Droop's next Wednesday morning, October 13. The orchestra is out with an announcement of the plans it has made for the five concerts to be given in Washington. As in the past, they will come on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock in the New National Theater, and the dates are November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15, and March 15.

Dr. Muck at the first concert will play the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "A Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," of Wagner, while Miss Florence Hinkle, the soloist, will sing the Page's song from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro' 'and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "The Cross of Fire."

Establis

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is congratulating itself this season on having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

It will interest the friends of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia to know that its Philadelphia subscription at the present time is larger than it has been for many years. There was a time, years ago, when the house was completely sold out by subscription. Then the confessed error was made in putting in an extra series of concerts here, which arrangement was not altogether successful.

This year, unless all signs fail, there will be nothing to sell for the single concerts. A part of this increase is due to the steady growth of business that has been the fortune of the orchestra here in the last few years, and partly to the unusual soloists that are promised—Madame Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Ernest Schelling.

MADE A NOTE

rk, 884

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

Liszt in Boston and New York.

LIKE all the really great musicians and true lovers of music, Dr. Muck is an ardent admirer of Liszt as a composer. It will be remembered what tremendous enthusiasm he aroused in Boston last year, when the famous Symphony Orchestra of that city played Liszt's "Faust" symphony under his direction. The critics for once were unanimous in pronouncing this concert the climax of the season, and the public was so deeply stirred that that sublime work was repeated at another pair of concerts, with the same results. Dr. Muck has now decided to bring out this season Liszt's other great symphony, the "Dante." The performance of this great work was, as was pointed out in this journal, the climax of last year's concert season in New York, when it was produced by the Philharmonic Orchestra under the inspired bâton of Josef Stransky. No other composition heard by the critic of the Evening Post brought out such a storm of prolonged applause as this work, which is not only wonderful as music, but contains (like "Hamlet") a surprising number of "familiar quotations" borrowed from Liszt by later composers, one of them being Richard Wagner. It was the marvellous way in which Stransky made the Philharmonic players enter into the true spirit of Liszt's great work on this and previous occasions that won him the admiration and intimate friendship of another great Liszt specialist, the late Rafael Joseffy, to whom the world owes the best edition of Liszt's rhapsodies and other piano works.

, 1884

Newspaper Cutting

From Freie Presse
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 26 1915

Academy of Muſic.

Konzerte des Boſtoner Symphonie Orcheſters unter Dr. Muck's Leitung.

Das Brooklner Inſtitut für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften wird auch in dieſem Winter wieder in der Academy of Muſic einige Konzerte veranſtalten, in denen das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter unter der Leitung ſeines hervorragenden Dirigenten Dr. Karl Muck auftreten wird. Die Beſetzung des Orcheſters iſt faſt die nämliche wie im letzten Jahre, ſodaß Dr. Muck genau an dem Punkte wieder anfangen konnte, an dem er bei Schluß der vergangenen Saiſon aufgehört hat. Als Soliſten ſind für dieſe Konzerte unter anderen Fritz Kreisler, Erneſt Schelling, Madame Melba und Anton Witek gewonnen worden. In früheren Jahren ſind ſämmtliche Konzerte durch Subſkriptionen ausverkauft geweſen und das nämliche wird vorausſichtlich auch wieder in dieſem Winter der Fall ſein.

Establi

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

For the past two or three years the Academy of Music has been quite sold out for the Boston Symphony concerts by subscription, and there is every indication that the same state of affairs will hold during the coming season. The soloists which have been provided are of high rank, comprising Madame Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Anton Witek. As to the quality of the concerts, it is promised that they will be up to the standard of past seasons. Dr. Muck is never satisfied, and always strives for a greater degree of perfection. The orchestra was never in finer condition, and much may be expected.

E

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date SEP 27 1915

Boston Symphony Band Makes a New Record

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his purpose to play this year John Alden Carpenter's Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," said to be humorous music that really is humorous. The orchestra started today on a western tour of seven concerts in as many days in Toledo, Milwaukee, Peoria, Omaha, St. Joseph, St. Louis and Chicago. All the auditoriums hold from four to five thousand people and are completely sold out, so that the orchestra will play to more people in a given time than is on record in this or perhaps in any other country.

Estab 884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BROOKLYN EDIT

From World
Address: New York City
Date SEP 26 1915

GREAT SINGERS AT ACADEMY.

Will Be Heard With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and another in the second violins. Otherwise the same men that played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This will enable Dr. Muck to start at the beginning of this season at the point where he finished at the end of last season.

In the last two or three years the Academy of Music was sold out for the Boston Symphony concerts by subscription, and the indications are that this will be the case this season. The soloists are of high rank, consisting of Mme. Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Anton Witok. As to the quality of the concerts it is promised that they will be up to the standard of past seasons. Dr. Muck always strives for a greater degree of excellence. The orchestra, it is said, never has been in finer condition.

Esta 1884

BROOKLYN EDIT

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where he finished at the end of the last

E , 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date SEP 26 1915

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The sale of seats for the annual subscription series of concerts by the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music indicates that the Academy will be sold out this year, as usual. The orchestra is said to be in excellent condition. There have been only two changes in personnel, and this has enabled Dr. Karl Muck to take up the work where he left off at the close of last season. There has been one change in the trumpet section and one in the second violins. Mme. Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling, and Anton Witek are among the soloists provided by Dr. Muck.

Estal 84

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date SEP 26 1915

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is most fortunate this season in having been able to keep its personnel practically intact. There will be one change in the trumpet section and one change in the second violins, otherwise the same men who played with so much success under Dr. Muck a year ago will be with him this year. This is most important, for it enables Dr. Muck to start at a point at the beginning of a season where practically he finished at the end of last.

The tickets for both series of concerts which the orchestra is to give in New York the coming season are being prepared in the Boston office of the orchestra and will begin to go out to subscribers by registered mail during the coming week. Subscribers who wish to retain their seats and have not yet sent remittances for them would do well to make haste, as there is a waiting list of several hundred applicants for seats for each series of concerts.

The soloists announced for the season include Paderewski, Bauer, Rosenthal, Schelling, Ruth Deyo, Melba, Farrar and Kreisler.

Esta 1884

---

om SUN dress: New York City
te SEP 19 1915 SEP 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announcing for its series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, an extraordinary list of soloists. They are Madame Melba, Miss Farrar, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Bauer, Miss Ruth Dove and Ernest Schelling. In addition to these eight, four members of the orchestra will appear, so that there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. This is about the usual number provided for Boston.

tab 84

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 1.

HIGHEST SEAT PRICE $45.

Tickets in Row N for Symphony Concert Being Largest Premium of the Day.

Symphony concert ticket prices continued very high at yesterday's auction, although bidding was quiet and entirely without sensational features. The highest premium of the day, $45, brought by seats 18 and 19 in row N. Other in the same row brought $10, $23, $25, $27.50, $28, $30 and $32.

In row M, seats 15, 16, 17 and 18 went as high as $44, and 19 went for $41. Seats on either side of these ranged in price from $22.50 to $39, with $11 and $14 for the extreme ends. Another high figure, $40, was brought by the favorite seat 19 in row O.

Seats 17, 18 and 19 in Row P, which last year brought $139 in all, went yesterday at $43.50 each for the first two and $26 for the other. Seat 20 also went for $26.

In the afternoon good seats at the rear of the hall, both on the floor and in the balcony went for premiums of $1.50 above the stated price of $18.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 30,

AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS RESUMED

The auction sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts was resumed this morning in Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock. Today there were sold the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts. These comprise the entire floor, with the exception of the last nine rows under the first balcony and the entire first balcony, except the last five rows which are under the second balcony. The last sale of the season will come tomorrow, when the $10 seats for the concerts are sold. These comprise the last nine rows on the floor, the last five rows in the first balcony and the entire second balcony.

These sales for the Saturday concerts will be the same as those for the Friday afternoon concerts in that the owners of tickets for the concerts this year will have an option on their seats for the coming year when a subscription at fixed prices is established.

The management wishes to say, in answer to requests, that the prices which will rule in the subscription next year have not yet been decided, but announcement of them will be made in the course of two or three months.

The usual rules cover the sale as to the number of tickets that can be bought on one bid and as to prices added to the upset price held good again today.

BOSTON HERALD,

OCTOBER 1, 1915.

PAY $62 FOR $18 SEATS AT SYMPHONY AUCTION

Sales Close Today When $10 Tickets Are Sold.

Sensational prices were paid as premiums for $18 seats for the Symphony concerts which were sold at auction yesterday. After a lively contest a special agent purchased four seats, 15 16, 17 and 18 in row M, for a total price of $248. The highest premium paid was $45 for seats 18 and 19 in row N.

The sale opened at 10 o'clock and 400 were present. The bidding started as low as $5 and end seats in the first eight rows went for $6.50. The centre aisle seats in these rows brought in premiums ranging from $12 to $17.50. In the centre rows, I, J and K, the prices were a trifle higher.

Fancy prices were paid for seats in rows K, L, M, N, O, P and Q. End seats went for $12 to $20, and the centre seats brought in premiums of $25 to $45. The highest price paid for seats in row K was $28. Seats 15, 16 and 17 in row L were sold on bids of $38, and seat 19 in row O went for $40. Seats 18 and 19 in row P, which brought premiums of $139 each last year went for $43, and seat 20 in the same row, for which a high price was paid last year, went for $26. The sale, on the whole, was considered somewhat better than last year.

The last of the auction sales begin at 7 o'clock today, when the $10 seats will be sold.

EVENING SUN
ss: Baltimore, Md.
OCT 2 - 1

DR. MUCK'S PLAN

Boston Orchestro Will Give Brahms'

oston Orchestra Will Give Brahms'

The Boston Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck nducting, returns to Baltimore this ason with vastly enhanced prestige gained by the astonishing series of concerts which it gave last May at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. With full complement of over 100 musicians, it went direct to San Francisco from Boston and gave 13 concerts there in as many days. Over 45,000 people paid to hear the orchestra at these concerts, making a record that will not be surpassed for many years to come.

This noted organization will give five Wednesday evening concerts at the Lyric this season, the first one taking place on November 3. The other dates are December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 15.

A splendid group of soloists has been engaged. Melba will sing at the November concert, while later Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling, Anton Witek and Geraldine Farrar will be heard. It will be particularly interesting to hear Mr. Schelling, one of the most distinguished pianists of the day. He will play his own symphonic variations for piano and orchestra.

The program of the November concert has already been announced. Because of more than 50 letters received by Dr. Muck requesting the fourth symphony by Brahms, this great work will be played on this occasion, the other numbers being Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," and the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Meistersinger." Melba will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel, and two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

84

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
1915

on Symphony Seat Sale Opens

general sale of seats for the Bos Symphony concerts will open a p's next Wednesday morning, Oc 13. The orchestra is out with a ncement of the plans it has mad he five concerts to be given Washington. As in the past, they w come on Tuesday afternoons at 4 o'clock in the New National Theater, and the dates are November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15, and March 15.

Dr. Muck at the first concert will play the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "A Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," of Wagner, while Miss Florence Hinkle, the soloist, will sing the Page's song from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "The Cross of Fire."

[17]

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 11 1915

TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

NELLIE MELBA

A new portrait of the Australian diva, who will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert this season on Wednesday evening, November 3.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 10

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The general sale of subscription tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Baltimore the coming season will open at Albaugh's Agency tomorrow (Monday) morning. The choice of seats will not be very large as the subscription and renewals by last year's subscribers take up the greater part of the house.

The list of soloists which the orchestra presents to Baltimore is one of most unusual quality. It contains the names of Madame Melba, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling, Anton Witek, and Geraldine Farrar, who will appear at the five concerts in the order named.

The concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, and the dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 15.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14, and March 13. The soloists will be Fritz Kreisler, violinst; Madame Melba, Ernest Schelling, pianist, brother of Prof. Felix Schelling, of the University of Pennsylvania, and Geraldine Farrar. The first program will include the Brahms Symphony in E minor No. ; Schumann's "Manfred" Overture; Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Les Prelues."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The Boston Symphony concerts, as heretofore, are five in number, and the dates are November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 13. There are but four minor changes in the personnel from last season. One of these was made in the spring, when Mr. Theodore Cella, a brilliant harpist, of Philadelphia, became one of its members. The regular work of the orchestra begins in Boston next Friday and Saturday, but this has been preceded by a Western trip, which took it as far as the Missouri River, and this afternoon ends in Chicago. The orchestra presents to Philadelphia this season, as soloists, Fritz Kreisler, Madame Melba, Ernest Schelling and Geraldine Farrar. Kreisler appears at the second concert, Melba at the third, Schelling at the fourth and Farrar at the last. There will be no soloist at the first concert. The program for this concert reads: Brahms' symphony in E minor, No. 4; Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concerts will open at Droop's Wednesday morning, October 13. The five concerts to be given in Washington will, as in the past, come on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, in the National, and the dates are November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

An excellent list of soloists is announced for these concerts. They are Florence Hinkle, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Ossip Garbrilowitsch. Ernest Schelling, the distinguished pianist, will appear here in the double role of composer and pianist, for he will play here his new "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra, which he is playing for the first time the week before in Boston with the Boston symphony.

Dr. Muck at the first concert will play the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "A Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" of Wagner; while Miss Florence Hinkle, the soloist, will sing the page's song from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "The Cross of Fire."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 9 - 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is out with its prospectus for the five concerts it will give in the Lyric Theater the coming winter. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings, and the dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 15.

The general sale of subscription tickets will open at Albaugh's agency Monday morning next. The choice of seats will not be very large as subscriptions and the renewals by last year's subscribers take up the greater part of the house.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concerts will open at Droop's Wednesday morning. The orchestra announces five concerts to be given in Washington, Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock, in the New National Theater, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

The quality of the orchestra requires no exploitation. Each year the subscription practically takes the entire house, and there are only a few of the less desirable seats left for single sale.

The list of soloists announced for the concerts includes Florence Hinkle, Fritz Kreisler, Ernest Schelling and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. None of these need an introduction to Washington. Ernest Schelling, the distinguished pianist, will appear in the double role of composer and pianist, for he will play here his new "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra.

Dr. Muck, at the first concert, will play the "Seventh Symphony of Beethoven," "A Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Miss Florence Hinkle, the soloist, will sing the Page's song from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria" from Max Bruch's "The Cross of Fire."

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is out with a detailed announcement of its plans for its concerts in this city the coming season. The concerts, as for ten years past, will be five in number in the Academy of Music, on Monday evenings. The dates are November 1 and 29, January 3, February 14 and March 13.

The orchestra is in excellent physical condition for the coming year. There have been only four minor changes in the personnel from last season. One of these was made in the Spring, when Theodore Cella, a brilliant harpist of this city, became one of its members. The regular work of the orchestra begins in Boston next Friday and Saturday, but this has been preceded by a Western trip which took it as far as the Missouri River, and this (Sunday) afternoon ends in Chicago.

It is the good fortune of the orchestra to present to Philadelphia this season a rare list of soloists. These will be Fritz Kreisler, Madame Melba, Ernest Schelling and Geraldine Farrar. Kreisler will appear at the second concert, Melba at the third, Schelling at the fourth and Farrar at the last. There will be no soloists at the first concert.

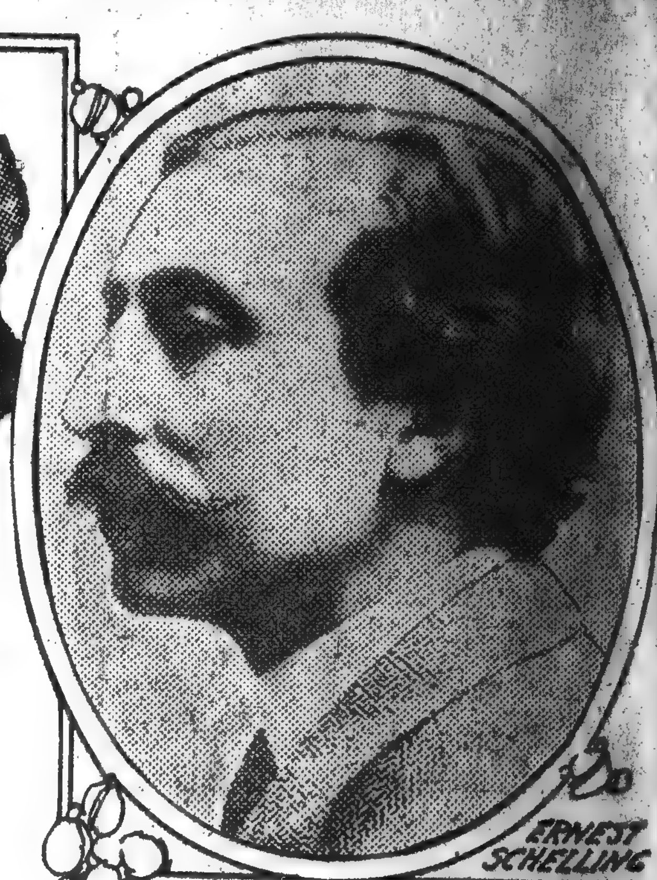
The subscription for these concerts has been in progress since the close of last year's series, and it is very large. Such seats as have not been taken will be placed on sale at Heppe's to-morrow (Monday) morning.

Dr. Muck's first program, which will be played November 1, will comprise Brahms' Symphony in E-Minor, No. 4; Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

* * *

Soloists With Boston Symphony

GERALDINE FARRAR



ERNEST SCHELLING

FRITZ KREISLER

They are Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Ernest Scheling, pianist, and Geraldine Farrar, soprano, three of the four soloists to be heard with the famous orchestra this season.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 16,

35TH SYMPHONY YEAR OPENS IN SPLENDID STYLE

Ovation Follows Playing of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Prophets may still be without honor at home, but it is not so with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yesterday Dr. Muck and his hundred men, appearing for the first concert of the 35th season, were greeted with much the same enthusiasm that marked their visit to San Francisco last May, and to Chicago and other Middle Western cities last week. Boston yields to no other city when it comes to paying tribute to the foremost musical organization in the whole western world. Yesterday, for instance, the applause that followed the performance of the seventh Beethoven symphony waxed long and loud. The entire orchestra was compelled to stand up to receive the ovation.

An Auspicious Beginning

In this auspicious manner began what gives promise of being one of the most successful seasons in the history of the institution that has made the fame of Boston stand out brilliantly in musical annals for more than a third of a century. In the other cities to be visited occasionally, the Symphony concerts have long been sold out for the season. Yesterday every seat was taken by the always large matinee audience, and there are few seats left for the Saturday night concerts.

Dr. Muck, who received a most friendly personal greeting when he came forth to conduct the first number, presented what might be called a time-honored program, consisting of the Beethoven symphony, Brahm's "Tragic Overture," the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and a symphonic poem by Liszt, "The Preludes." It was a well-chosen first program in that it revealed the beauty and power of tone and the extraordinary skill so long enjoyed by the older patrons of the concerts—the very best qualities that distinguish the orchestra above all others and that would be most likely to impress new patrons.

The Climax and Ovation

All these distinguishing marks were combined in the highest degree in the exceedingly brilliant performance of the final movement of the symphony. It was this splendid climax that aroused the first ovation of the season. As a matter of fact, all four numbers on the program were performed impressively, with the grace and eloquence characterizing Dr. Muck's readings and with the fine artistic responsiveness springing continuously from the members of the orchestra.

The orchestra, by the way, has changed in personnel but little since last season. There are four new members, A. Fiedler, second violin, and son of the veteran Emmanuel Fiedler, who retired from the orchestra a few years ago; C. de Mailly, the young French flute player whom Dr. Muck discovered in San Francisco last spring; G. Nappi, a trumpeter who was formerly with the Boston Opera House orchestra, and C. Gardner, who has taken Mr. Senia's place in the percussion corner.

Next week Dr. Muck will present the first novelty of the season, Georges Enesco's symphony in E flat major, together with Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 16,

SYMPHONY BEGINS 35TH MUSIC YEAR

Uncommon Brilliancy of Tone Marks Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 35th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The programme, devoted principally to compositions of one nation, nevertheless offered ample variety, for the music was of sharply contrasting schools and periods, with the exception of the music of Liszt and Strauss, which is inescapably co-ordinated: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic" Overture, Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Preludes."

The welcome given Dr. Muck was extremely cordial, the applause, which was unanimous, lasting for several minutes.

BRILLIANCY OF TONE

The tone of the orchestra, especially in consideration of the weather and the early time of the season, was of uncommon brilliancy, and the performance was characterized by a finish more often associated with the end than the beginning of the winter. After Strauss it was distasteful to some to listen to Liszt, but otherwise the music was engrossing. No need now to speak of that nature mood, that gigantic, mysterious spirit which sets Beethoven apart from all other composers, whether he writes in a vein that is grave or gay. But yesterday, particularly in the first two movements of the symphony, this mood was singularly felt.

In the scherzo some liked the superlative brilliancy and power of the blasts of the first trumpeter, and others thought that Dr. Muck might have let him off a little more easily. The principal point of interest is that the symphony as a whole has seldom been more clearly and reverentially interpreted.

Strauss' Humanity

There is an early Strauss and a late Strauss. Some of us fear for the Strauss of today, and find in certain of his earlier compositions a fervent sincerity and a blinding glow of genius which does not communicate itself so readily in some of the other scores. As for "Tod und Verklarung," in spite of its early style, it remains one of Strauss' greatest utterances.

It has the humanity and the passion of Tschaikowsky, and it has other things that one does not find in Tschaikowsky. But whoever wishes to dismiss Strauss as an "intellectual," a "cerebral," as the French say, must ignore practically everything that antedates "Don Quixote" and "Salome," and these works themselves. "Tod und Verklarung" is, indeed, fearfully human, fearfully illuminative of an end that comes to all, and nobly prophetic of that toward which humanity aspires. It is the expression of one who dares to look. One can imagine the aged and the disillusioned marvelling at this white-hot eloquence, and at the unlimited heroism of the music, that throws out as from a vortex the theme of the ideal, a theme which shines out as a Grail even in the early pages of the work, and that is finally apotheosized. They might shake their heads, and say, "It must have taken a very young man to write like that." And they might wag the head a second time, and say, "Would that I were a young man again." And then the color! Someone talked foolishly one time of the E-flat major chord that closes Strauss' "Hero's Life," but what comparison is there between that chord and the rainbow of promise that stretches over the orchestra at the end of "Tod und Verklarung"?

Grandeur of Brahms

This music was in the most striking contrast to the grandly impersonal, tragic music of Brahms. Strauss' work, which followed, could not have been placed in a most effective light. What is austere, and even stark, in Brahms' music, becomes a blazing torrent of eloquence, of also, perhaps, of rhetoric, with Strauss. There is, indeed, no modern composer who had Brahms' comprehension of the Greek spirit. The Tragic Overture would not go badly as a prelude to a drama of Sophocles. It is all of the Fates, of impassive and cleansing destiny of the world redeemed by destruction, and this is uttered with a simplicity, a reserve, a lack of a certain sort of temperature which is not only excellent for the ear, but healthy for the emotions. It is music which makes life less intense, perhaps, but also less neurasthenic than the music of Strauss, and the music of Brahms does not lose by the comparison.

The programme of the concert next week will offer a new symphony by Georges Enesco, Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles," and Dvorak's overture "Husitka."

BOSTON HERALD,

OCTOBER 16,

SYMPHONY'S FIRST CONCERT REAL TRIUMPH

Appropriate Funereal Note Is Heard Throughout the Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra (35th season) took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck was heartily applauded when he came on the stage. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tragic overture	Brahms
"Death and Transfiguration"	Strauss
Les Preludes	Liszt

Until a few years ago it was customary for reviewers of the first symphony concerts to unite in a vein that was almost apologetic: "The orchestra has been dispersed during the summer; it is natural that with little rehearsal there should have been occasional roughness in the performance," etc., etc.

However just or unjust such criticism was in the past, it would be most unfair if stated with reference to the concert of yesterday. Immediately after the close of last season, the orchestra made its remarkable trip to San Francisco, where it triumphed gloriously. Last Sunday it returned from another western trip for which it had diligently rehearsed. The performance yesterday was brilliant; brilliant even for these accomplished players. It is not necessary to attribute the result wholly to the work already done outside the city. Dr. Muck has now an instrument that responds to his wishes as an interpreter whenever and wherever there is need. Nor can it be said that the works performed were so familiar that the orchestra could not possibly be ineffective, much less go astray; for that which was familiar was so clothed with eloquence that it seemed new.

The Allegretto of the symphony was never so profoundly emotional; the finale never so riotous and mad in exultation. So, too, the compositions that followed were glorified in expression. The overture was the voice of sadness, not personal and morbid, but heroic and universal. Strauss's tone-poem was the more terrible in its portrayal of death struggles; nobler and grander in the thought of the final release, of the sanctity that death gives even to the boor and the scoundrel; of the overpowering majesty of the inevitable and great transformation. For once Liszt's "Preludes" was freed from what might be easily characterized as dross and seemed as novel in form and surprising in its varied expressiveness as it did to the startled hearers of 60 years ago.

It would be easy to speak of this or that virtuoso in the orchestra; to dwell upon Mr. Longy's tone, skill and musical taste; to eulogize Messrs. Witek, Maquarre, Ferir, Sand, Wendler, Warnke, Sadony, but it would also be only just to give many other names, to call the roll of the orchestra, for all aided in the glorious work.

There was a dominating funereal note in the program. The mighty lamentation in the symphony with the scherzo-trio which is not wholly of this earth, and Strauss's tone-poem are eminently suited to the time. In "The Preludes" there is allusion to the shock of battle. Nor are Beethoven's pages of frenzied joy or Liszt's more pompous measures wholly incongruous. These lines of Walt Whitman might have been printed on the title page of the program book:

With music strong I come, with my cornets and my drums,
I play not marches for accepted victors only, I play marches for conquer'd and slain persons.

I beat and pound for the dead,
I blow through my embouchures my loudest and gayest for them.

Vivas to those who have fail'd!
And to those whose war-vessels sank in the sea!
And to those themselves who sank in the sea!
And to all generals that lost engagements, and all overcome heroes!
And the numberless unknown heroes equal to the greatest heroes known!

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Enesco, symphony in E flat major (first time here); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Loeffler, "The Death of Tintagiles"; Dvorak, overture "Husitska."

BOSTON GLOBE-

OCTOBER 16,

NEW SYMPHONY SEASON BEGINS

Warm Welcome for Dr Muck and Orchestra.

Performance a Brilliant One in Technic and Style.

Death and Transfiguration a Feature.

The 35th season of Symphony concerts began yesterday afternoon. The orchestra, after tours to the Far and the Middle West since its last appearance here, returned practically unchanged in membership. Dr Muck was applauded warmly when he walked to the desk, and twice bowed his acknowledgments. The audience showed an appreciation after the symphony which has become customary, continuing the demonstration until players and conductor stood together. There were no features to make the occasion a particularly marked one, save that the audience, which filled the hall, paid its compliments in greeting to the new season, and heard orchestral music interpreted in a manner which still remains a thing of distinction.

The program was drama from three Germans and a Hungarian—Beethoven—unless he be considered of Flemish extraction—Brahms, Richard Strauss and Liszt. To some the seventh symphony holds less of interest than the diminutive eighth which follows or the pastoral which precedes. The attempts to fit a program to the last movement do not lessen its value as absolute music. The family of relationship between it and a dance finale of Mozart is not remote. It is more obvious, frank and less reserved in expression than the preceeding movements. The rhythmical character is well defined and has an elemental rigor.

The performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was the feature of the afternoon. Eloquently played, with unblemished technical brilliance, with a tonal quality sonorous without the sacrifice of euphony, with sweeping dramatic force, this music is Strauss' at his best as a dramatist in tone, painting graphically the contrast between the grim struggle with death and the glorification of the soul. The theme of the transfiguration was marvelously varied yesterday, now triumphant, now serene, always ecstatic.

Liszt's Preludes has been upon Dr Muck's programs before. The sentimentality, the pomp and bombast are forgotten in a performance of the breadth and euphony of that of yesterday. The brass choir, particularly the first trumpet, has developed sonority to the point where it would not safely go farther, but the color of the brasses yesterday was golden.

Brahms' "Tragic" overture was played with marked clearness of exposition and with dignity of mood.

The program next week will include a symphony in E flat major by Georges Enesco, first time at these concerts; Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Mr Loeffler's "The Death of the Tintagiles" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska."

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 16, 1915

OPENING CONCERT IS ORCHESTRAL

SYMPHONY SEASON HAS NOW BEGUN

Public Turns From Small Scores to Big, From Home Runs to Chromatic

By LOUIS C. ELSON

THE PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Seventh Symphony.
Brahms. Tragic Overture.
Strauss. Death and Transfiguration. Symphonic Poem.
Liszt. Les Preludes. Symphonic Poem.

The orchestral season has begun, the baseball season has ended, and the public turns from the bat to the baton, from very small scores to very big ones, from home runs to chromatic ones. The opening programme was entirely orchestral, such as we like the best, although the public will generally flock more enthusiastically to a star soloist than to symphonic masterpieces. It was a great programme; greater than we generally get for an opening one, but that was due to the fact that the orchestra had been trained somewhat through a short preliminary season on tour, which is a very good plan.

We earnestly hope that there will be no Chauvinism displayed in judging of the contents of the above programme. People may remember that Beethoven never composed a national idence, R. I.

[illegible] and even the [illegible] the, when reproached for n[illegible] ening German patriotism in his w[illegible] responded that his art was not limited by national boundaries. Besides we must remember that Beethoven was a Belgian, according to the English iconoclasts, and that Liszt was about half French. We hope for the best of the Russian and the French school (in spite of D'Indy's suggesting the discharge of all Germans from American conservatories and orchestras—for the advancement of art), and even a little of the modern English, when it is intelligible, in the later programmes. There will be no national boundaries, and here there will be many Russian victories.

That rhythmic tone-poem, that idealization of the dance, Beethoven's seventh symphony, never fades. Dr. Muck does not distort it in the performance. He does not try to become original at all hazards, but delivers its optimistic message as the composer wrote it. Even the slow movement is not heavier paced than an allegretto, and is brooding rather than lamentation, and even here the element of consolation, which Beethoven (that good old fighter who never yielded to despair) always added to his darker moods, is present in the Trio, which was read in just the right contrast by the conductor and the orchestra. The last two movements were less perfect and trumpet and kettle drums were often too loud.

Brahms' Tragic Overture is darker, but has its contrasts nevertheless. Brahms had no especial tragedy in mind in this work, but simply (as Hanslick says) thought of an "Actus tragicus," such as Bach once used as the title of a work. There is no military catastrophe in these measures and no real cataclysm of any kind, but darkness and foreboding enough. But Brahms gives the sombre picture without any of the modern cacophony and does not even desert symmetrical form in portraying it. The wretched tragedies of the present will soon breed fiercer music than this too self-contained work. Yet it is noble music and clearly wrought out, as all of Brahms' works are. Possibly one should judge it from the old Greek, non-emotional standpoint, as a picture of inexorable fate which is accepted with dignified acquiescence.

Yet there are not wanting critics to find a definite picture here, and one of these intention-finders brings the work home to "Hamlet," and thinks the tender oboe subordinate theme to be Ophelia, while others give the sweet theme to Gretchen and the darker ones to Goethe's Faust. The work stands well enough without these artificial supports. It was played with excellent technique. There was balance enough against Beethoven's geniality, in the Brahms overture and in the Strauss tone-poem. It means much for our orchestra to begin their season with two such works as Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's "Les Preludes," and these two final works made a good foil to each other. Strauss' work is the greatest composition about dying that has ever been written; it is the great orchestral work of genius of our time. It is in some sense an essay on euthanasia, for if, after hearing it, one does not echo the lines—"Oh Death where is thy sting? where grave thy victory" then he has not entered fully into the spirit of the tone-poem.

Our orchestra gave the work with all its sudden changes, its moments of vehemence and of weakness, its dreamy memories, its final apotheosis, with great spirit. One could seek out a little roughness here and there if one looked for it, but Strauss himself did not wish this work over-refined. The climaxes were sometimes overwhelming, which was by no means a fault in such a work, and the ending was shaded to perfection.

Liszt "Les Preludes" are anything but listless preludes, as an unfledged pupil once called them. They are the preludes to Immortality, and they also have an apotheosis, not as in the Strauss tone-poem, a triumph over Death, but a victory over "life's endless toil and endeavor." Hugo Wolf's test of a great composer—"Can he Exult?"—is splendidly answered here, for Liszt exults in fortississimo, with full orchestra, and the brasses blowing their lips off. It is odd to see how Wagner's great "Fate-figure," of three notes, has been used by other composers. Cesar Franck has it in his D minor symphony, and Liszt has it worked up through this present work. But no one was able to give it the immutable power that Wagner expressed in it.

The pictures of the musical panorama in "Les Preludes" were well contrasted. Love, happiness, pastoral pleasure, the call to combat, the storm and stress, and the final picture of Man arising in power and majesty, were all excitingly played, yet, in spite of the enthusiasm it awakened, and deserved, it seemed somewhat grandiloquent when placed beside Strauss's awe-inspiring work. There was great technical display in it, gorgeous orchestral coloring, and a fine climax, but it was less noble than the other, as Lamartine might be less powerful than Shakespeare or Goethe, or even the Ritter poem which inspired the work.

Dr. Muck received a welcome of which he may be proud. The applause at his entrance was very prolonged, and we believe that the three recalls at the end of the symphony were as much of a personal tribute as a recognition of Beethoven. The programme was a trifle over-long.

Nevertheless, the consolations of Beethoven and the triumphs of Strauss and Liszt over Death and human vicissitudes made up a programme that meant very much to those who take the wretchedness of the larger part of the world to heart in this "struggle of discordant powers that draws out the harmony of the universe."

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 16, 1915

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

THE NEW YEAR AUSPICIOUSLY BEGUN

The Orchestra Again in All Its Virtues—Dr. Muck's Familiar Command of His Instrument and His Music—The Contrasts of Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's "Preludes"

MORE than usually, the Symphony Concerts seemed, yesterday afternoon, to begin where they ended last spring and five days, instead of five months, might have separated the last concert of the thirty-fourth year of the orchestra from the first of the thirty-fifth. Not only the hall, cleared at last of the intruding movies, but the band itself kept a familiar aspect, since, this autumn, changes in personnel have been few. A young Parisian, Mr. de Mailly, of proved skill and sensibility with his instrument has joined Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Brooke for the flutes; a new Italian trumpeter, Mr. Nappi, sits with the brass choir; one more Fiedler has taken his place among the violins; and the fourth and the final newcomer to the orchestra, Mr. Gardner, smites what the books call "the instruments of percussion." Four new faces and figures do not much change the semblance of a hundred and to the eye, as to the ear, the orchestra seemed the band of last year.

As unchanged is the conductor, even if the gray is a little thicker and clearer in the locks above his temples. Undiminished Dr. Muck keeps his elastic alertness of glance and bearing, his freedom from all pose or display, his sincere absorption in the work in hand. Not a whit is he less master of himself, the music, the orchestra and the audience. The sway of his personality still holds over his forces and his hearers, because he has never obtruded or cheapened it and because out of it flowers the achievement that has raised the orchestra to new pitches of perfection and that has given the audiences a pleasure that the Symphony Concerts have never before yielded. His public has known him in his work only; in it he has expressed himself; there is no other way for a man of his finely tempered mind and spirit.

Unaltered also was the mood of the audience toward the conductor and the band. The applause that welcomed Dr. Muck was as general, hearty and sincere as that which farewelled him last May. Twice and thrice the audience stayed him when he would set to his music, and it renewed its clapping as often as there was pause in the programme. The plaudits rose loudest and longest when, at the end of Beethoven's seventh symphony, he had twice acknowledged them for himself and then shifted them with his habitual gesture to his men standing in a great circle above and around him. At a hint from the conductor, they might have enjoyed a like reward for a performance of Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," that probably no orchestra in the world can match; but he was more eager to go forward with a long programme. As for the audience, it kept its familiar aspect and habits—like belated arrival for a few and early departure for many—but now latecomers may enter the parquet only by the central doors. Moreover, it is a redistributed audience, so to say; since the lively competition of the recent auctions has shifted not a few from the places that they long occupied.

So received, from end to end of the concert, conductor and orchestra excelled themselves. The tone of the band in the mass or in the separate choirs kept the familiar richness of body, fineness of texture and varied lustre of color. It mounted in magnificent sonorities through the upswelling periods of the end of Strauss's tone-poem; or it was feathery swift, light and flashing in the Scherzo of Beethoven's symphony. It expanded in thrilling breadth of phrase in the hymn-like Trio that interrupts that Scherzo; and it concentrated the beauty and the passion of sustained song that fills not a few of the middle passages in Liszt's "Preludes." Fluid and shimmering as of old, the wood-winds spun Beethoven's gleaming arabesques above the shadowed and vibrant voices of the strings; or penetrating and piteous, sang the song of youth in the ears of Strauss's sick man. The full-voiced brass made magniloquent the pompous close of Liszt's symphonic poem. The heavier instruments rained their strokes of Fate into Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; and the trumpets pealed across the sombre and slow-paced mass of the strings—the same strings that had glinted and leapt through many a measure [illegible] Beethoven's symphony. The ardent and elastic rhythmic verve or the grave rhythmic march of the orchestra equally stirred the ear. Beside the smooth and sunny euphonies and the frank accents of much of the symphony, stood the anguished phrases and the mysterious underbeats of Strauss's tone-poem. The romantic ardor of Liszt and the grave power of Brahms lay alike within the speech of the orchestra. The moulding and the coloring of every phrase were as though each man were a mutually precise and sensitive instrument. The sharp chords, the very drum-beats of Beethoven were eloquent; the streaming harmonies of his finale, the tortured accents of Strauss's tone-poem were as though human, and not instrumental, voices bore them. The technical virtues of the orchestra have vanished now in the results that they achieve. The hearer listens to revelation that has mastered both puissant and subtle means.

It is the fine ear and the endless endeavor of Dr. Muck that has schooled the band to this richness and fineness of tone. From his beat are born this elasticity and energy of rhythm. He measures this breadth and intensity of phrase; sets this flying pace; or marshals and sustains these sweeping climaxes. The melting euphonies and the pounding blows are the working of his will as the composer prompts it. It is he who chooses the phrase that the instrumental voices shall project for the instant upon the ears and imagination of those that hear; who graduates the subtle quickening of pace, the adroit heightening of accent, the exciting ascents and expansions in which the orchestra seems now as effortless as it is eloquent. His hand, as sensitive to the composer's intent as it is upon the uttering voices, enjoins the suspense that makes the transitions thrilling when Beethoven's symphony springs out of the hinting motives of the Introduction into the full "dance-song" of the first Allegro; modulates the little and animated dialogues between the instruments that diversify it; imposes the pace that maintains the contrasts of the slow movement; fixes "the holds" that heighten the nervous excitement of the racing and returning melodies of the finale. As he designs for the orchestra, so he details for it. As he releases its power in the tragic stresses of Brahms's overture, so he restrains it in Liszt's symphonic poem, lest a rhetorically romantic music shall seem but turgid pomps.

It is the custom to say that in such music as Strauss's tone-poem of the sick man battling with death from without and struggling with memories from within, each player in the orchestra must feel and convey the imagined scene and circumstance, the current of the emotions, the pervading atmosphere, the dramatic intent, even as does the divining and the imparting actor in a play. If this analogy holds, then a conductor, like Dr. Muck, becomes to such a piece as the producer in the theatre. It is for him to discover, for example, that in the feverish excitements of the music lies the least of its delineative power and the least of its hold for a quarter of a century upon imagination and emotion. Chromatically tortured tones may bear at the hands of Strauss the torture of the sick man's spirit as haunting recollection and impending death alike rack it. By so much the tone-poem is no more than delineative music accomplishing what, nowadays, it is easy to expect of it.

The finer power of the piece lies in its evocation, through sound, of the stillness, the solitude, the suspense of the sickroom; of the mysterious and insistent presence of death, waiting to receive the spirit shattered by these struggles. And the finest power of all dwells in the humanity of the tone-poem. The vision of vanished youth melts the heart in the tones of the oboe; the remembered conflict of living and doing stirs the pulse; death waiting implacable heightens the piteousness of all that the music would summon. It is on the wings of human sympathy that the tonal transfiguration of the end rises. The conductor-producer may heighten detail after detail, as Dr. Muck does; he may mate the course of the music as music and the course of the delineation as closely as Strauss has done before him; he may see the end from the beginning, and so unfold the piece that not a measure, as Strauss designed, shall seem wasted or ill-placed. But it will still remain for him to disengage from it the qualities by which it sways those that hear. Because Dr. Muck and the orchestra evoke the humanity of the music, the mystery that haunts it, the sympathy that is born of it, he and it make the tone-poem sound as it never sounded before within the walls of Symphony Hall.

So to discover and reveal what lies at the heart of the chosen music and what distinguishes and glorifies it is after all the unique quality of Dr. Muck and the orchestra that he has shaped in his image. It is quite possible to play Brahms's "Tragic Overture" so that it shall sound dark, diffuse and dull. Yesterday it was indeed a sombre music; but in the bold and clanging beginning it struck an heroic note. Soon it spoke nobly and loftily of struggle and of Fate—for Brahms is not minded in these things like the neurotic Slavs. Before it ended it had more than once attained the grave and deep power that is an attribute of the antique tragedy, the spirit of which Brahms would translate into tones. Oftener he ponders rather than speaks out in the overture; to make Fate inexorable he has made his music hard; but there is no mistaking the austere passion of its tumults or the gleams across them of a wan beauty.

As Dr. Muck both opened and intensified Brahms's overture, as he summoned sympathy and not spectacle from Strauss's tone-poem, making each music speak according to its own voice and glory, so he clarified and concentrated Liszt's "Preludes." The romantic composers and the romantic poets of the forties and the fifties saw readily vast but vaporous visions. They cultivated grandeur but sometimes reaped turgidity. There is plentiful tonal pomp and rhetoric in "Preludes," because it was the spontaneous way of Liszt as man and composer, and the prescribed way for such romantic pieces in his time. It is easy to make it sound poor of substance, swollen of manner, pompous of effect. On the other hand, it contains many measures wherein the expressive beauty of the music is born of ardent imagination and invention. Of such is the beginning which Dr. Muck touches with grave mystery of expanding voice, and of such is the succeeding songful passage that he deepens and glamors with the sustained richness of the orchestra's tone. The rest—largely tumults and pomps—he holds to measured eloquence and lo! "Preludes" has regained its large, clear and manifold romantic voice. As for the seventh symphony, the conductor had only to add to the radiant or the shadowed beauty of the music the complementary beauty of the instrument that yesterday brightened or deepened it. The mea[illegible] the methods and the outcome have al[illegible] been written here. H. [illegible]

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 16

KARL MUCK AND THE SYMPHONY BEGIN SEASON

Conductor by His Unique Handling of Baton Gives Readings of Great Expository Value at First Concert—Long Program

SYMPHONY HALL—First concert of the thirty-fifth season, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Oct. 15. The program: Beethoven, seventh symphony in A Major, op. 92; Brahms, "Tragic," overture, op. 81; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," tone poem, op. 24; Liszt, "Les Préludes," symphonic poem, No. 3.

It is all in the end of the stick. The precision of reading which probably more than anything else explains the great acclaim of the concerts given in recent seasons by the Boston Symphony orchestra, arises from the conductor's peculiar ability to place his beat at the very point of the baton. Everybody who ponders on the orchestral question grows into a stronger realization all the time of how much sound depends on sight, of how much the ear owes to the eye. Even those who regard the whole matter of motion in the orchestra as intrusive and disturbing, and Wagner himself was one of these, have at least an intellectual interest in it. The only way the music can come forth to represent the composer's intentions, is for bend of arm, touch of finger, set of lip and pressure of breath in the 100, more or less, performers concerned to be in something like accurate adjustment and coördination.

The perfection of that bundle of excellencies which the French tie up in the one word ensemble, the perfection which is such a simple matter to the pianist, such a lifelong study with string quartet players, and such an impossibility, it can almost be said, with an orchestra, is somewhere near attained by Karl Muck. Few listeners will think of denying this, for it is one of the facts of present-day musical interpretation that have been put almost beyond argument. All the necessary comparisons have been made, the reports are all in and the findings given. Orchestral players everywhere declare that Dr. Muck surpasses his contemporaries in precise reading of classic and modern scores, and they explain it simply by saying that his beat, like that of no other conductor, is at the end of the baton.

Other considerations aside, then, the performance of the two long works by Beethoven and Strauss and the short ones by Brahms and Liszt was remarkable Friday afternoon for its expository values. The structural content of the four pieces was presented with a mastery that is hardly to be equaled. But as to poetic values, there might be some complaint that there was a lack. The program was read off with thematic clearness, indeed; but not always with emotional distinction. The pieces that suffered least in this respect were doubtless the Beethoven and the Liszt works. Happily Dr. Muck has found he can let his baton rest in a portion of the scherzo of the seventh symphony and he has found that his men are aware of something besides square-cut measures in "Les Préludes," and he lets them express some human feelings here as well as their delight in virtuosity.

The players had a week of preparation for their first home concert in a tour of cities of the middle western states. Their playing in large concert halls has developed a large tone which is beyond the magnificence reached even in the time of Max Fiedler. And yet no instrumental department is forced unduly. The playing of the brasses, though altogether too loud at times for Symphony hall, was brilliant and clean. Indeed, the orchestra has never let more light into its harmonies, even in the days of the small tone of Gericke, than at this concert. The gruff scoring of Brahms had an unwonted persuasion. The instrumental entanglements of Strauss got a freedom unknown before.

The orchestra is now at the second climax of its history as an ensemble organization. Under Mr. Gericke it taught the subject-matter of the classic repertory to an inquiring public, mastering the presentation of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven with all imaginable thoroughness. Under Dr. Muck it has reasserted its ability to expound the text of the old school of writers and has proved its ability to illumine the pages of the modern program-music writers. Acquiring a large technique and a fuller sonority, it has been able to get at the underlying formalities of the work of the late nineteenth century novelists and painters in tone no less successfully than it got at the same things in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century sculptors and architects. At the same time the institution has remained philosophically just what it began. It searches out in music that which is systematic and tested. It emphasizes all the known values of expression and strikes forth to find new ones only with the greatest caution. It works out its purpose completely under a conductor whose beat is at the point of the baton.

When the history of modern conducting is written, there will be a long chapter on the topic of the beat. For the whole style of performance depends on where the leader, stick in hand, focuses his purpose. He may indicate it anywhere from the outer end of the wand to the inner. He may even indicate it back in his elbow or even at his shoulder. According to his temperament and his musical, social, or perhaps athletic training, he will vary the point on which his players are to fix their eyes to take his meaning. Beethoven's seventh symphony was directed in a former season of the orchestra by a conductor whose beat was not definitely localized at any point of the right arm or the baton, and that reading, if it could be brought back and placed next to the reading of Friday afternoon, would fail in all that goes to make up rhythmic and many another kind of charm. The Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" also at a concert of some years since had a reading under a baton of indeterminate beat, and that reading would not stand for a moment against that of Friday as a piece of explanation and analysis, however it might stand in other respects.

Of course the interpretation of music by an orchestra of 35 years' existence is to be referred to something besides the manner in which the conductor manipulates his baton. It is found vitally in the attitude of the listeners. If the beat is at the end of the stick, if the readings of the symphonic masters are strikingly expository, it is because the hearers will have them that way. A community that does little original in a given form of art will get into an attitude of curiosity and will remain there, until it becomes actively responsive and begins to express itself through that art in its own way. So long as its attitude is merely one of curiosity, it will regard the declarative and illustrative style of interpretation as the highest attainment possible.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY,
OCTOBER 16, 1915.

SYMPHONY OPENS 35TH SEASON WITH FINE PROGRAM

Crowded House Exceptionally Enthusiastic in Greeting to Conductor and Players.

Notable enthusiasm reigned throughout the opening concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was kept busy for several minutes acknowledging the applause of the big audience as he took his place at the conductor's stand. Honors achieved in the far West and middle West apparently made the audience doubly appreciative of its good fortune in having such an orchestra and such a leader.

And the concert itself was simply grand. The program, Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's "Les Preludes" more than half prepared the audience for the treat, but it scarcely could have been prepared for the orchestra playing in such exceptional form at the first concert of the season.

Never before did the remarkable beauties of the Beethoven symphony seem so clearly presented. The gem of all, the second movement, was little short of wonderfully given. It was playing long to be remembered. And the grand Strauss number, Strauss at his best and played as perhaps no other band of musicians can play. As with Strauss and Beethoven so in equal measure, comparatively speaking, with Brahms and Liszt. It was certainly good to [illegible] solid, substantial music and

---

RECORD, SATURDAY,
OCTOBER 16, 1915

First Symphony Concert Purely Orchestral

THE PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Seventh Symphony.
Brahms. Tragic Overture.
Strauss. Death and Transfiguration. Symphonic Poem.
Liszt. Les Preludes. Symphonic Poem.

The orchestral season has begun, the baseball season has ended, and the public turns from the bat to the baton, from very small scores to very big ones, from home runs to chromatic ones. The opening programme was entirely orchestral, such as we like the best, although the public will generally flock more enthusiastically to a star soloist than to symphonic masterpieces. It was a great programme; greater than we generally get for an opening one, but that was due to the fact that the orchestra had been trained somewhat through a short preliminary season on tour, which is a very good plan, says Louis C. Elson in the Advertiser in his review of the Symphony opening.

Dr. Muck received a welcome of which he may be proud. The applause at his entrance was very prolonged, and we believe that the three recalls at the end of the symphony were as much of a personal tribute as a recognition of Beethoven. The programme was a trifle over-long.

Nevertheless the consolations of Beethoven and the triumphs of Strauss and Liszt over Death and human vicissitudes made up a programme that meant very much to those who take the wretchedness of the larger part of the world to heart in this "struggle of discordant powers that draws out the harmony of the universe.

BOSTON AMERICAN
OCTOBER 16, 1915.

SYMPHONY HAS FIRST BOSTON CONCERT

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The thirty-fifth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston was begun yesterday afternoon in the customary unpretentious manner. It was not the opening of the season, however, as the orchestra made a long trip West during the first half of October, and consequently the men were playing in mid-season form, with none of the roughness or unevenness which sometimes attends an opening.

The audience, being feminine and gloved, did not greet Doctor Muck and his wonderful orchestra with the warmth they deserve, but the Symphony men know their Friday audiences and understand them.

The program chosen by Doctor Muck for the occasion was a feast of melody. There was the lovely seventh Symphony of Beethoven, with its exquisite Allegretto, and its fascinating Rondo finale, the impressive tragic overture of Brahms, the great Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the sonorous and popular preludes of Liszt.

Doctor Muck loves the classics and plays Beethoven with the scholarly clarity that makes the symphonies sparkle and glow. And unlike some conductors he never neglects the passages of great dramatic intensity which are constantly occurring in a Beethoven symphony.

The tragic overture of Brahms, which is supposed to suggest a hero's struggle against his doom, is titanic in its scope and contains passages of great beauty, richness and elegance. And yet it leaves one cold, unless he happens to be a devotee of Brahms.

Its mood is similar to "Death and Transfiguration," although this is frankly descriptive music. The Strauss work is now a quarter of a century old. Revolutionary as its harmonic structure may have seemed in 1890, it is now what we would style a modern work.

Strauss in those days possessed a fine melodic vein, and there is very lovely music in "Death and Transfiguration." It was played with all the passion and reverence which Doctor Muck and his orchestra bring to a Strauss tone poem, and it was tremendously effective.

The last number of a delightful program was that splendid symphony of Liszt, "The Preludes," which does not attempt to describe details like "Death and Transfiguration," but which creates moods similar to the spirit of Lamartine's poem of the same name, the theme of which is "What is life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by death?"

This music was used last season to fit a ballet called "The Preludes," in which Pavlowa appeared; a ballet [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT.
OCTOBER 23.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MUCH LARGE-VOICED, EXACTING MUSIC

An Outworn Overture by Dvorak—Mr. Loeffler's Eloquent Tone-Poem That Excels Its Source—Ravel's Precise and Persuasive Perfections — The Uneven, Exuberant, but Youthfully Masterful, Enesco of the New Symphony

PRESENT fashion among the conductors has blessed the unified programme, and with Dr. Muck it is not merely a passing predilection but a sincere conviction. Grant that it has advantages in the assembling of pieces of a common content, style and voice, though it ignores, for the sake of symmetry, the ready faculty that adjusts human attention and interest to variety and contrast. But need even a unified programme be so arduous and exacting as that which Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra laid upon the audience yesterday afternoon? As one of the cynics of the lobby said in the intermission, it might have been unified by its severities; more probably it had the desired cohesion and symmetry in the large voice and manner, the romantic or the tragic substance, the high pitch of feeling and expression, the general amplitude and modernity of three of the pieces upon it—Enesco's novel symphony, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem of Tintagiles and Dvoràk's "Husitzkà" overture. More lightly runs Ravel's suite from his ballet of "Mother Goose"; but the very finesse of his invention, the precision of his workmanship and the artfulness of his implications make even these "Pièces Enfantines" exacting to hear. No one of these numbers was of taxing length; none by itself laid more strain upon the comprehending receptivity and the emotional response of hearers than they would have gladly borne. But the four pieces in mass formation, so to say, left many an auditor forcing his listening faculties long before the concert had ended.

In particular Dvoràk's overture might have been spared, since like most of his music it falls not upon twentieth-century ears as it did upon those of his own day and generation. The youngsters sniff at it; if they have ever lived in Paris or "absorbed" at home what they fondly believe to be Parisian standards, they call the piece "old hat"; while most of us in middle life know that the sonorous pomps, the striding harmonies, the square-cut rhythms and the broad brush-strokes of instrumental color fall not upon our ears as they did in the nineties. This fate, common nowadays to much of the Bohemian's music, is less shortcoming than misfortune. In his time Dvoràk wrote, especially in such a piece as this "Husitzkà" overture, with a sweep of sonority, a fire of rhythm, a play of harmonic and instrumental color and a suggestion of untamed emotion and expression that were strange and stirring to hear. In 1915, however, the listening world of the West knows much more of the music—still barbaric at heart—of many a Czech, Slav or Magyar and its ears are accustomed to pomps of tone, energies of rhythm and flares of color beside which Dvoràk's seem tame. He has been left naked of nearly all things but his capacity for melodic invention and sustained interest of idea and mood. He was never strong in either respect, since he composed with much more "heart" and simple excitement than intellect and ordered power. And so at each rehearing his music seems to diminish, unless, like the one piece that he wrote in the pain of exile and longing—the symphony "From the New World"—it keeps a universal human feeling, poignantly expressed, that time and progress may not dull. Moreover, for the particular overture of yesterday, no doubt Hussite hymns stir Bohemian bosoms; but American ears receive them as calmly as Czech listeners might hear "Onward Christian Soldiers."

Besides, it was the misfortune of the "Husitzkà" overture to follow Mr. Loeffler's epitomizing translation into tones of Maeterlinck's play, "The Death of Tintagiles"—music at which time, so far, gnaws in vain and that changing fashion leaves scathless. (Even in the revised version the "dramatic poem" is now fifteen years old). Yesterday, too, as it came from the hands of Dr. Muck and the orchestra, it seemed to excel in graphic content and emotional appeal, in poetic substance and dramatic force, even the play that suggested it. The Belgian's "La Morte de Tintagiles" was written for marionettes; of course, it has been acted by humans; but only in the little marionette theatre in the park above Munich has it really kept the stage. Seen there, it seems a piteous tale remote, of figures that wear human semblance rather than possess human substance. Similarly, on the printed page, it is the atmosphere of ominous solitude, of foreboding that will not be stilled, of creeping horror, of pity stifled by cruelty, of will powerless against fate, of white childhood and pale youth against fat and black old age that possesses and haunts the reader unless he is perverse enough to take exercise in symbolism as he reads.

On the other hand, in Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, and in such a performance of it as drama in music as Dr. Muck and the orchestra achieve, the tale of Tintagiles becomes sombre and searching tragedy of old romance and older fate. For the dullest hearer Mr. Loeffler sets the scene—the grim and isolated castle in the storm-swept valley; the close chamber of secret dread; the corridors that echo to the soft padding of uncanny feet; the iron door at which young hands beat and tear in vain. For the slowest ear, Mr. Loeffler summons and individualizes the personages—the child prince, plaintive and piteous victim of old age and cruel fate; the young sister who by sheer force of youth and love, longing and will, would stay what she dreads and may not avert it; the grew-some and haunting sombre presences against which she contends; the whispering and padding watchers upon inevitable tragedy. In the tone-poem, too, Mr. Loeffler writes that tragedy largely and movingly—the genral conflict, old as Persian fable, of the powers of light against the powers of darkness; the particular, the poignant and the pitiful outcome when the child is slain and the sister lies helpless by the unyielding door. The pang of human suffering, the mystery of human fate, the baffling enigma of striving good and implacable evil haunt the end of the tone-poem. And what music intrinsically it is—coherent and cogent from beginning to end, alive with invention and imagination, large or fine of stroke as the instant demands, colorful as from inexhaustible palette, sustaining atmosphere, projecting drama, piercing and holding listening mind and imagination—and always by the means, the artistries and the intrinsic qualities of music. For it is not by the implications and impressions of the printed page assumed in the minds of Mr. Loeffler's hearers, that he compasses his atmosphere, defines and relates his personages, marshals and culminates his drama. The matter and the processes of his music accomplish these ends. In essence his tone-poem is a tragedy of light and darkness, youth and age, will and fate, that is self-contained.

Similarly, it was good yesterday to listen to the five divisions of Ravel's suite independently of the fanciful French inventions that suggested them and that have much more to do with the contes of Monsieur Perrault than with the rhymes of our own Mother Goose. The music bears such test well. The little Pavane at the beginning is a minor masterpiece of grave and gentle beauty flawlessly concentrated in the few smooth and precise measures of Ravel. The wistful grace, the suffusing charm of the piece labelled "Petit Poucet" melts the ear and the fancy. The ensuing procession of the "Pagodes" is miniature fantasy in rhythm, in color, in ornament, in returning suggestion. Call the "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" an idyl running to as idealized a waltz as ever Chopin wrote and ear and imagination bear out the designation. The finale of the Fairy Garden and the lovers' meeting distils as into some little bottle of crystal, the essence of romantic and atmospheric music.

And all this, from the first to the last measure of the suite, Ravel accomplishes with the flawless perfection that is his habit and distinction among contemporaries. They that write seek what the French call the just word—the word that entirely and exactly bears the idea or suggestion and that is impeccable in its place. Composing, Ravel almost invariably finds the just note. Each precisely and uncloudedly conveys what he would impart, each falls as exactly and inevitably into its place in the measure. Each measure is of like quality and like relation to the whole. That whole achieves its end as precisely, economically and inevitably. The purely musical accomplishment is as perfect as the fanciful and poetizing suggestion. Matter and manner, image and implication are flawlessly fused. The peril of such music is a dry and meticulous perfection. Ravel escapes it in these "Pièces Enfantines," by apt grace of invention and fancy, by the faint, exotic and fairy aroma that perfumes them, by the light ironic tang that the title imparts to such an exceedingly adroit, intricate and insinuating music.

As Ravel's perfections enthrall the listening and envying musician, so the manifold power and the passionate workmanship—for it deserves the adjective—of Enesco's symphony might have engrossed and stirred him. It is an uneven piece—as music is likely to be when exuberant temperament and opulent talent write it in the early twenties of their age. It is a piece in which the composer makes ardent use of the big instrumental means that he has already learned to swing and of the harmonic artifice in which he is already fertile. It is a piece, again, more ample and eager in design than in the apt and persuasive definition and filling of the plan; it is ornamented out of a treasure of invention and device that it is the way of kindled youth to believe inexhaustible; and the passion of its moods sometimes dwells more in the composer's spirit than in an utterance that sheer heat of feeling makes the less articulate. Enesco's symphony, however, is much more than this. Out of the first movement and out of the finale shine an opulence of means, a veritable splendor of handling, a passion of utterance that are of the born and practised composer glorying already in a kind of magnificence of resource, enkindled by it and stirring his hearers accordingly. Out of the slow division, moreover, rises a beauty of invention, a command of sustained yet diversified song and a mingled richness and subtlety of harmonic and instrumental color that weave around that song another and an irresistible beauty. They who would have single movements detached from symphonies, the rest of which does not match them, will insist that Enesco's adagio deserves to be so preserved. It held its audience rapt yesterday; and at the end pause for return out of pleasure and illusion signified more than all the succeeding applause.

It is quite true that the first movement of the symphony lacks clarity and firmness of design and substance and reveals no more than the aforesaid magnificence of workmanship. While some ears may be lost in speculation as to "what it is all about," others will have their joy of the whipping rhythms, the bold progressions, the ascension and reascension of climax, the passage of motives in vivid flashes through the choirs, the biting contrasts, the keen-edged detail, the harmonic glow and the throbbing instrumental color. It is as though Enesco would write music in molten mass to dart into the gleams of his harmonies, to fling off the sparks of his rhythm. In the finale, he is firmer of design and more lucid of substance; for much of the material has already been stated or suggested in the modern fashion of interrelated musical thoughts. The passionate energy of the mood is more direct and articulate and the fire of music and creative emotion burns through the glowing vapors of harmony and instrumentation. Enesco masters his splendor of handling even though it still intoxicates him. Between [illegible] power stands the second [illegible] upon seemingly the slenderest of motives. Scarcely unfolded it begins to stir with a strange and penetrating beauty; the beauty expands into lamenting song, half-wild, half-gentle and wholly romantic; ever-changing harmonic and instrumental color enhances now the wildness, now the mournfulness, and now the aroma of old romance. The beauty never clouds nor flags; the song runs its inevitable course, expanding as by emotional impulse from itself. The impression is of the illusion of old and touching legend, remote and glamored. Chopin's ballads do not bring it more.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

OCTOBER 23,

ENESCO SYMPHONY FAILS TO COME UP TO EXPECTATIONS

Earlier hearings of the works of the youthful Roumanian composer, Enesco, had rather whetted the appetite for more from the same source. Thus there was quite a bit of curiosity to hear his symphony in E flat, the feature number of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. One can frankly say the desire can scarcely be so keen today. The first hearing of the symphony leaves one in considerable doubt as to the composer's intentions. The first movement gives the impression of one who wishes to say a whole lot of things without any very clear idea of what they are and suggests confusion rather than clear thinking. The second movement, easily the best in the work, on the other hand, sounds as though the writer had restrained his enthusiasm and put down the result of some sound, musicianly thinking. The third movement shows a tendency to lapse into the errors of the first with just enough of the merits of the second to save the number.

Doubly welcome, therefore, came the second number of the program, that delightful "Mother Goose" suite of Ravel with its many charms, set forth by Dr. Muck and his players in their best light. But it was some step from Ravel to Loeffler's dramatic poem, "Le Mort de Tintagiles." It was almost a shock. However, one will long treasure the beauties of the piece and particularly the fine solo playing of Mr. Ferir. Mr. Loeffler was called upon to acknowledge the enthusiasm of the audience. Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," the closing number, seemed a bit tame after the Loeffler selection, which perhaps a rather long program may in part account for.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 23,

SYMPHONY MEN PRESENT WORK BY G. ENESCO

Composition in Symphony Form Found to Have Individuality and Appeal in Slow Movement —Ravel and Loeffler Heard

SYMPHONY HALL—Second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Oct. 22. The program: Enesco, symphony in E-flat major, op. 13 (first time in Boston); Ravel, "Mother Goose," children's pieces; Loeffler, "Death of Tintagiles," dramatic poem after Maeterlinck for orchestra and viola d'amore (Emile Ferir, incidental soloist); Dvorak, "Husitska" overture.

The Enesco symphony is the vehicle of at least one noble orchestral idea, though it is not, considered as a whole, the embodiment of sustained thought. Of its three movements the second is by far the most important. Of the other two perhaps it is enough to say that they serve as a frame for a beautiful tone picture. The work is an example of effective symphonic method but of inadequate architechtonic conception. As a study in thematic handling it is highly interesting; for it is as logically written from page to page as a work of Brahms. As a study in instrumentation it is equally admirable. The sound is persuasive, the contrasts of tone qualities and the alternation of light power and full power being managed with the rhythmic mastery of a Strauss. There can be no doubt about the composer's earnestness of purpose, strength of intellect and individuality of imagination. If, as Carlyle puts it, the world knows how a man will fight by the way he sings, Enesco would hold his own on the battlefield with anybody. He is a musical tactician, ordering his score so that every department of tone and every harmonic voice has its full efficiency; and he is a musical strategist, making the attention of listeners his objective and securing it, now by open attack in [illegible] now by surprise around a flank.

If the second movement had been put out by its author as a romance for orchestra, it should have been one of the successes of the modern repertory. It seems, notwithstanding any formal connection it can be shown to have with the rest of the piece, an independent composition. It contains a complete idea, and a sufficient idea to hold up the reputation of Enesco with that of any man now writing music. Ability to construct a symphonic work on a big plan is not essential to him who wants to address the world through the orchestra today. The movement is a most engaging love song, comparable with the prelude to "Tristan" in everything but tragic quality. It represents the present-day trend of lyric expression, which is no less yearning than that of the nineteenth century, but distinctly less despairing. The music of this section opens with a frank and hopeful descending phrase in the major mode, which is never contradicted by complaints or doubts in the minor.

On purely classical grounds the Enesco work would be regarded by many as failing to come up to the requirements of a symphony because it has no scherzo. And on the whole the test of humor is perhaps the surest one to apply. For the greatest tone thinkers have been preëminent satirists. Leave the laughter out of the Beethoven, Brahms and Strauss symphonies and you leave Hamlet out of the play. The disability of Enesco was offset on Friday afternoon by a program device of Dr. Muck. The missing element in the large composition was supplied from a short playful piece by another composer. What Enesco lacked Ravel made up. And thus a complete symphonic scheme was devised out of the work of two Parisian composers.

The Enesco and the Ravel works were a complete program in themselves and were the whole program of the afternoon as far as interest of interpretation went. For the Loeffler tone poem, unless it is a dull piece in its own right, had a commonplace reading. The charm of it as a number at the second pair of the Symphony concerts is in the passages for viola d'amore, in which Mr. Ferir is the solo player. It would seem from the Friday performance that Mr. Loeffler's chief desire in "Tantagiles" was to prove the value of a neglected instrument as a voice to plead for some of the finer and more mystical emotions of men. If that is so, here is a second example in the same day of music whose principal message lies in a few pages and not in the composition as a whole.

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 23,

ENESCO'S SYMPHONY.

Uneven Work, Overdressed, Lacking in Ideas.

Loeffler Tone Poem, With Mr Ferir Soloist, a Feature.

A composer of this city who went to Paris several seasons ago for study with Georges Enesco found his teacher's time so occupied with excursions to this and that city for appearances as violinist or as conductor that his duties as pedagogue suffered and the instruction was discontinued. The symphony in E flat major, op 13, played by Dr Muck and the orchestra yesterday afternoon, at its first hearing in this city, plausibly might be the personal document of a man of great activity. It is a display of energy which indicates variability, incoherence, at times boisterousness. These are not qualities associated with action when it knows the vitality of repose.

Remembering Enesco's other compositions heard in Boston, this symphony is disappointing. There were passages in the suite for orchestra played a season ago and previously that denoted a fine musical taste, a restraint which invited rather than repelled. The passage is recalled in muted strings in modal harmonies, reminding of a shaft of sunlight falling through stained windows aslant a cathedral transept. Enesco's earlier music showed growing qualities of imagination, of individuality, often of destinctive beauty.

It is true there are signs of individuality in these three movements, but the page is too frequently blurred. Continuity of thought fails. There is a disturbing restiveness. There are brilliant, even startling outbursts, explosions of dynamic energy, calling upon brass and cymbals with the exaggerated rhetoric which to some may convey a noisy impressiveness, majesty, power, but, alas, is a noisy disguise for emptiness.

When Inspiration Becomes Labor.

From one hearing there are few moments that remain in the memory. The closing measures of the second movement, employing a pair each of solo violas and cellos with choirs of both, established a mood of chastened contemplative beauty. They were made the more impressive by the elusive, unearthly softness of the vanishing tone with which they were played. The opening of the last movement has an animation that is spontaneous, and for a few measures is finely rhapsodical, but the composer's inspiration soon becomes labor.

The thematic ideas are not generally compelling in themselves. It is true the opening exultant figure announced at once by the trumpet is stimulative and it is heard in animated discussion in the brass, but the development runs into noise. There are beautiful passages following the introduction of the second subject in the first movement, but there is not a sustained and even flow of ideas. It is singularly mannered music. Skill indisputably is in evidence, but it is as though the composer had perused his sketch books and had taken here and there devices, figuration, melodic, harmonic or rhythmic formulas jotted down with the intent they must be used.

There are sonorous climaxes; there are clever uses of intricate rhythms; there is harmonization noticeably, yet not flagrantly modern. There is no apish emulation of the users of the augmented triad. There are ingenious effects in orchestral color, and there are also pages too thickly scored and too overloaded with contrapuntal detail.

It is music giving perhaps not so much the impression of having been written too hurriedly as of the composer having had a confused vision of what he intended to say. The performance was one which appeared to do all justice to the score and with a virtuosity which enabled one often to forget the music.

Ravel's Charming Suite.

Compared with it, Ravel's charming Mother Goose suite stood out in relief. The clear orchestration, the apt and imaginative suggestion of characters, the well sustained invention and the pervading atmosphere make it one of the most graceful and characteristic scores of the best modern French school.

Mr Loeffler's "The Death of the Tintagiles" is always welcome. Some may find an over development in the middle portion of the work. While this may be true, the poem as a whole is a remarkable expression in orchestral tone painting of deeply tragic feeling. Even without the association of Maeterlinck's piteous child Prince in the clutches of the noisome Queen, and with each hearer left to invent his own program, it is music characterizing voice of the solo viole d'amour played of virile dramatic fibre, teeming with imagination, well proportioned in its points of conflict and of repose. The impersonation of the tender boy by the plaintive voiced viole d'amour, revived by Mr Ferir for these performances and played with the instinct of the true interpreter, is a happy one. The work mirrors the weak overwhelmed by grim and overpowering forces.

Mr Loeffler was present and bowed his acknowledgments.

Dvorak's overture "Husitska," with its fanatic cries of the Hussites, closed the program.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 23,

SYMPHONY AGAIN PURELY ORCHESTRAL

ENESCO OPENING EXTREMELY BITTER

But Second Quite Another Story—Trumpeter Much in Evidence

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Enesco—Symphony in E flat.
Ravel—"Ma Mere l'Oye." Five Juvenile Pieces.
Loeffler—"The Death of Tintagiles." Tone Poem.
Dvorak—"Husitska" overture.

The second symphony concert, again purely orchestral, was somewhat less ambitious, and a trifle less interesting, than the first programme. The Enesco symphony was not exactly in neutral tints (in spite of its being of Roumanian origin), but it was not so scintillating as the Liszt and Strauss selections of the preceding week. We know Enesco chiefly through his Roumanian Rhapsody. That work was exciting enough to have been in Serbia, had one orgie after another, and a cancan-like wildness that gave evidence of a Balkan conflagration.

This symphony was not exactly of a milk-and-water type, although its symphonic respectability prevented such rhapsodical outbursts as above described. It had but three movements, and in these days when a lad of 16 writes a Sinfonietta an hour long, we must be grateful for reasonable brevity. The scherzo is the movement omitted, and there is nothing playful about the entire work.

The opening movement ("Assez Vif") was extremely bitter. We thought that Enesco had gone over to the enemy, at a first hearing of this, but there was at least some intelligibility, even here, and originality was present from the very first phrase. Nevertheless we were not sorry when the banging kettle-drum figure which ends the movement was reached.

But the second movement ("Lent") was quite another story. If any one wants to hear what can be developed out of "Three Blind Mice" let him listen attentively to this movement, for its chief motive is the opening figure of the time-honored round. It comes back again and again, like a Carillon, or a sort of "Ostinato," but it is treated with so much ingenuity and poetry that it has a pensive charm that is most attractive. This movement is the gem of the work and it was given with a delicacy of shading that cannot be over-praised.

The finale had considerable material from the first two movements worked over. This device, which Beethoven began in his ninth symphony finale has been used by all the symphonic moderns, but none of them approach the finale of Brahms' first in this matter. The Enesco work is an important addition to the repertoire.

Ravel's works might be entitled "Mother Goose for Adults." He may use the title "enfantines" as much as he chooses, but the juveniles who revel in unravelling Ravel must be, like the Boston child of the New York comic papers, wonderfully advanced infants. We like the children of Humperdinck better than those of Ravel or Richard Strauss. However, there were more graphic points and fine contrasts in this Gallic Mother Goose. Most daintily was "The Sleeping Beauty in the Wood" and "Hop o' My Thumb" whispered to the audience, and here the delicacy of shading was quite in place. Everyone liked the xylophone confectionery in "Laideronnette," even if it was not as saccharine as Tschaikowsky's Sugar-plum fairy. There was a growling contrabassoon in "Beauty and the Beast" which was graphic enough. The Fairy Garden which is the Finale of the Suite seemed situated somewhere in the altissimo octave, judging by the high tones which were so copiously strewn about and which made the execution of the movement difficult.

Altogether we are beginning to like "Ma Mere l'Oye" even if it is not our idea of Mother Goose. It is one of the best examples of modern orchestration and progressions put to a playful use, and when we think of how much of ugliness the modern composer is capable of producing, we are profoundly grateful to catch him in a lighter mood. "Laideronnette" was the number which pleased the public most, and we agreed with the Vox Populi in this. Nevertheless we shall still choose Humperdinck and Tschaikowsky when we are in search of musical fairy tales.

From Mother Goose to the Death of Tintagiles was like going directly from a candy shop into an undertaker's establishment, rather too sudden a transition. The oftener we hear Mr. Loeffler's great work, the more we are impressed with his wonderful mastery of tone-color. The viol d'amour, which pictures Tintagiles, deserves resuscitation, and we know of no better exhibition of its dreamy, melancholy tone-color than is given in this work. Meyerbeer never got such an effect out of it in the "Huguenots" (Raoul's song, first act), and that was about the last prominent use of it made in modern music, that we can recall, until Mr. Loeffler resuscitated it.

Because of the seven wires which are placed under the finger-board, and which vibrate sympathetically with the seven strings that are played upon, the instrument has a really celestial quality, especially in its harmonics. It is always substituted for by the viola in modern scores and it is worth while remembering when one has an opportunity to hear it as well played as it was on this occasion by Emil Ferir.

We wish the composition were less prolix. Like Charles II, Tintagiles is a long while dying, but unlike that monarch, he makes no apology for it and does not hurry himself in the least.

Shakespeare's line about "Sounds and lamentations heard i' the air," would describe Tintagiles' lingering death, until he is crushed by the sudden fall of a solid mass of tonal masonry. The final crashes were most dramatic. All Bostonians prize Mr. Loeffler and it was but natural that he received a personal tribute from the audience and was obliged to rise and bow. But we believe that the work would be honored anywhere that it is played, in Europe or America. It is one of the important things that have been done in music on this side of the Atlantic. After Tintagiles was comfortably dead and buried we turned to alternate layers of Bohemian Chorales and battle-music. Dr. Muck gave these with all possible pomp and circumstance, but even that did not convince us that Dvorak could approach such music as, for example, Tschaikowsky achieved in the "1812" overture, where he celebrated Russia as Dvorak here attempts to celebrate Bohemia. When it comes to this kind of inspirational patriotism we much prefer Dvorak's teacher, Smetana, to the pupil.

There is a great deal of noise in "Husitska," but we are so fed up on fortissimi nowadays that breadth of sound does not carry us off our feet. The Hussite chorale was dignified, most especially at the beginning, where it appeared on the wood-wind. It reappeared often and was apotheosized at the end, but we felt more in sympathy with the plain religious chorale than with Dvorak's attempts to magnify it.

In this, and in the finale of the Enesco symphony, the trumpeter played as if he thought that it was the day of judgment. This extreme emphasis may be useful on Resurrection Morning, but until that time it is somewhat too emphatic. The make-up of this programme was a strong contrast to the power displayed in the first one.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 23, 1915.

NEW SYMPHONY AT REHEARSAL

Work by the Roumanian, Enesco, Played—Ravel's Poetic Suite —Loeffler's Tone Poem.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Every seat was taken. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E flat major, op. 13..Enesco
Ma Mere l'Oye, 5 Pieces Enfantines..Ravel
"The Death of Tintagiles" (after Maeterlinck) ....Loeffler
Overture "Husitska"..............Dvorak

It was a pity that the concert did not end with Mr. Loeffler's impressive tone-poem. It is true that it is not a hat-and-overcoat piece; it does not end with a joyful noise, which the Psalmist assures us was grateful to his Lord; but it is a good thing occasionally to leave a concert hall in a contemplative spirit, with the thought that life after all is not madeup only of beer and skittles. The program would have been admirably balanced without Dvorak's overture, which after the music of Ravel and Loeffler seemed ineffectively strenuous and laboriously contrived. It might serve a Hussite holiday, if Dvorak had written it for a military band and for performance in the open air. Coming immediately after Mr. Loeffler's highly imaginative and emotional composition, it recalled the remark of the noble Spaniard, Don Adriano de Armado: "The words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo." Furthermore, the concert without the overture would have been long enough.

Enesco's symphony was heard here for the first time. It was produced in Paris nearly 10 years ago, when the composer was in his 25th year. His "Roumanian Poem," a "Roumanian Rhapsody"—for Enesco is a Roumanian by birth—an orchestral suite and two or three other pieces have been played here. The symphony, which has a later opus number than the Suite, is on the whole a less individual work. The composer himself has said that when he studied in Vienna and before he made Paris his home for further study and the exercise of his profession as violinist and composer, he was "deeply imbued with the music of Wagner and Brahms," and their influence, he thinks, is shown today; that French influences also give character to his writings.

The second movement is the finest of the three, in thought and in expression. There is pleasing romantic sentiment rather than any compelling emotional appeal. There is a definite melodic line, whereas the themes of the other movements have not a decided and arresting profile. The orchestration is more varied and also richer, whereas in the other movements the coloring becomes monotonous with a use of the brass that verges on abuse. The ending of this movement is especially effective in its simple beauty.

Of the other movements, the first is the more important. In it are well considered pages by the side of those that are meaningless in their complexity; reduced to simpler terms. They show little original thought, little that is of a quality peculiar to Enesco. We have spoken of the inherant thinness of the thematic material and of the swollen but futile rhetoric. The Finale left no durable impression and did not rivet the attention at the time. Dr. Muck had evidently prepared the performance with great care. This is his habit, whether a work be new or old. The performance was a brilliant one. The Symphony was well received, and the second movement found special favor.

Ravel's Suite does not grow stale with repetition, any more than the fairy tales that inspired him. There are those who look upon fairy tales as foolishness. We know children that can see nothing in them and have no interest in the adventures of Alice. They are all to be pitied. When Hazlitt told Coleridge that he did not relish the serious parts of the Arabian Nights, the latter said that if he did not like them, it was because he did not dream. The fantastical, as the ironical, is disconcerting to some. Ravel's music is exquisitely fanciful, fantastical. It is the very essence of the subtly poetic. Nor is it devoid of humor. Note how he treats the conversation of Beauty with the Beast: the coquetry of the waltz, a waltz hinted at, surmised, with the hoarse growling of the Beast, fearful lest he may not win the adored one. There is the same idea of rough strength opposed to woman's wiles in Saint-Saens's "Spinning Wheel of Omphale," but Ravel is not a copyist. Could any thing be more fantastically exotic than the music of Laideronnette, the Empress of the Pagodes? While she bathed, her little subjects played on theorbos of walnut shells and viols made of almond shells. The whole Suite might have been played before Salome of the White Esoteric Isles by the orchestra of ivory instruments heard once by Jules Laforgue.

We have often spoken in praise of Mr. Loeffler's dramatic poem. Under Dr. Muck's leadership this music was yesterday still more imposing, of still greater emotional intensity. The opening, with its picturing of the wild night without the castle in the nameless land; the thought of old, faithful Agiovale with the useless sword; the piteous voice of the frightened child; the sinister sounds in the corridor; the terror, the agony of Sister Ygraine—these are brought home to the hearer by the sheer beauty and power of the music without attempts at interlinear translation of the drama into tones. Many works produced since "The Death of Tintagiles" was first performed in the present version now seem curiously old-fashioned or have disappeared. In these days of ultra-modernity Mr. Loeffler's poem is rounded, complete—though perhaps a little condensation in the latter part of the work would give it still greater dramatic impact—and modern as the best music is always modern.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Brahms, symphony No. 4 Schumann, overture to "Manfred"; Chopin, piano concerto in E minor (Mr Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Berlioz, overture "The Roman Carnival."

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 23, 1915.

NEW SYMPHONY BY ENESCO HAS VARIED CHARMS

Enesco's Impressive Work Finely Interpreted by Dr. Muck.

Symphony patrons will fare uncommonly well this season if all the novelties on Dr. Muck's schedule prove to be as satisfying as the Enesco symphony in E flat, which was performed yesterday for the first time in Boston. Of the compositions of the younger writers it is worthy of a place among the most welcome novelties introduced in recent years. There are only three movements, instead of the conventional four, and the second of these is especialy delectable.

Though Enesco is a Rumanian by birth, he is a Parisian by adoption, and French influences are to be noted in parts of the symphony. The second movement, for instance, is rather mystical in character; but what distinguishes it most is its delicacy of coloring, its soft, shimmering atmosphere, suggesting a sunset in one of those gloomy dreamlands conjured up by Maeterlinck. The other movements are marked by more warmth and vigor. Enesco is no imitator, notwithstanding his fondness for the Parisians. He is a tone poet possessing individuality, imagination and consummate technical skill. This symphony, it appears, was written when Enesco was not much more than 20 years old. Only a youth with extraordinary talent could accomplish so impressive a feat.

It may well be doubted whether the work was ever so beautifully performed as on this occasion. Dr. Muck conducted with poetical feeling and the power of a master. Thus the audience was put in an appreciative mood.

There are two other works of pronounced modern style on this week's program, "Razel's Mother Goose'" suite, which must delight all ages of music-lovers, and "The Death of Tintagiles," the tone poem written years ago by Charles Martin Loeffler, a former member of the Symphony Orchestra. Both works are familiar pleasures. Last on this week's program comes the rousing "Husitska" overture of Dvorak.

At next week's concerts, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the accomplished young Russian pianist, will take part in the performance of the Chopin concerto in E minor. The other numbers on the program are the fourth Brahms symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture.

BOSTON POST, OCTOBER 23, 1915

'First Time' Symphony Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Symphony of Georges Enesco, in E flat, was played for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The music is powerful and turbulent and sombre. The mood is not on commonly associated with the musi of modern France, which might b supposed to have influenced Enesco, Roumanian, profoundly, for he ha composed and played the violin i Paris for some years, and he is still young man, when impressions are irresistibly assimilated. But Enesco is not of soft stuff. His music is far more Scandanavian in its color than Latin, or even Slavic. It has a stark and fantastic quality, a quality which is also displayed in the singular Suite, op. 9, for orchestra, which both Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck have performed here with success.

FITFUL AND GRIM

This music, fitful and grim, is indicative of a personality which might well become one of the most interesting in the small group of men who are composing living music today. The instrumentation is heavy, massive, often intentionally dark and thick, or shrilly brilliant. The utterance is uncompromisingly direct. Although naturally very modern in its harmony, this is such straightforward, strong writing that one has an impression almost of a diatonic character of the music, although there is only one theme, that of the defiant opening, taken by the trumpets, which particularly supports this impression, one of mood, of spirit, rather than letter.

The second movement is again dark and legendary, and the finale returns somewhat to the mood of the opening. The music is insurrectionary, although the revolt is that of a man within himself rather than of a people, yet the score reverberates with the shock of battle. A gratefully sincere and virile composition, which should be heard again soon.

"Mother Goose" Charming

The rest of the programme offered the "Mother Goose" suite of Ravel, Charles M. Loffler's "Mort de Tintagile," after Maeterlinck, and Dvorak's Husitka overture. Ravel's suite, played with a charming delicacy and precision, and a real sympathy with the mood of the composer, was received with almost more cordiality and appreciation than any other music on the programme. Its tenderness and its humor, its exquisite simplicity and the exceeding felicity of the instrumentation are now familiar and are genuinely appreciated. Two years ago this music seemed untra-modern recherche, artificial from any point of view. Today its sincerity and inspiration are apparent and inescapable.

Ravel intentionally limited himself to a small canvass, and in his original composition for piano four hands, to the technical capacities of young children. True, the music might be appreciated more fully by grownups, especially those who know the music of Satie and Debussy, whom Ravel has so wittily parodied in his "Conversation of the Beauty and the Beast." In the motive of the beauty we have a take-off on the Gymnopedie of Erik Satie, at this time little known in America, but an important figure in the estimation of both Debussy and Ravel, and the beast is an equally amusing cartoon of Debussy's Faun, with the chromatic wall which introduces that prelude after Mallarme.

Loeffler's Work Powerful

By contrast with this music Mr. Loeffler's work stood out the more ruggedly and was struck by the immense sonorities, the frequently almost brutal force of the orchestra of a composer often thought to err rather on the side of over-refinement than of anything excessively muscular or realistic. The orchestra of "La Mort de Tintagile" is an amazingly powerful one, and the frame of the work is very big. Probably no score of Mr. Loeffler's shows so much sheer weight of instrumentation.

There are, on the other hand, pas ages of extraordinary delicacy and ori inality in the orchestration. The po trayal of the tempest, and of the silen and the terror within the castle whi the tempest outside only emphasizes t more, the suggestion of the aged A lovale, aged and wistful and resign of the sleep of Tintagile and then t deep damnation of his taking off—th things are expressed with an aban and conviction on the part of the c poser which are the more impres by reason of the economy of the terial employed and the unity and riety of its development. There passages in which the materia handled with superb abandon and petuosity. But when Mr. Loeffler f his paint on his canvass, he knows very well whither he is flinging it.

Let him appear never so impassioned, underneath there is the unflagging attention to the choice and the disposition of the music and the remarkable resource, thanks to which a single initial theme becomes the basis of the entire work. Certain pages of orchestration stand out in the memory, such as the employment and orchestral accompaniment of the viola d'amore, and the wild fanfare of the trumpets, and the entire concluding passage which follows the three thuds of the great drum, music which may easily be associated with the last moments of Maeterlinck's drama, of the agonizing sister who has smashed her lamp against the door, behind which her brother is perishing, and whose horrified whisper, "Monster, I spit," echoes through the darkness as the curtain falls.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Establ

Boston Symphony at Infantry.

Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces Melba as the soloist for the first concert to be given here to-morrow evening in Infantry Hall. She will sing three arias, "Sweet Bird," aria from Handel's cantata, "Il Penseroso," and other two from Mozart's opera "The Marriage of Figaro," the lament of the countess, "Porgi Amor," and the page's song, "Voi Che Sapete." The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, No. 5; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish [illegible]," and Wagner's Prelude to "The [illegible] of Nuremberg."

Paper Post
City ~~New York~~ Houston
Date State, ~~N. Y.~~ Tex.

Symphony Auction Sale

The Sale Commencing Tomorrow Morning in Symphony Hall to Be Last Auction Sale in History of Boston Orchestra—To Determine Largely Where Permanent Patrons of Concerts Will Sit in Years to Come

Charles A. Ellis' announcement that the auction sales of seats for the Boston Symphony season which begin tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall will will be the last sales of their kind, and that beginning with the season of 1916-17, the season tickets for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices, is one of the utmost interest and importance to music-lovers of this city. The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales to be held this week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra, for they will determine, to a very large extent, where the regular subscribers will sit at the concerts in future years.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr. Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain those seats for 1916-1917 and for as many years after as they wish to do so. The plan is that after the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses, and the seats they occupy, so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out next spring it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

To put it in another way, Mrs. "X." will buy tomorrow M 25-26. Later in the season she will be requested to register her name and address and the seats she owns, and in the spring she will be notified that she has the privilege of renewing her subscription for those seats, and unless she fails to renew before a given date or notifies the management she doesn't care for them, the seats are hers for the following year. This is the plan followed by the orchestra with such success in New York and the other cities it visits, and it is also the plan that is used at the Metropolitan Opera House.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 17 19

Est 884

Mme. Melba, the incomparable coloratura soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices on Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete."

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

BOSTON HERALD,

OCTOBER 23, 1915.

NEW SYMPHONY AT REHEARSAL

Work by the Roumanian, Enesco, Played—Ravel's Poetic Suite —Loeffler's Tone Poem.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Every seat was taken. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E flat major, op. 13..Enesco
Ma Mere l'Oye, 5 Pieces Enfantines..Ravel
"The Death of Tintagiles" (after......
Maeterlinck) ....Loeffler
Overture "Husitska"..................Dvorak

It was a pity that the concert did not end with Mr. Loeffler's impressive tone-poem. It is true that it is not a hat-and-overcoat piece; it does not end with a joyful noise, which the Psalmist assures us was grateful to his Lord; but it is a good thing occasionally to leave a concert hall in a contemplative spirit, with the thought that life after all is not madeup only of beer and skittles. The program would have been admirably balanced without Dvorak's overture, which after the music of Ravel and Loeffler seemed ineffectively strenuous and laboriously contrived. It might serve a Hussite holiday, if Dvorak had written it for a military band and for performance in the open air. Coming immediately after Mr. Loeffler's highly imaginative and emotional composition, it recalled the remark of the noble Spaniard, Don Adriano de Armado: "The words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo." Furthermore, the concert without the overture would have been long enough.

Enesco's symphony was heard here for the first time. It was produced in Paris nearly 10 years ago, when the composer was in his 25th year. His "Roumanian Poem," a "Roumanian Rhapsody"—for Enesco is a Roumanian by birth—an orchestral suite and two or three other pieces have been played here. The symphony, which has a later opus number than the Suite, is on the whole a less individual work. The composer himself has said that when he studied in Vienna and before he made Paris his home for further study and the exercise of his profession as violinist and composer, he was "deeply imbued with the music of Wagner and Brahms," and their influence, he thinks, is shown today; that French influences also give character to his writings.

The second movement is the finest of the three, in thought and in expression. There is pleasing romantic sentiment rather than any compelling emotional appeal. There is a definite melodic line, whereas the themes of the other movements have not a decided and arresting profile. The orchestration is more varied and also richer, whereas in the other movements the coloring becomes monotonous with a use of the brass that verges on abuse. The ending of this movement is especially effective in its simple beauty.

Of the other movements, the first is the more important. In it are well considered pages by the side of those that are meaningless in their complexity; reduced to simpler terms. They show little original thought, little that is of a quality peculiar to Enesco. We have spoken of the inherant thinness of the thematic material and of the swollen but futile rhetoric. The Finale left no durable impression and did not rivet the attention at the time. Dr. Muck had evidently prepared the performance with great care. This is his habit, whether a work be new or old. The performance was a brilliant one. The Symphony was well received, and the second movement found special favor.

Ravel's Suite does not grow stale with repetition, any more than the fairy tales that inspired him. There are those who look upon fairy tales as foolishness. We know children that can see nothing in them and have no interest in the adventures of Alice. They are all to be pitied. When Hazlitt told Coleridge that he did not relish the serious parts of the Arabian Nights, the latter said that if he did not like them, it was because he did not dream. The fantastical, as the ironical, is disconcerting to some. Ravel's music is exquisitely fanciful, fantastical. It is the very essence of the subtly poetic. Nor is it devoid of humor. Note how he treats the conversation of Beauty with the Beast: the coquetry of the waltz, a waltz hinted at, surmised, with the hoarse growling of the Beast, fearful lest he may not win the adored one. There is the same idea of rough strength opposed to woman's wiles in Saint-Saens's "Spinning Wheel of Omphale," but Ravel is not a copyist. Could any thing be more fantastically exotic than the music of Laideronnette, the Empress of the Pagodes? While she bathed, her little subjects played on theorbos of walnut shells and viols made of almond shells. The whole Suite might have been played before Salome of the White Esoteric Isles by the orchestra of ivory instruments heard once by Jules Laforgue.

We have often spoken in praise of Mr. Loeffler's dramatic poem. Under Dr. Muck's leadership this music was yesterday still more imposing, of still greater emotional intensity. The opening, with its picturing of the wild night without the castle in the nameless land; the thought of old, faithful Aglovale with the useless sword; the piteous voice of the frightened child; the sinister sounds in the corridor; the terror, the agony of Sister Ygraine—these are brought home to the hearer by the sheer beauty and power of the music without attempts at interlinear translation of the drama into tones. Many works produced since "The Death of Tintagiles" was first performed in the present version now seem curiously old-fashioned or have disappeared. In these days of ultra-modernity Mr. Loeffler's poem is rounded, complete—though perhaps a little condensation in the latter part of the work would give it stil greater dramatic impact—and modern as the best music is always modern.

The program of the concerts next weel is as follows: Brahms, symphony No. 4 Schumann, overture to "Manfred"; Chopin, piano concerto in E minor (Mr Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Berlioz, overture "The Roman Carnival."

BOSTON JOURNAL-

OCTOBER 23, 1915.

NEW SYMPHONY BY ENESCO HAS VARIED CHARMS

Enesco's Impressive Work Finely Interpreted by Dr. Muck.

Symphony patrons will fare uncommonly well this season if all the novelties on Dr. Muck's schedule prove to be as satisfying as the Enesco symphony in E flat, which was performed yesterday for the first time in Boston. Of the compositions of the younger writers it is worthy of a place among the most welcome novelties introduced in recent years. There are only three movements, instead of the conventional four, and the second of these is especialy delectable.

Though Enesco is a Rumanian by birth, he is a Parisian by adoption, and French influences are to be noted in parts of the symphony. The second movement, for instance, is rather mystical in character; but what distinguishes it most is its delicacy of coloring, its soft, shimmering atmosphere, suggesting a sunset in one of those gloomy dreamlands conjured up by Maeterlinck. The other movements are marked by more warmth and vigor. Enesco is no imitator, notwithstanding his fondness for the Parisians. He is a tone poet possessing individuality, imagination and consummate technical skill. This symphony, it appears, was written when Enesco was not much more than 20 years old. Only a youth with extraordinary talent could accomplish so impressive a feat.

It may well be doubted whether the work was ever so beautifully performed as on this occasion. Dr. Muck conducted with poetical feeling and the power of a master. Thus the audience was put in an appreciative mood.

There are two other works of pronounced modern style on this week's program, "Razel's Mother Goose'" suite, which must delight all ages of music-lovers, and "The Death of Tintagiles," the tone poem written years ago by Charles Martin Loeffler, a former member of the Symphony Orchestra. Both works are familiar pleasures. Last on this week's program comes the rousing "Húsitska" overture of Dvorak.

At next week's concerts, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, the accomplished young Russian pianist, will take part in the performance of the Chopin concerto in E minor. The other numbers on the program are the fourth Brahms symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture.

BOSTON POST, OCTOBER 23, 1915

'First Time' Symphony Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Symphony of Georges Enesco, in E flat, was played for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The music is powerful and turbulent and sombre. The mood is not one commonly associated with the music of modern France, which might be supposed to have influenced Enesco, a Roumanian, profoundly, for he has composed and played the violin in Paris for some years, and he is still a young man, when impressions are irresistibly assimilated. But Enesco is not of soft stuff. His music is far more Scandanavian in its color than Latin, or even Slavic. It has a stark and fantastic quality, a quality which is also displayed in the singular Suite, op. 9, for orchestra, which both Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck have performed here with success.

FITFUL AND GRIM

This music, fitful and grim, is indicative of a personality which might well become one of the most interesting in the small group of men who are composing living music today. The instrumentation is heavy, massive, often intentionally dark and thick, or shrilly brilliant. The utterance is uncompromisingly direct. Although naturally very modern in its harmony, this is such straightforward, strong writing that one has an impression almost of a diatonic character of the music, although there is only one theme, that of the defiant opening, taken by the trumpets, which particularly supports this impression, one of mood, of spirit, rather than letter.

The second movement is again dark and legendary, and the finale returns somewhat to the mood of the opening. The music is insurrectionary, although the revolt is that of a man within himself rather than of a people, yet the score reverberates with the shock of battle. A gratefully sincere and virile composition, which should be heard again soon.

"Mother Goose" Charming

The rest of the programme offered the "Mother Goose" suite of Ravel, Charles M. Loffler's "Mort de Tintagile," after Maeterlinck, and Dvorak's Husitka overture. Ravel's suite, played with a charming delicacy and precision, and a real sympathy with the mood of the composer, was received with almost more cordiality and appreciation than any other music on the programme. Its tenderness and its humor, its exquisite simplicity and the exceeding felicity of the instrumentation are now familiar and are genuinely appreciated. Two years ago this music seemed untra-modern recherche, artificial from any point of view. Today its sincerity and inspiration are apparent and inescapable.

Ravel intentionally limited himself to a small canvass, and in his original composition for piano four hands, to the technical capacities of young children. True, the music might be appreciated more fully by grownups, especially those who know the music of Satie and Debussy, whom Ravel has so wittily parodied in his "Conversation of the Beauty and the Beast." In the motive of the beauty we have a take-off on the Gymnopedie of Erik Satie, at this time little known in America, but an important figure in the estimation of both Debussy and Ravel, and the beast is an equally amusing cartoon of Debussy's Faun, with the chromatic wall which introduces that prelude after Mallarme.

Loeffler's Work Powerful

By contrast with this music Mr. Loeffler's work stood out the more ruggedly and was struck by the immense sonorities, the frequently almost brutal force of the orchestra of a composer often thought to err rather on the side of over-refinement than of anything excessively muscular or realistic. The orchestra of "La Mort de Tintagile" is an amazingly powerful one, and the frame of the work is very big. Probably no score of Mr. Loeffler's shows so much sheer weight of instrumentation.

There are, on the other hand, passages of extraordinary delicacy and originality in the orchestration. The portrayal of the tempest, and of the silence and the terror within the castle which the tempest outside only emphasizes the more, the suggestion of the aged Aglovale, aged and wistful and resigned, of the sleep of Tintagile and then the deep damnation of his taking off—these things are expressed with an abandon and conviction on the part of the composer which are the more impressive by reason of the economy of the material employed and the unity and variety of its development. There are passages in which the material is handled with superb abandon and impetuosity. But when Mr. Loeffler flings his paint on his canvass, he knows very well whither he is flinging it.

Let him appear never so impassioned, underneath there is the unflagging attention to the choice and the disposition of the music and the remarkable resource, thanks to which a single initial theme becomes the basis of the entire work. Certain pages of orchestration stand out in the memory, such as the employment and orchestral accompaniment of the viola d'amore, and the wild fanfare of the trumpets, and the entire concluding passage which follows the three thuds of the great drum, music which may easily be associated with the last moments of Maeterlinck's drama, of the agonising sister who has smashed her lamp against the door, behind which her brother is perishing, and whose horrified whisper, "Monster, I spit," echoes through the darkness as the curtain falls.

JOURNAL

: Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony at Infantry. Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces Melba as the soloist for the first concert to be given here to-morrow evening in Infantry Hall. She will sing three arias, "Sweet Bird," aria from Handel's cantata, "Il Penseroso," and other two from Mozart's opera "The Marriage of Figaro," the lament of the countess, "Porgi Amor," and the page's song, "Voi Che Sapete." The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, No. 5; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish mes," and Wagner's Prelude to "The of Nuremberg."

Paper Post

City ~~New York~~ Houston

Date State, ~~N. Y.~~ Tex.

Symphony Auction Sale

The Sale Commencing Tomorrow Morning in Symphony Hall to Be Last Auction Sale in History of Boston Orchestra—To Determine Largely Where Permanent Patrons of Concerts Will Sit in Years to Come

Charles A. Ellis' announcement that the auction sales of seats for the Boston Symphony season which begin tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall will will be the last sales of their kind, and that beginning with the season of 1916-17, the season tickets for both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be sold by subscription at fixed prices, is one of the utmost interest and importance to music-lovers of this city. The immediate result of this announcement has been to make the four auction sales to be held this week the most important to the patrons in the history of the orchestra, for they will determine, to a very large extent, where the regular subscribers will sit at the concerts in future years.

In working out a preliminary plan for subscription, Mr. Ellis decided that the fairest way in which to allot seats at the beginning of a subscription—which would be a permanent affair—will be to allow the owners of the seats bought at the coming auction sales to retain those seats for 1916-1917 and for as many years after as they wish to do so. The plan is that after the season has been well started, the owners of seats for both series of concerts will be given an opportunity to register their names, addresses, and the seats they occupy, so that when notice of subscription for the following season is sent out next spring it will be taken for granted that the owners of seats will retain their seats unless they notify the management to the contrary.

To put it in another way, Mrs. "X." will buy tomorrow M 25-26. Later in the season she will be requested to register her name and address and the seats she owns, and in the spring she will be notified that she has the privilege of renewing her subscription for those seats, and unless she fails to renew before a given date or notifies the management she doesn't care for them, the seats are hers for the following year. This is the plan followed by the orchestra with such success in New York and the other cities it visits, and it is also the plan that is used at the Metropolitan Opera House.

CITIZEN

s: Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 17 191

me. Melba, the incomparable colora- soprano, will be the soloist at the concert by the Boston Symphony hestra under Institute auspices on day evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy Music. She will sing the "Sweet d" aria from Handel's "Il Pense-" and the two arias from Mozart's arriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" "Voi che sapete." he orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

884

From Nation
Address: New York City
OCT 7 - 1915

Among the musical entertainments to be given this season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences are five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; five by the New York Symphony Orchestra; three chamber-music concerts by the Kneisel Quartet; song recitals by Schumann-Heink, Kitty Cheatham, David Bispham, Paul Althouse, George Harris, Julia Culp, Melba; violin and piano recitals by Kreisler, Elman, Spalding, Josef Hofmann, Percy Grainger, Mme. Laginska, and Ernest Schelling.

The genuine Japanese Madama Butterfly, Tamaki Minra, who appeared successfully in London in Puccini's opera not long ago, made her American début last week in Chicago. She will also be heard in New York and Boston as a member of the Boston Opera Company.

Among the soloists engaged to appear in Boston with its Symphony Orchestra are Farrar, Melba, Paderewski, Kreisler, Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Ruth Deyo, and Ernest Schelling. The manager of these concerts, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, announces that after this season subscription tickets will not be sold at auction, subscribers being allowed to retain their seats from year to year, as is the case with other orchestral organizations.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
OCT 17 1915
Date

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

MME. MELBA, the coloratura soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices, on Friday evening, November 5, in the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Pensieroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Porgi amor and Voi che sapete. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

BROOKLYN EDIT
From WORLD
Address: New York City
OCT 17 1915
Date

MELBA TO BE HEARD.

Mme. Melba, coloraturo soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices to be given Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Porgi Amor and Voi che Sapete. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

BROOKLYN EDIT
From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
OCT 17 1915
Date

Melba to Sing with Boston Symphony

Mme. Melba, the coloratura soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices on Friday evening, November 5, at the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird," aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete."

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's eighth symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
OCT 16 1915
Date

Dr. Karl Muck in his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 4 will play Brahms's Symphony in E Minor and Schumann's overture "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's overture "Husitska."

Established: London, 1881;

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 1 1915

Madame Melba.
With the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday Evening.

FROM ll over the vance notes of an a concerts with which the musical season will open, and so great is the number of hese events that in some extreme cases nusical editors have had recourse to their lumns to implore managers and their ress agents to send in their announcements in as condensed form as possible. So succinct is the statement made by one such long suffering editor that it is worthy of emphasized repetition:

"There is room in these columns for short stories only, not for three-volume novels. Six graphic lines are worth more than a column of details which interest only those who want to see them in print."

In this city this week will see the musical season actually launched on the stream of important concerts on Tuesday evening with the first of the series of six to be given here this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the first of the De Luxe series on Friday afternoon. The largest of the musical clubs will also open its season this week, so that there will be no lack of musical entertainment for those who desire it. Dates already announced promise more than the usual number of good concerts during the season; a promise likely to be fulfilled unless present plans miscarry.

* * *

The series of six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a brilliant beginning on Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Not only has an interesting programme been arranged by Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, but the soloist is to be Mme. Melba, who has not been heard here for several years. As this will be her only appearance here this season the opportunity will be doubly welcome.

Mme. Melba, who since her debut in the Theatre de la Monnaie in Brussels has occupied an exalted place among singers, through the quality of her voice and the perfection of her technique, will sing three arias, the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's cantata, "Il Penseroso," and "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

The orchestral numbers comprise the immortal Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the extraordinary "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Beethoven—Symphony in C-minor, No. 5; Handel—Aria, "Sweet Bird," from "Il Penseroso;" Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes; Mozart—Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor," "Voi che sapete;" Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

* * *

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date OCT 18 1915

Dr. Karl Muck has already arranged the programme for the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York—Thursday evening, November 4 and Saturday afternoon, November 6. Thursday evening he will play Brahms's Symphony in E minor and Schumann's overture "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska."

On Saturday afternoon he will play the seventh symphony of Beethoven, Ravel's "La More l'Oye," Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les

---

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
OCT 17 1915
Date

Dr. Karl Muck has arranged the programmes for the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. Thursday evening, November 4, he will play Braham's Symphony in E minor and Schumann's Overture "Manfield," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's Overture, "Husitska." And on Saturday afternoon, November 6, he will play the seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 14 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The public subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concerts in Baltimore the coming season has been in progress since last Monday. All records have been surpassed, it is said, for even two years ago the great Boston Orchestra had no such season sale as it is having this year. This is hardly to be wondered at when one considers that to the great drawing power of the orchestra are added such soloists as Madame Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Kreisler, Schelling and Witeck, who will appear with this orchestra this season in Baltimore.

From Frei Presse
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 17 1915
Date

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra.

Am Freitag, 5. November, veranſtaltet in dem Opernſaal der Academy of Muſic unter den Auſpicien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Kunſt und Wiſſenſchaft das berühmte Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten Dr. Carl Muck das erſte Herbſt=Konzert. Die berühmte Sängerin Madame Melba iſt die Soliſtin und wird Arien von Händel und Mozart vortragen. Das Orcheſter wird die achte Symphonie Beethoven's zu Gehör bringen, außerdem Löffler's „The Death of Tintangiles" und Liszt's „Les Preludes".

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date OCT 18 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since the spring concert at the Parsons Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, evidences of the tremendous popularity of this great organization have greatly multiplied. Thirteen concerts at the San Francisco Exposition broke all records for attendance and receipts. Last night closed a trip which included seven cities of the Middle West where the orchestra played before nearly 30,000 people, the receipts being the largest on record for seven successive orchestral concerts. Seats for the New York series of the coming season are all subscribed for, a condition which prevails in nearly all the cities favored with concerts. The usual three concerts will be given at the Parsons Theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15, December 13 and March 27. Today is the last opportunity for subscribers of last season to retain the same seats. After the allotment of these, new subscribers will be cared for before public sale of tickets by Gallup & Alfred, No. 201 Asylum street.

From Nation
Address: New York City
OCT 7 - 1915

Among the musical entertainments to be given this season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences are five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; five by the New York Symphony Orchestra; three chamber-music concerts by the Kneisel Quartet; song recitals by Schumann-Heink, Kitty Cheatham, David Bispham, Paul Althouse, George Harris, Julia Culp, Melba; violin and piano recitals by Kreisler, Elman, Spalding, Josef Hofmann, Percy Grainger, Mme. Laginska, and Ernest Schelling.

The genuine Japanese Madama Butterfly, Tamaki Minra, who appeared successfully in London in Puccini's opera not long ago, made her American début last week in Chicago. She will also be heard in New York and Boston as a member of the Boston Opera Company.

Among the soloists engaged to appear in Boston with its Symphony Orchestra are Farrar, Melba, Paderewski, Kreisler, Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Ruth Deyo, and Ernest Schelling. The manager of these concerts, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, announces that after this season subscription tickets will not be sold at auction, subscribers being allowed to retain their seats from year to year, as is the case with other orchestral organizations.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

MME. MELBA, the coloratura soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices, on Friday evening, November 5, in the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Pensieroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Porgi amor and Voi che sapete.

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

BROOKLYN EDIT
From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date OCT 17 1915

MELBA TO BE HEARD.

Mme. Melba, coloraturo soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices to be given Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Porgi Amor and Voi che Sapete. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

BROOKLYN EDIT
From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date OCT 17 1915

Melba to Sing with Boston Symphony

Mme. Melba, the coloratura soprano, will be the soloist at the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Institute auspices on Friday evening, November 5, at the Academy of Music. She will sing the "Sweet Bird," aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the two arias from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete."

The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's eighth symphony, Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date OCT 16 1915

Dr. Karl Muck in his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 4 will play Brahms's Symphony in E Minor and Schumann's overture "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's overture "Husitska."

Established: London, 1881;

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

a country come advalanch

Madame Melba.
With the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday Evening.

FROM ll over the vance notes of an a concerts with which the musical season will open, and so great is the number of hese events that in some extreme cases musical editors have had recourse to their olumns to implore managers and their ress agents to send in their announcements in as condensed form as possible. So succinct is the statement made by one such long suffering editor that it is worthy of emphasized repetition:

"There is room in these columns for short stories only, not for three-volume novels. Six graphic lines are worth more than a column of details which interest only those who want to see them in print."

In this city this week will see the musical season actually launched on the stream of important concerts on Tuesday evening with the first of the series of six to be given here this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the first of the De Luxe series on Friday afternoon. The largest of the musical clubs will also open its season this week, so that there will be no lack of musical entertainment for those who desire it. Dates already announced promise more than the usual number of good concerts during the season; a promise likely to be fulfilled unless present plans miscarry.

* * *

The series of six concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a brilliant beginning on Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Not only has an interesting programme been arranged by Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, but the soloist is to be Mme. Melba, who has not been heard here for several years. As this will be her only appearance here this season the opportunity will be doubly welcome.

Mme. Melba, who since her debut in the Theatre de la Monnaie in Brussels has occupied an exalted place among singers, through the quality of her voice and the perfection of her technique, will sing three arias, the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's cantata, "Il Penseroso," and "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

The orchestral numbers comprise the immortal Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the extraordinary "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Beethoven—Symphony in C-minor, No. 5; Handel—Aria, "Sweet Bird," from "Il Penseroso;" Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes; Mozart—Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor," "Voi che sapete;" Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

* * *

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date 18 1915

Dr. Karl Muck has already arranged the programme for the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York—Thursday evening, November 4 and Saturday afternoon, November 6. Thursday evening he will play Brahms's Symphony in E minor and Schumann's overture "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska."

On Saturday afternoon he will play the seventh symphony of Beethoven, Ravel's "La More l'Oye," Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Les

---

Providence, R. I.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
OCT 17 1915
Date

Dr. Karl Muck has arranged the programmes for the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. Thursday evening, November 4, he will play Braham's Symphony in E minor and Schumann's Overture "Manfield", Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's Overture, "Husitska." And on Saturday afternoon, November 6, he will play the seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 14 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The public subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony concerts in Baltimore the coming season has been in progress since last Monday. All records have been surpassed, it is said, for even two years ago the great Boston Orchestra had no such season sale as it is having this year. This is hardly to be wondered at when one considers that to the great drawing power of the orchestra are added such soloists as Madame Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Kreisler, Schelling and Witeck, who will appear with this orchestra this season in Baltimore.

From Freie Presse
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra.

Am Freitag, 5. November, veranſtaltet in dem Opernſaal der Academy of Muſic unter den Auſpicien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Kunſt und Wiſſenſchaft das berühmte Boſton Symphony Orcheſtra unter der Leitung ſeines genialen Dirigenten Dr. Carl Muck das erſte Herbſt-Konzert. Die berühmte Sängerin Madame Melba iſt die Soliſtin und wird Arien von Händel und Mozart vortragen. Das Orcheſter wird die achte Symphonie Beethoven's zu Gehör bringen, außerdem Löffler's „The Death of Tintangiles" und Liszt's „Les Preludes".

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date 18 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since the spring concert at the Parsons Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, evidences of the tremendous popularity of this great organization have greatly multiplied. Thirteen concerts at the San Francisco Exposition broke all records for attendance and receipts. Last night closed a trip which included seven cities of the Middle West where the orchestra played before nearly 30,000 people, the receipts being the largest on record for seven successive orchestral concerts. Seats for the New York series of the coming season are all subscribed for, a condition which prevails in nearly all the cities favored with concerts. The usual three concerts will be given at the Parsons Theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15, December 13 and March 27. Today is the last opportunity for subscribers of last season to retain the same seats. After the allotment of these, new subscribers will be cared for before public sale of tickets by Gallup & Alfred, No. 201 Asylum street.

[24]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
OCT 17 1915
Date
Establ

MUSICAL MENTION

The coming week will see the formal opening of the musical season and a brilliant opening it will be—in fact quite the most brilliant musical opening which Providence has had in recent years.

The reason for this lies in the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate the musical season with the first of its series of six concerts in Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, with the peerless Melba as the soloist.

[illegible] sufficient [illegible] the interest of music lovers throughout this city and State.

It would be difficult indeed to imagine a more brilliant opening of the series of Symphony concerts than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to pay next Tuesday night, Oct. 19, in Infantry Hall. Not only is the great orchestra enhanced in glory and prestige, but it will bring as soloist the greatest singer of our generation, Madame Nellie Melba. It is years since Madame Melba was last heard in Providence and this will be her only appearance during the coming season, at any rate. It is an opportunity that no one can well afford to miss. Not only is Madame Melba the greatest singer of our generation and the possessor of the most beautiful voice of our time, but she is actually the last of the great singers who have cultivated the pure art of singing evolved through centuries by Italian masters.

For 25 years Madame Melba has reigned supreme in the world of song. Her career has been one of the most notable in the history of music. From the time ofher first appearance in Brussels, 20 odd years ago to the present, she had no rival, and all the gifts of fortune that come to a successful singer have been showered upon her in abundance.

None the less, Madame Melba, great as she is, when she sings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must remain but an incident, howbeit an important one. Wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays, in the end it is the orchestra under its great conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, which is the chief star, and returning to Providence this year after its enormous success at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco last spring and its astonishing trip just finished in the Middle West, where it played to over 30,000 people in seven concerts, it is bound to have a warm welcome from its multitude of admirers in Providence.

The programme is one of great beauty. Madame Melba will sing twice. Her first number which will display her matchless coloratura voice, and her second number will be two arias from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," the melancholy "Porgi Amor," and the joyous song of Cherubino "Voi che sapete."

The symphony will be the greatest in the literature of music. Beethoven's immortal Fifth in C minor, which has not been played here in a number of years. The second orchestral number will be the bewildering brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the final number will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; aria, "Sweet Bird," from "Il Penseroso," Handel; caprice on Spanish themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff; two arias from the "The Marriage of Figaro," (Mozart) (a) Porgi Amor," (b) "Voi che sapete," prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner; soloist, Madame Melba.

young Boston pianist, who is rapidly breaking away from the conventional schools of piano playing. His fine sense of proportion, exquisite delicacy of sentiment and happy spontaneity of expression distinguish him from all pianists.

Miss Jefferds's success as a soprano soloist has already gained for her a high reputation not only in this city but in all parts of New England.

MADAME MELBA

Famous Soprano, Who Will be the Soloist at the First of the Series of Six Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Evening.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Established:

BIG AUDIENCE AT CONCERT

Great Gathering Heard Boston Symphony Orchestra and Melba

The concert season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was opened last night with Infantry Hall completely filled with an audience eager to hear, not only this company of skilled instrumentalists, which is always exceedingly popular here, but the soloist, Mme. Melba, who has not been here for some years and whose return has been anticipated with keen pleasure by her admirers. Her selection as the vocalist at this initial concert of the series made the occasion more than usually auspicious for the beginning of the musical season and a warm welcome awaited her as well as the orchestra and its accomplished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. It was a typical Symphony Orchestra audience and there was a hum of anticipation preceding the appearance of the orchestra which showed how much the gathering expected to be entertained and how pleased every one was that another musical season was at hand with its rich opportunities to hear some of the best of the instrumentalists and vocalists the world knows in this generation.

As usual Dr. Muck had arranged a programme of selections eminently designed to lend variety and charm to the evening's entertainment and equally well chosen to reveal the powers of the musicians. The orchestral numbers were three in total and they were delightfully diversified in their nature and their appeal to the senses. The sympony was Beethoven's immortal Fifth and the other selections were Rimsky-Korsakoff's original and unique "Caprice en Spanish Themes" and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Admirably contrasted with these and with each other were the numbers Mme Melba had chosen for herself, the "Sweet Bird," aria from Handel's cantata, "Il Penseroso," and two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart's opera, the melancholy "Porgi Amor" and the joyous song of Cherubino, "Voi che sapete."

In her first number Mme. Melba showed that her voice is still strong, sweet and clear and that she retains perfect control of this wonderful vocal instrument which has delighted many thousands of people in the years during which she has been singing in public. The rich quality was brought out splendidly and she was assisted delightfully by the excellently rendered flute obligato by Andre Maquarre. At the close of the number Mme. Melba was recalled several times and the audience was loth to allow her to go without an encore. The other two selections, sung as a single number, were also given with feeling and power and the soloist again received insistent applause to which she was obliged to respond by several reappearances.

The orchestra was in the best of form and rendered its selections with that evidence of careful training and fine attention to details of instruction which always marks its performances. The symphony was played in such a manner as to reveal all its beauties of tone and melody while the rendition was of a masterly style. The caprice also was exceedingly enjoyable both in its musical quality and its expression, while the final number made a fitting ending to an evening that music lovers can look back upon as a rare occasion even with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Melba furnishing the entertainment.

The programme, in the order of its rendition, was as follows:

Beethoven....Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, op. 67
  I. Allegro con brio.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Allegro: Trio.
  IV. Allegro.
Handel......Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroro, ed il Moderato."
  (Flute obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)
Rimsky-Korsakoff..............................
.........Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34
  I. Alborada.
  II. Variations.
  III. Alborada.
  IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
  V. Fandango of the Asturias.
  (Played without pause.)
Mozart..Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro"
  (a) "Porgi Amor"
  (b) "Voi Che sapete"
Wagner..
  Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 24 1915
Date
Es 1884

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Madame Melba to Be Heard in Brooklyn Soon.

WILL BE THE SOLOIST AT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

David Bispham Here Tuesday—Y. W. C. A. Concert Wednesday—Fritz Kreisler, John McCormick and Miss Marshall to Be Heard in November.

Madame Melba, who will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Nov. 12, is from all accounts singing with her old-time brilliancy of voice. Her real American tour opened in Boston Sunday afternoon, Oct. 17, when she gave a concert which filled the great Symphony Hall to overflowing. Nor would the audience let her go at the end of her regular programme until she had sung eight extra times. Here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra she will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel and two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

MUSICAL MENTION

Establ

The coming week will see the formal opening of the musical season and a brilliant opening it will be—in fact quite the most brilliant musical opening which Providence has had in recent years.

The reason for this lies in the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate the musical season with the first of its series of six concerts in Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, with the peerless Melba as the soloist.

[illegible]ent in [illegible]uite sufficient to hold the interest of music lovers throughout this city and State.

It would be difficult indeed to imagine a more brilliant opening of the series of Symphony concerts than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to pay next Tuesday night, Oct. 19, in Infantry Hall. Not only is the great orchestra enhanced in glory and prestige, but it will bring as soloist the greatest singer of our generation, Madame Nellie Melba. It is years since Madame Melba was last heard in Providence and this will be her only appearance during the coming season, at any rate. It is an opportunity that no one can well afford to miss. Not only is Madame Melba the greatest singer of our generation and the possessor of the most beautiful voice of our time, but she is actually the last of the great singers who have cultivated the pure art of singing evolved through centuries by Italian masters.

For 25 years Madame Melba has reigned supreme in the world of song. Her career has been one of the most notable in the history of music. From the time ofher first appearance in Brussels, 20 odd years ago to the present, she had no rival, and all the gifts of fortune that come to a successful singer have been showered upon her in abundance.

None the less, Madame Melba, great as she is, when she sings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must remain but an incident, howbeit an important one. Wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays, in the end it is the orchestra under its great conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, which is the chief star, and returning to Providence this year after its enormous success at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco last spring and its astonishing trip just finished in the Middle West, where it played to over 30,000 people in seven concerts, it is bound to have a warm welcome from its multitude of admirers in Providence.

The programme is one of great beauty. Madame Melba will sing twice. Her first number which will display her matchless coloratura voice, and her second number will be two arias from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," the melancholy "Porgi Amor," and the joyous song of Cherubino "Voi che sapete."

The symphony will be the greatest in the literature of music. Beethoven's immortal Fifth in C minor, which has not been played here in a number of years. The second orchestral number will be the bewildering brilliant "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and the final number will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; aria, "Sweet Bird," from "Il Penseroso," Handel; caprice on Spanish themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff; two arias from the "The Marriage of Figaro," (Mozart) (a) Porgi Amor," (b) "Voi che sapet;" prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Wagner; soloist, Madame Melba.

[illegible] now been com-

young Boston pianist, who is rapidly breaking away from the conventional schools of piano playing. His fine sense of proportion, exquisite delicacy of sentiment and happy spontaneity of expression distinguish him from all pianists.

Miss Jefferds's success as a soprano soloist has already gained for her a high reputation not only in this city but in all parts of New England.

MADAME MELBA

Famous Soprano, Who Will be the Soloist at the First of the Serie of Six Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tesday Evening. Who

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Established:

BIG AUDIENCE AT CONCERT

Great Gathering Heard Boston Symphony Orchestra and Melba

The concert season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was opened last night with Infantry Hall completely filled with an audience eager to hear, not only this company of skilled instrumentalists, which is always exceedingly popular here, but the soloist, Mme. Melba, who has not been here for some years and whose return has been anticipated with keen pleasure by her admirers. Her selection as the vocalist at this initial concert of the series made the occasion more than usually auspicious for the beginning of the musical season and a warm welcome awaited her as well as the orchestra and its accomplished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. It was a typical Symphony Orchestra audience and there was a hum of anticipation preceding the appearance of the orchestra which showed how much the gathering expected to be entertained and how pleased every one was that another musical season was at hand with its rich opportunities to hear some of the best of the instrumentalists and vocalists the world knows in this generation.

As usual Dr. Muck had arranged a programme of selections eminently designed to lend variety and charm to the evening's entertainment and equally well chosen to reveal the powers of the musicians. The orchestral numbers were three in total and they were delightfully diversified in their nature and their appeal to the senses. The sympony was Beethoven's immortal Fifth and the other selections were Rimsky-Korsakoff's original and unique "Caprice on Spanish Themes" and the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Admirably contrasted with these and with each other were the numbers Mme Melba had chosen for herself, the "Sweet Bird," aria from Handel's cantata, "Il Penseroso," and two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart's opera, the melancholy "Porgi Amor" and the joyous song of Cherubino, "Voi che sapete."

In her first number Mme. Melba showed that her voice is still strong, sweet and clear and that she retains perfect control of this wonderful vocal instrument which has delighted many thousands of people in the years during which she has been singing in public. The rich quality was brought out splendidly and she was assisted delightfully by the excellently rendered flute obligato by Andre Maquarre. At the close of the number Mme. Melba was recalled several times and the audience was loth to allow her to go without an encore. The other two selections, sung as a single number, were also given with feeling and power and the soloist again received insistent applause to which she was obliged to respond by several reappearances.

The orchestra was in the best of form and rendered its selections with that evidence of careful training and fine attention to details of instruction which always marks its performances. The symphony was played in such a manner as to reveal all its beauties of tone and melody while the rendition was of a masterly style. The caprice also was exceedingly enjoyable both in its musical quality and its expression, while the final number made a fitting ending to an evening that music lovers can look back upon as a rare occasion even with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Melba furnishing the entertainment.

The programme, in the order of its rendition, was as follows:

Beethoven....Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, op. 67
  I. Allegro con brio.
  II. Andante con moto.
  III. Allegro: Trio.
  IV. Allegro.
Handel......Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroro, ed il Moderato."
  (Flute obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)
Rimsky-Korsakoff..............................
  ....Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34
  I. Alborada.
  II. Variations.
  III. Alborada.
  IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
  V. Fandango of the Asturias.
  (Played without pause.)
Mozart..Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro"
  (a) "Porgi Amor"
  (b) "Voi Che sapete"
Wagner..
  Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
1915

Date

Es 1884

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Madame Melba to Be Heard in Brooklyn Soon.

WILL BE THE SOLOIST AT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

David Bispham Here Tuesday—Y. W. C. A. Concert Wednesday—Fritz Kreisler, John McCormick and Miss Marshall to Be Heard in November.

Madame Melba, who will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Nov. 12, is from all accounts singing with her old-time brilliancy of voice. Her real American tour opened in Boston Sunday afternoon, Oct. 17, when she gave a concert which filled the great Symphony Hall to overflowing. Nor would the audience let her go at the end of her regular programme until she had sung eight extra times. Here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra she will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel and two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che sapete."

NEWS

From

Address Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 9 - 1915

Esta

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Providence the coming winter hold promise of universal attractiveness, for in addition to the Orchestra which Providence has known and admired for so many years, the soloists who are announced are of most unusual quality.

According to the prospectus of the orchestra just published, the six concerts will be given as usual Tuesday evening in Infantry hall. Their dates are October 18; November 23; December 28; February 8; March 7 and April 11. The soloists engaged are Madame Melba, Laeta Hartley; Madame Homer, Madame van Endert, Ernest Schelling and Josef Malkin.

The orchestra returns this year with practically unchanged personnel. It brings with it also the tremendous increase of reputation and influence, which was the direct result of the remarkable series of concerts it gave last spring at the Panama Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco, when it gave thirteen Symphony concerts in as many days to a total paid attendance of over 45,000.

The names of the soloists themselves will carry much weight with the Providence public. Madame Melba, who has been engaged for the first concert is today as she has been since the beginning of her public career, the foremost lyric and coloratura soprano of the world. The passing years seem not to have affected in the least the golden beauty of her voice and her marvelous thrill is still as fresh as that of a girl.

Laeta Hartley, the soloist at the second concert is an American woman and may be called one of the foremost women pianists in the world. This is all the more significant in that her whole training was had in this country. Her appearance a year ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was so successful that she was engaged for the several concerts the coming season.

Madame Louise Homer, like Miss Hart- is an American woman, American trained and most of her career has been in this country. Her wonderful contralto voice has won for her a large public from coast to coast, and in opera and in concert she has no superior. She has long been a favorite in Providence.

Madame Elisabeth van Endert, a most beautiful woman and a lyric sopran great beauty of voice and skill of s ing, will appear here for the first t This will be her third season in Ame in which time she has had many conc with the Boston Symphony, always great success.

The two men appearing on the list on a par with the women. Ernest S ling, a distinguished American pi and a most distinguished composer appear in the two-fold capacity of poser and pianist, for he will pla own Symphonic Variations for Pian Orchestra which he has just comp and which he is to play in a dozen certs with the Boston Symphony Or tra next winter.

The last name on the list, Josef, kin, is a Russian, who up to the outbreak of the war had been a resident of Berlin. There he was regarded as the foremost 'cellist of Germany. When the war broke out it became a case with him of either a concentration camp or America. Naturally he chose the latter and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fortunate enough to secure his services as one of its leading 'cellists. His appearance in Boston with the orchestra last year was nothing short of a sensation.

The general sale of subscription tickets for these concerts opens at Seddon's news stand, Butler exchange, Monday morning, Oct. 11.

From EVENING POST

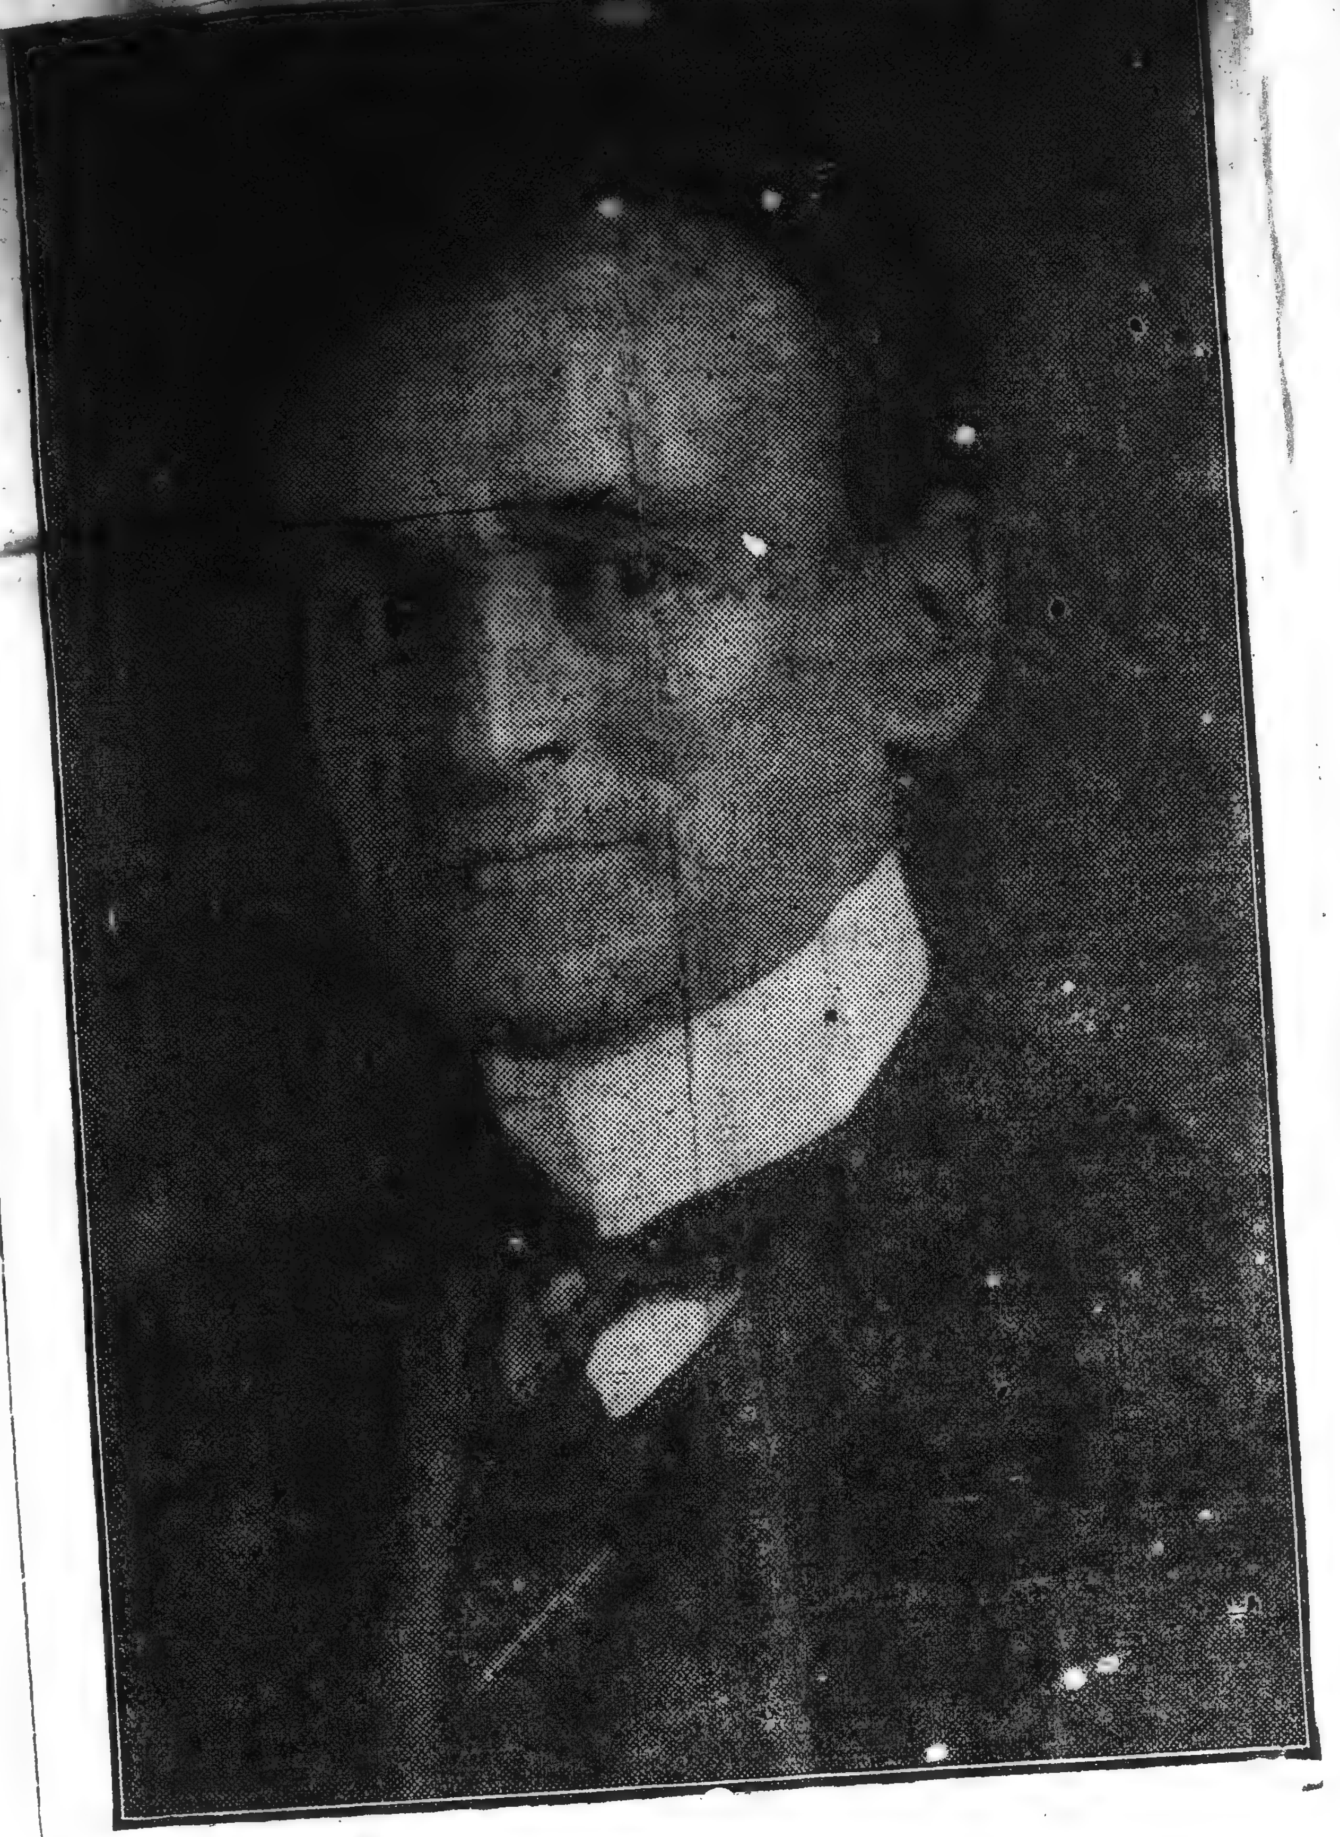
Address: New York City

Date

1884

First Programme of Boston Orchestra

DR. KARL MUCK has already arranged the programmes for the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Thursday evening, November 4, and Saturday afternoon, November 6. Thursday evening he will play Brahms's Symphony in E minor, and Schumann's overture "Manfred;" Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorák's overture "Husitska." Saturday afternoon he will play the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye;" Loeffler's, "The Death of Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Préludes."



DR. KARL MUCK

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Will Appear in a Series of Concerts in Infantry Hall This Season.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

Established:

MUSICAL MENTION

Unusual activity now exists in local musical circles with the opening of the musical season now less than two weeks away, and music lovers are keenly alive to the exceptional opportunities which the forthcoming season will offer. The several music clubs are also shortly to open their seasons with attractive programmes, and altogether there will be little cause for complaint on the part of the pessimists that Providence is not a musical city.

The De Luxe concert series, under the direction of Mrs. Hall-Whytock, will open in the Elks' auditorium, on Washington street, with the song recital by Schumann-Heink on the afternoon of Oct. 28. The list of hostesses for the various concerts appear in another column.

The six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Providence the coming winter hold promise of unusual attractiveness, for in addition to the orchestra which Providence has known and admired for so many years the soloists who are announced are of most unusual quality.

Acording to the prospectus of the orchestra just published, the six concerts will be given as usual, Thues evenings in Infantry Hall. Their dates are October 18, November 23, December 28, February 8, March 7 and April 11. The soloists engaged are Madame Melba, Laeta Hartley, Madame Homer, Madame van Endert, Ernest Schelling and Josef Malkin.

The orchestra returns this year with practically unchanged personnel. It brings with it also the tremendous increase of reputation and influence, which was the direct result of the remarkable series of concerts it gave last spring at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco, when it gave 13 Symphony concerts in as many days to a total paid attendance of over 45,000.

The names of the soloists themselves will carry much weight with the Providence public. Madame Melba, who has been engaged for the first concert, is today, as she has been since the beginning of her public career, the foremost lyric and coloratura soprano of the world. The passing years seem not to have affected in the least the golden beauty of her voice and her marvellous trill is still as fresh as that of a girl.

Laeta Hartley, the soloist at the second concert, is an American woman and may be called one of the foremost woman pianists in the world. This is all the more significant in that her whole training was had in this country. Her appearance a year ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was so successful that she was engaged for the several concerts the coming season.

Madame Louise Homer, like Miss Hartley, is an American woman, American trained, and most of her career has been in this country. Her wonderful contralto voice has won for her a large public from coast to coast and in opera and in concert she has no superior. She has long been a favorite in Providence.

Madame Elisabeth van Endert, a most beautiful woman and a lyric soprano of great beauty of voice and skill of singing, will appear her for the first time. This will be her third season in America, which time she has had many concerts with the Boston Symphony, always with success.

The two men appearing on the list are on a par with the women. Ernest Schelling, a distinguished American pianist and a most distinguished composer will appear in the two-fold capacity of composer and pianist, for he will play his own "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra" which he has just completed and which he is to play in a dozen concerts with the Boston Orchestra next winter.

The last name on the list, Josef Malkin, is a Russian, who up to the outbreak of the war had been a resident of Berlin. There he was regarded as the foremost 'cellist of Germany. When the war broke out it became a case with him of either a concentration camp or America. Naturally he chose the latter and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fortunate enough to secure his services as one of its leading 'cellists. His appearance in Boston with the orchestra last year was nothing short of a sensation.

The general sale of subscription tickets for these concerts opens at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange, to-morrow morning, Oct. 11.

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON IS OPENED

Packed House Greets Orchestra Starting 35th Year Here.

MADAME MELBA IS SOLOIST

Encored Many Times by Audience, Which Extends Warm Welcome to Musicians.—Few Changes in Personnel of Body Under Dr. Muck.

For its 35th season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to this city last evening, and it needs no further proof that it was welcome than the statement that every seat was filled, even to the accommodation afforded by the stairways leading to the balcony. The welcome was of the sort one accords to an old friend who comes regularly; not vociferous nor over demonstrative, but sincere and quietly cordial, without extraordinary enthusiasm, either at the beginninig or the end of the concert.

Mme. Melba as soloist was potent to assist in attracting the unusually large audience, and she received her full share of the applause, which recalled her again and again after she had left the stage each time.

Fewer changes than usual are to be noted in the personnel of the orchestra, which but for a half-dozen names, remains the same as last year. Dr. Muck, too, has apparently returned the same; imperturbable, serene, absorbed in his work and playing upon the units of his instrument, with undiminished mastery, expressing through them his interpretation of the will of the composer.

Remaining unchanged and to be again regretfully mentioned as doing much to mar the enjoyment of a vast number of persons, are the insistent lights which beat fiercely down, undimmed by any pretence of screen, and many a head nodded, not to mention the yawns, from the paralyzing glare, which it would take so little to remedy.

On the other hand a feature worthy of mention is the fact that notwithstanding the size of the audience, there were fewer late arrivals, and fewer early departures than usual, and the programme flowed smoothly along to its close, in the following order:

Beethoven...Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Handel..
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderator."
(Flute Obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)

Rimsky-Korsakoff...........................
..........Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)

Mozart...
..Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
"Porgi Amor."
"Voi Che sapete."

Wagner...
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Beethoven's symphonies find their way to the concert programm of the orchestra oftener than those of any other composer, a restrospective glance showing three Beethoven symphonies in the 12 concerts of the past two seasons, with the other nine concerts distributed among as many other composers, and yet it is over five years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fidler played the Fifth Symphony in C-minor here, at the April concert in 1910.

It was a welcome presentation last evening, played in masterly fashion under the direction of a master mind. Critics pronounce the C-minor symphony the most human in its qualities of the nine symphonies written by Beethoven, and most of them, following a clue suggested by the composer, agree that it pictures the struggle of the individual with Fate. Be that as it may, each listener must interpret the music to his own needs, and few could fail to appreciate the extreme beauty of the second movement as played last evening. Coming as it did after the tempestuous struggle of the first movement, the pleaceful, elevating harmony of the andante con moto was an impressive reality.

Its characteristics, suggestive of those of similar movements in the Second and Seventh symphonies, must have impressed themselves upon the least musical, as the various instruments wove their melodies against the deep harmony of the 'celli and basses with their plectoral vibrations, or the violins provided a lighter background for the melody played by the 'celli. It was a noteworthy performance in spite of the climatic drawback resulting in an occasional broken string or imperfect quality of tone, notably in the drums.

The Fifth Symphony, the most powerful in sound which had been produced up to the time it was written over a century ago, will hold its own with many a modern rival in that quality, and is interesting from a historical point of view, affording the first appearance of trombones in symphony.

Of the other numbers by the orchestra, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was heard here less than two years ago. It is full of color, and its barbaric beauty received adequate treatment, that transmuted the instruments with a magician's wand till they sounded like the gpysy tambourines they represented.

To those who welcomed Mme. Melba as an old friend, and to those who heard her for the first time, her voice gave great pleasure, and if those who had never heard her before lacked something of what old admirers still found in her voice her art was in itself a revelation.

The "golden voice" of Mme. Melba has been famed for the past three decades and there are few singers with whom the years have dealt so kindly, either in [illegible]

NEWS

From

Address Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 9 - 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Providence the coming winter hold promise of universal attractiveness, for in addition to the Orchestra which Providence has known and admired for so many years, the soloists who are announced are of most unusual quality.

According to the prospectus of the orchestra just published, the six concerts will be given as usual Tuesday evening in Infantry hall. Their dates are October 18; November 23; December 28; February 8; March 7 and April 11. The soloists engaged are Madame Melba, Laeta Hartley; Madame Homer, Madame van Endert, Ernest Schelling and Josef Malkin.

The orchestra returns this year with practically unchanged personnel. It brings with it also the tremendous increase of reputation and influence, which was the direct result of the remarkable series of concerts it gave last spring at the Panama Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco, when it gave thirteen Symphony concerts in as many days to a total paid attendance of over 45,000.

The names of the soloists themselves will carry much weight with the Providence public. Madame Melba, who has been engaged for the first concert is today as she has been since the beginning of her public career, the foremost lyric and coloratura soprano of the world. The passing years seem not to have affected in the least the golden beauty of her voice and her marvelous thrill is still as fresh as that of a girl.

Laeta Hartley, the soloist at the second concert is an American woman and may be called one of the foremost women pianists in the world. This is all the more significant in that her whole training was had in this country. Her appearance a year ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was so successful that she was engaged for the several concerts the coming season.

Madame Louise Homer, like Miss Hartley, is an American woman, American trained and most of her career has been in this country. Her wonderful contralto voice has won for her a large public from coast to coast, and in opera and in concert she has no superior. She has long been a favorite in Providence.

Madame Elisabeth van Endert, a most beautiful woman and a lyric soprano of great beauty of voice and skill of singing, will appear here for the first time. This will be her third season in America, in which time she has had many concerts with the Boston Symphony, always with great success.

The two men appearing on the list are on a par with the women. Ernest Schelling, a distinguished American pianist and a most distinguished composer will appear in the two-fold capacity of composer and pianist, for he will play his own Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra which he has just completed, and which he is to play in a dozen concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next winter.

The last name on the list, Josef Malkin, is a Russian, who up to the outbreak of the war had been a resident of Berlin. There he was regarded as the foremost 'cellist of Germany. When the war broke out it became a case with him of either a concentration camp or America. Naturally he chose the latter and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fortunate enough to secure his services as one of its leading 'cellists. His appearance in Boston with the orchestra last year was nothing short of a sensation.

The general sale of subscription tickets for these concerts opens at Seddon's news stand, Butler exchange, Monday morning, Oct. 11.

From EVENING POST

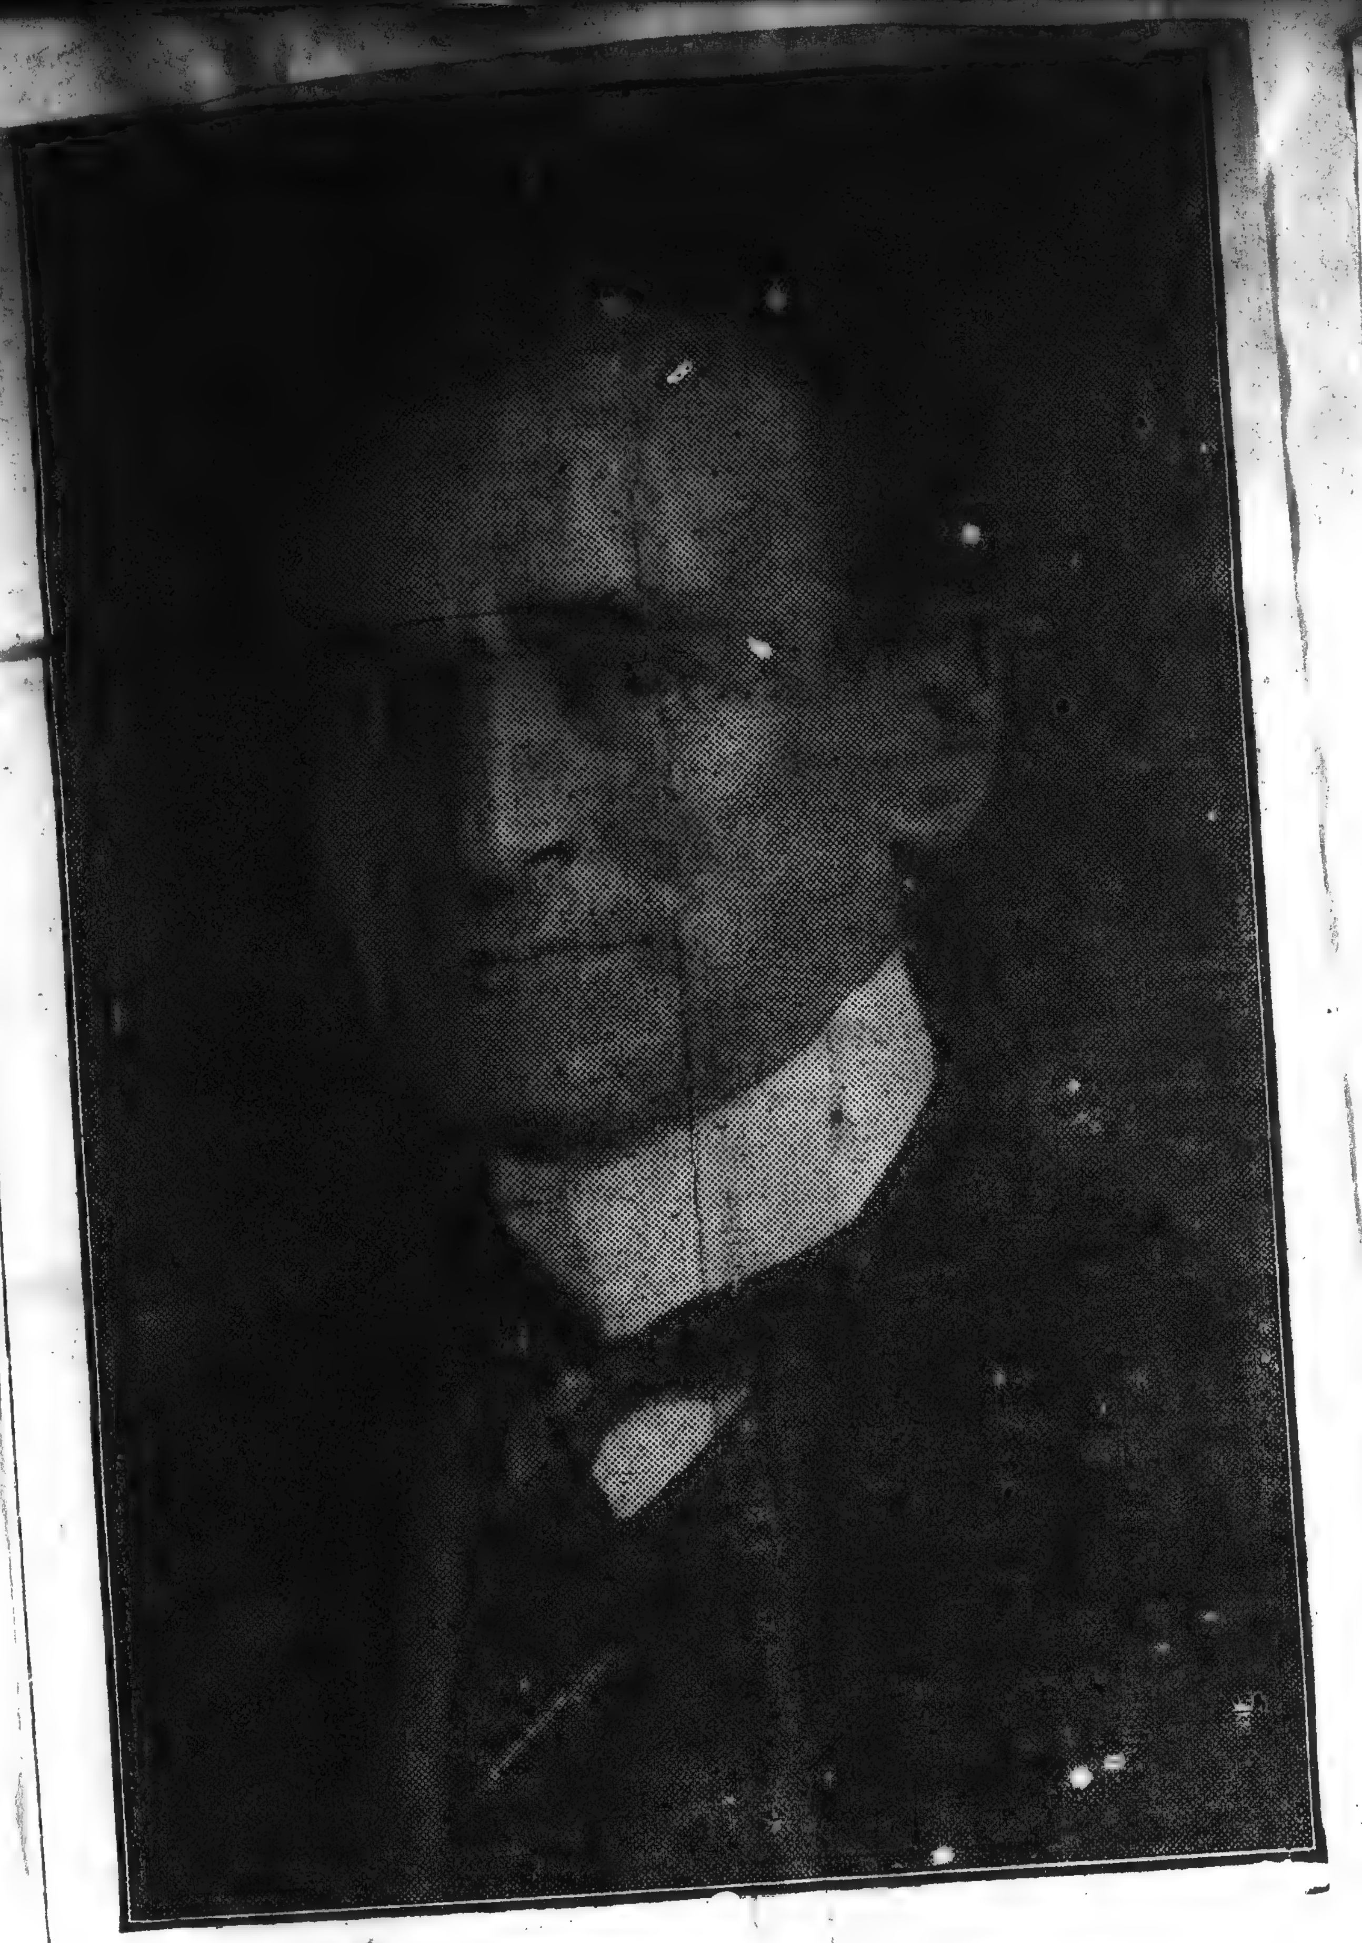
Address: New York City

Date OCT 23 1915

First Programme of Boston Orchestra

DR. KARL MUCK has already arranged the programmes for the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Thursday evening, November 4, and Saturday afternoon, November 6. Thursday evening he will play Brahms's Symphony in E minor, and Schumann's overture "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorák's overture "Husitska." Saturday afternoon he will play the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven; Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye;" Loeffler's, "The Death of Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Préludes."

1884



DR. KARL MUCK

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Will Appear in a Series of Concerts in Infantry Hall This Season.

---

ence, R. I.

MUSICAL MENTION

Unusual activity now exists in local musical circles with the opening of the musical season now less than two weeks away, and music lovers are keenly alive to the exceptional opportunities which the forthcoming season will offer. The several music clubs are also shortly to open their seasons with attractive programmes, and altogether there will be little cause for complaint on the part of the pessimists that Providence is not a musical city.

The De Luxe concert series, under the direction of Mrs. Hall-Whytock, will open in the Elks' auditorium, on Washington street, with the song recital by Schumann-Heink on the afternoon of Oct. 28. The list of hostesses for the various concerts appear in another column.

The six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Providence the coming winter hold promise of unusual attractiveness, for in addition to the orchestra which Providence has known and admired for so many years the soloists who are announced are of most unusual quality.

Acording to the prospectus of the orchestra just published, the six concerts will be given as usual, Thues evenings in Infantry Hall. Their dates are October 18, November 23, December 28, February 8, March 7 and April 11. The soloists engaged are Madame Melba, Laeta Hartley, Madame Homer, Madame van Endert, Ernest Schelling and Josef Malkin.

The orchestra returns this year with practically unchanged personnel. It brings with it also the tremendous increase of reputation and influence, which was the direct result of the remarkable series of concerts it gave last spring at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco, when it gave 13 Symphony concerts in as many days to a total paid attendance of over 45,000.

The names of the soloists themselves will carry much weight with the Providence public. Madame Melba, who has been engaged for the first concert, is today, as she has been since the beginning of her public career, the foremost lyric and coloratura soprano of the world. The passing years seem not to have affected in the least the golden beauty of her voice and her marvellous trill is still as fresh as that of a girl.

Laeta Hartley, the soloist at the second concert, is an American woman and may be called one of the foremost woman pianists in the world. This is all the more significant in that her whole training was had in this country. Her appearance a year ago with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was so successful that she was engaged for the several concerts the coming season.

Madame Louise Homer, like Miss Hartley, is an American woman, American trained, and most of her career has been in this country. Her wonderful contralto voice has won for her a large public from coast to coast and in opera and in concert she has no superior. She has long been a favorite in Providence.

Madame Elisabeth van Endert, a most beautiful woman and a lyric soprano of great beauty of voice and skill of singing, will appear her for the first time. This will be her third season in America, which time she has had many concerts with the Boston Symphony, always with success.

The two men appearing on the list are on a par with the women. Ernest Schelling, a distinguished American pianist and a most distinguished composer will appear in the two-fold capacity of composer and pianist, for he will play his own "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra" which he has just completed and which he is to play in a dozen concerts with the Boston Orchestra next winter.

The last name on the list, Josef Malkin, is a Russian, who up to the outbreak of the war had been a resident of Berlin. There he was regarded as the foremost 'cellist of Germany. When the war broke out it became a case with him of either a concentration camp or America. Naturally, he chose the latter and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fortunate enough to secure his services as one of its leading 'cellists. His appearance in Boston with the orchestra last year was nothing short of a sensation.

The general sale of subscription tickets for these concerts opens at Seddon's newsstand, Butler Exchange, tomorrow morning, Oct. 11.

Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON IS OPENED

Packed House Greets Orchestra Starting 35th Year Here.

MADAME MELBA IS SOLOIST

Encored Many Times by Audience, Which Extends Warm Welcome to Musicians—Few Changes in Personnel of Body Under Dr. Muck.

For its 35th season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to this city last evening, and it needs no further proof that it was welcome than the statement that every seat was filled, even to the accommodation afforded by the stairways leading to the balcony. The welcome was of the sort one accords to an old friend who comes regularly; not vociferous nor over demonstrative, but sincere and quietly cordial, without extraordinary enthusiasm, either at the beginninig or the end of the concert.

Mme. Melba as soloist was potent to assist in attracting the unusually large audience, and she received her full share of the applause, which recalled her again and again after she had left the stage each time.

Fewer changes than usual are to be noted in the personnel of the orchestra, which but for a half-dozen names, remains the same as last year. Dr. Muck, too, has apparently returned the same; imperturbable, serene, absorbed in his work and playing upon the units of his instrument, with undiminished mastery, expressing through them his interpretation of the will of the composer.

Remaining unchanged and to be again regretfully mentioned as doing much to mar the enjoyment of a vast number of persons, are the insistent lights which beat fiercely down, undimmed by any pretence of screen, and many a head nodded, not to mention the yawns, from the paralyzing glare, which it would take so little to remedy.

On the other hand a feature worthy of mention is the fact that notwithstanding the size of the audience, there were fewer late arrivals, and fewer early departures than usual, and the programme flowed smoothly along to its close, in the following order:

Beethoven...Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: Trio.
IV. Allegro.

Handel..
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderator."
(Flute Obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)

Rimsky-Korsakoff..................................
..........Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)

Mozart..
..Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
"Porgi Amor."
"Voi Che sapete."

Wagner..
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Beethoven's symphonies find their way to the concert programm of the orchestra oftener than those of any other composer, a restrospective glance showing three Beethoven symphonies in the 12 concerts of the past two seasons, with the other nine concerts distributed among as many other composers, and yet it is over five years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fidler played the Fifth Symphony in C-minor here, at the April concert in 1910.

It was a welcome presentation last evening, played in masterly fashion under the direction of a master mind. Critics pronounce the C-minor symphony the most human in its qualities of the nine symphonies written by Beethoven, and most of them, following a clue suggested by the composer, agree that it pictures the struggle of the individual with Fate. Be that as it may, each listener must interpret the music to his own needs, and few could fail to appreciate the extreme beauty of the second movement as played last evening. Coming as it did after the tempestuous struggle of the first movement, the pleaceful, elevating harmony of the andante con moto was an impressive reality.

Its characteristics, suggestive of those of similar movements in the Second and Seventh symphonies, must have impressed themselves upon the least musical, as the various instruments wove their melodies against the deep harmony of the 'celli and basses with their plectoral vibrations, or the violins provided a lighter background for the melody played by the 'celli. It was a noteworthy performance in spite of the climatic drawback resulting in an occasional broken string or imperfect quality of tone, notably in the drums.

The Fifth Symphony, the most powerful in sound which had been produced up to the time it was written over a century ago, will hold its own with many a modern rival in that quality, and is interesting from a historical point of view, affording the first appearance of trombones in symphony.

Of the other numbers by the orchestra, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was heard here less than two years ago. It is full of color, and its barbaric beauty received adequate treatment, that transmuted the instruments with a magician's wand till they sounded like the gpysy tambourines they represented.

To those who welcomed Mme. Melba as an old friend, and to those who heard her for the first time, her voice gave great pleasure, and if those who had never heard her before lacked something of what old admirers still found in her voice, her art was in itself a revelation.

The "golden voice" of Mme. Melba has been famed for the past three decades and there are few singers with whom the years have dealt so [illegible] either in her extreme upper notes, or stolen something from the volume of her lower notes it has left her other beautiful quality of tone, and all the mastery of her art that keeps her one of the most prominent figures in the musical world.

What could her audience have asked more than she gave in her solos, of which to many, the most soul-satisfying was Mozart's Canzona, "Voi, Che Sapete" from "Le Nozzi di Figaro"? Again and again they called her back to the stage and demonstrated their approval, till she would no longer appear, and the orchestra was permitted to finish the programme with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The second concert will be given on Nov. 23, when the soloist will be Laeta Hartley, pianist. A. W. C.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 28,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AN OLD CONTROVERSY ONCE MORE RENEWED

Long Versus Short Programmes at the Symphony Concerts—The Side of the Clock and the Opposite and More Important Sides—More of "Daphnis and Chloe"—Mme. Powell's Mission to the Gentiles—Items and Opinions

EARLIER than usual the annual debate over the duration and the ordering of the programmes at the Symphony Concerts has begun and quite as certainly as usual it bids fair to lead nowhere. Between them, Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck have lengthened the concerts so that ordinarily they continue for two hours, less ten minutes and sometimes fifteen, for the intermission; at least five spent in applause for the orchestra and the "assisting artists"; and five or ten more for the grace allowed late comers and early goers. In all, the audience now actually hears music for an hour and a half, whereas under the vanished dispensation of Mr. Gericke, it heard it for little more than an hour. Ninety minutes, the objectors say, is the longest possible time that human beings can be receptive to music; and ninety minutes happens to be almost exactly the time during which they actually listen to music in what they call a "two-hour concert." However, that merely incidental fact, as all know that have had experience of such controversies, is neither here nor there.

The reasons that prompted Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler to the lengthening of the programmes—semi-unconscious process as it undoubtedly was—speak for themselves. If a conductor must limit the actual performance of music in a concert to one hour and a little more, he has scant room for the careful composition of his prog by any other standard than the clo can give it neither continuity nor c in such measure as he justly desi even in twenty-four pairs of conce can include far fewer pieces th should, if he is to keep the re catholic and alive and gratify the di likings of his hearers. The worl nowadays two hours is the usual le symphony concerts. In London
Paris, it is usually more.

Again, both conductors were awa an appreciable part of their audien in no small measure that part of which the future life of the Sy Concerts depends—prefers the t programme, so long as it is interesti temper of the reviewers in these ma
no test whatever. The "traditions" of their trade ordain that they shall quit a concert at the earliest possible moment—usually well before it has ended—and that they shall profess the uttermost boredom over the hearing of music. No more of a criterion is the mood of those whose presence at the Symphony Concerts is merely a weekly rite. They can come as late and depart as early as they are minded to do without let or hindrance. The real public to be considered are those eager, absorbed, stirred, and usually youthful auditors to whom the taking of a ticket for a series of Symphony Concerts means considerable expenditure and often harsh economies; to whom such performances as they now hear from conductor and orchestra are revelation of the beauty and power of music and of men with it; and whose ears and sensations are open equally to the old and the new. Much more than any elect matrons or weary reviewers, these unobtrusive folk hold the future of the Symphony Concerts in their hands; and it is they whose emotion and illusion, whose pleasure and satisfaction are the great reward of them. These humble listeners—the listeners for whom Mr. Higginson has finely said he most cares—do not complain of long programmes. No greater misfortune could befall the Symphony Concerts than to become concerts of, by, and for the elderly. They must renew their youth in the youth of their audiences, and must cultivate that youth accordingly.

Again—and what is most to the point in these controversies—the length of a programme by the clock is no test of the strain it lays upon the attention of the audience. That strain depends upon the nature of the pieces and the performance and the mental and the emotional repose of the hearers to both. It so happened that Enesco's new symphony, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem of Tintagiles and Ravel's subtle ballet-music, a week ago, made "hard listening" and exhausted many an emotional sensibility Hence the outcry over the length of the programme, especially when Dvořák's "Huritzka" overture was added to it. Now, as a matter of fact, it was shorter by nearly a quarter of an hour than the programme of the preceding week, almost universally applauded as uncommonly interesting and plausible. The first programme merely laid less strain upon the receptive faculties of the audience and brought many in it more enjoyment. From no point of view, either on the stage or in the auditorium, can the clock be a hard-and-fast dictator of programmes. Nor should the grumblers forget that the conductor and the orchestra are under strain as well. Such a performance as that of Enesco's symphony or of Loeffler's "Tintagiles" last Saturday "takes it out" of conductor and players beyond the remotest notion of most of those who protested their fatigue. H. T. P.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

E 1884

MUSIC NOTES

WITH the first of the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give here this winter, the season of music in this city was brilliantly opened on Tuesday evening, an event which was followed on Friday by the first of the six afternoon concerts in the De Luxe Series. Between these two concerts came the opening meetings of the two largest musical clubs, which were especially noteworthy in the records of such events, making the week one of remarkable importance.

In marked contrast, the week to come is devoid of all musical interest except for the regular popular Sunday concert. From that on, however, there will not be a week, with the exception of that immediately preceding Christmas, in which there will not be one or more concerts of exceptional value until the middle of February. So far, March and April have only their alternate weeks marked by concert dates, while the last of such events is scheduled for the first week in May.

Between now and February, however, there is plenty of time for any number of plans to materialize for a supplementary season. What is of present paramount concern is the continuous procession of musical events of a high standard that has entered upon its course. Few years here have ever seen the like, and the right of Providence to occupy a place upon the musical map is not to be denied.

The first announcement of any local concert for a philanthropic purpose has been made and others are likely to follow as the weeks go on, since the spirit of the musical clubs in this city is to respond to calls for help.

* * *

From

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Establis

MELBA SOLOIST AT FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Soprano Encored Many Times by Audience, Which Extends Warm Welcome to Musicians.—Few Changes in Membership of Orchestra.

For its 35th season the Bocton Symphony Orchestra returned to this city last evening, and it needs no further proof that it was welcome than the statement that every seat in Infantry Hall was filled, even to the accommodation afforded by the stairways leading to the balcony. The welcome was of the sort one accords to an old friend who comes regularly; not vociferous nor over demonstrative, but sincere and quietly cordial, without extraordinary enthusiasm, either at the beginning or the end of the concert.

Mme. Melba as soloist was potent to assist in attracting the unusually large audience, and she received her full share of the applause, which recalled her again and again after she had left the stage each time.

Fewer changes than usual are to be noted in the personnel of the orchestra, which but for a half-dozen names, remains the same as last year. Dr. Muck, too, has apparently returned the same; imperturbable, serene, absorbed in his work and playing upon the units of his instrument, with undiminished mastery, expressing through them his interpretation of the will of the composer.

Remaining unchanged and to be again regretfully mentioned as doing much to mar the enjoyment of a vast number of persons, are the insistent lights which beat fiercely down, undimmed by any pretence of screen, and many a head nodded, not to mention the yawns, from the paralyzing glare, which it would take so little to remedy.

On the other hand a feature worthy of mention is the fact that notwithstanding the size of the audience, there were fewer late arrivals, and fewer early [illegible]

Beethoven...Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: Trio.
IV. Allegro.
Handel......
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderator."
(Flute Obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)
Rimsky-Korsakoff......
......Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)
Mozart......
..Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
"Porgi Amor."
"Voi Che sapete."
Wagner......
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Beethoven's symphonies find their way to the varied programme of the orchestra oftener than those of any other composer, a restrospective glance showing three Beethoven symphonies in the 12 concerts of the past two seasons, with the other nine concerts distributed among as many other composers, and yet it is over five years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler played the Fifth Symphony in C-minor here, at the April concert in 1910.

It was a welcome presentation last evening, played in masterly fashion under the direction of a master mind. Critics pronounce the C-minor symphony the most human in its qualities of the nine symphonies written by Beethoven, and most of them, following a clue suggested by the composer, agree that it pictures the struggle of the individual with Fate Be that as it may, each listener must interpret the music to his own needs, and few could fail to appreciate the extreme beauty of the second movement as played last evening. Coming as it did after the tempestuous struggle of the first movement, the pleaceful, elevating harmony of the andante con moto was an impressive reality.

Its characteristics, suggestive of those of similar movements in the Second and Seventh symphonies, must have impressed themselves upon the least musical, as the various instruments wove their melodies against the deep harmony of the 'celli and basses with their piecoral vibrations, or the violins provided a lighter background for the melody played by the 'celli. It was a noteworthy performance in spite of the climatic drawback resulting in an occasional broken string or imperfect quality of tone, notably in the drums.

The Fifth Symphony, the most powerful in sound which had been produced up to the time it was written over a century ago, will hold its own with many a modern rival in that quality, and is interesting from a historical point of view as affording the first appearance of trombones in symphony.

Of the other numbers by the orchestra, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was heard here less than two years ago. It is full of color, and its barbaric beauty received adequate treatment, that transmuted the instruments with a magician's wand till they sounded like the gpysy tambourines they represented.

To those who welcomed Mme. Melba as an old friend, and to those who heard her for the first time, her voice gave great pleasure, and if those who had never heard her before lacked something of what old admirers still found in her voice, her art was in itself a revelation.

The "golden voice" of Mme. Melba has been famed for the past three decades and there are few singers with whom the years have dealt so kindly, either in voice or appearance. If time has of necessity taken toll of the brilliancy of her extreme upper notes, or stolen something from the volume of her lower notes it has left her other beautiful quality of tone, and all the mastery of her art that keeps her one of the most prominent figures in the musical world.

What could her audience have asked more than she gave in her solos, Mr. Maquarre sharing the honors with her in the first by his beautiful flute obligato, which was the performance of a virtuoso. To many, Mme. Melba's most soul-satisfying solo was Mozart's Canzona, "Voi, Che Sapete" from "Le Nozzi di Figaro"? Again and again they called her back to the stage and demonstrated their approval until she would no longer appear, and the orchestra was permitted to finish the programme with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The second concert will be given on Nov. 23, when the soloist will be Laeta Hartley, pianist. A. W. C.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ROMANTIC BRAHMS AND CLASSIC CHOPIN

Music That Disclosed an Overlooked Side in Both Composers — Dr. Muck's Large Share in the Revelation—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Does His Part Also in the Reanimated Concerto — The Contrasts of Two Overtures

WHEN Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra played the first symphony of Brahms in Chicago the other day, some in the audience repined under the conductor's reading of the music. In their view, it was too subdued; it lacked the high emotional pitch to which they were accustomed; it wanted vivid strokes—all of which complaints may sound strangely in Bostonian ears, wont to believe that Dr. Muck's version of this symphony in C minor is remarkably eloquent and even dramatic. Of course, it is the fashion, nowadays, of almost every conductor to let loose his temperament upon the music of Brahms, as it was the way of almost every conductor fifteen or twenty years ago to repress that temperament whenever he opened a score of the great Johannes, apostle to the Gentiles to redeem them from an obsession of romantic music. Extremes are extremes at whichever end of the scale they happen to stand, and to set forth a [illegible]

mathematics and not music is to do it only a little more injustice than to discover and produce an effect in every other period. There is not a doubt that Brahms, listening across the Elysian fields to the sounds that rise from terrestrial concert-rooms, squares his sturdy shoulders in alarmed surprise when he hears one and another of his symphonies dramatized in the current fashion, as he used to stride indignantly away when he heard it reduced to a calculated pattern in tones that ought to end with the Q. E. D. of problems in geometry.

Somewhere between these extremes lies the mean of performance that neither deadens nor dramatizes the symphonies of Brahms; but makes them sound with characteristic voice and just eloquence. The music of Brahms is not dramatic as Liszt's, for example, or Berlioz's is. On the other hand, it is romantic, as Schumann's or even Mendelssohn's is in the generation of composers immediately preceding him. It is the hearer's instinct to associate romantic music with large, strenuous, vivid and sometimes actually flamboyant utterance. When it is in question, the ways of Weber, of Berlioz, of Liszt, of Tschaikovsky come spontaneously to mind. But it is quite possible for a composer to write romantic music and to keep to the relatively low intensities of Brahms's symphonic voice. Romantic music is such when it touches the imagination by the vistas that it opens; when it stirs the heart by the heights and the depths of feeling that it evokes; and when it fascinates ear and fancy by the new and strange beauties that it summons.

Brahms's first symphony does one and another of these things in the vivid transitional passage marshalled by the songful horns that leads into the Finale; in the mounting tumults of that Finale itself; in the recurring stress of the first movement; in the moody mystery of the slow division. Brahms's fourth symphony, played anew at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, does also one and another of these things in the returning melody that the first Allegro projects upon the hearers' ears; in the song that rises from 'celli and horns in the ensuing Andante; in the large tonal sport of the Scherzo; and perhaps in the measured and expressive march of the Finale through and in spite of the intricacies of the ancient form which Brahms chose for it. But for the romantic substance of these two symphonies—to go no farther in citation—Brahms's actual utterance is relatively low of pitch and subdued of color. It keeps romantic quality and accomplishment by virtue of a fine, rather than a large, intensity playing upon attuned ears; and if it sometimes flags and dries into music-making that shall fill periods and round out forms, be it remembered that unevenness and lapses pass almost for virtues with the more flamboyant and full-voiced romantics and the admirers of them.

No attributes more stamp Dr. Muck as a remarkable conductor than his sense of the distinctive voice of each composer and of the informing qualities of the music in hand. With it goes equal ability to impart both, quickened and illumined, to his hearers. Thus, in the symphony of yesterday, as in the symphony that Chicago heard mistrusting the performance, Brahms's music sounds romantic under his hand, yet keeps to its low pitch and fine intensities unless, being human, the composer "breaks loose" in the rhythmic stride and the upsweeping sonorities of the finale of the first symphony or in the robust revelling of the Scherzo of the fourth. Romantic beauty, stress and imagination rose on Friday afternoon out of the first Allegro; the swaying motion, the elastic rhythm, the broad progression, the murmured phrases; the latent or the outspoken energy of the whole all served them at the conductor's will. He seemed almost to humor Brahms when the composer is taking his familiar delight in plucked strings, in the songfulness of horns, in the dark tones of clarinets. As understandingly and as adroitly the conductor missed not a tint of Brahms's harmonic and instrumental color. Admittedly, it is a measured color, albeit more skilfully and imaginatively distributed than in many another of Brahms's orchestral pieces, but being such it accords better with a symphony that throughout is measured intensity of matter and feeling. The slow section sounded in like romantic beauty—the beauty that may be still but that yet haunts—and upon it Dr. Muck bestowed a wealth of quiet inflection and the players a wealth of tonal loveliness. In both their voices were the romantic strangeness, the romantic insistence, of the music.

Even Chicago might not doubt the large power and the bold sweep of the Scherzo as Dr. Muck and the orchestra played it. They would have it sound as though Brahms, for once forgetting measure, was gathering up his music in mind and imagination and then flinging it upon players and hearers as in exultant sport. Yet here and there, as contrast bade, the smoothest of euphonies tempered these tonal ardors. Finally, in that allegro "energico e passionato" in which Brahms would mask or melt his carefully built Chaconne, the conductor and the orchestra gave the composer the freest play with all his strokes—a favorite device of romantic music—upon the sensibilities of his hearers. Not a rolling drum beat, not a bite of the strings, not a whirl of flutes and wood winds, not a softening shadow from the horns, not a bold chord or a sweeping progression missed its effect. If the dry places in the symphony—and there are such—did not exactly blossom, conductor and band swept the hearer by so quickly and absorbedly that he hardly heeded. It is possible to be quietly as well as flamboyantly romantic. So Brahms's symphony sounded.

The foil to the romantic Brahms was the classic Chopin of the concerto in E minor, revived for the first time "at these concerts" in nine years. For there is a classic Chopin as truly as there is a romantic Brahms. The curious and the studious, as Mr. Huneker has lately been pointing out, may trace his sense of classical form and style even in the freest and most rhapsodic of his music. Perhaps in this concerto he is classic of matter and manner by necessity; but he is also so by no reluctant inclination. The purist may not complain of the formal exposition of the subject-matter necessity taken toll of the brilliancy of her extreme upper notes, or stolen something from the volume of her lower notes it has left her other beautiful quality of tone, and all the mastery of her art that keeps her one of the most prominent figures in the musical world.

What could her audience have asked more than she gave in her solos, of which to many, the most soul-satisfying was Mozart's Canzona, "Voi, Che Sapete" from "Le Nozzi di Figaro"? Again and again they called her back to the stage and demonstrated their approval, till she would no longer appear, and the orchestra was permitted to finish the programme with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The second concert will be given on Nov. 23, when the soloist will be Laeta Hartley, pianist. A. W. C.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 28,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AN OLD CONTROVERSY ONCE MORE RENEWED

Long Versus Short Programmes at the Symphony Concerts—The Side of the Clock and the Opposite and More Important Sides—More of "Daphnis and Chloe"—Mme. Powell's Mission to the Gentiles—Items and Opinions

EARLIER than usual the annual debate over the duration and the ordering of the programmes at the Symphony Concerts has begun and quite as certainly as usual it bids fair to lead nowhere. Between them, Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck have lengthened the concerts so that ordinarily they continue for two hours, less ten minutes and sometimes fifteen, for the intermission; at least five spent in applause for the orchestra and the "assisting artists"; and five or ten more for the grace allowed late comers and early goers. In all, the audience now actually hears music for an hour and a half, whereas under the vanished dispensation of Mr. Gericke, it heard it for little more than an hour. Ninety minutes, the objectors say, is the longest possible time that human beings can be receptive to music; and ninety minutes happens to be almost exactly the time during which they actually listen to music in what they call a "two-hour concert." However, that merely incidental fact, as all know that have had experience of such controversies, is neither here nor there.

The reasons that prompted Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler to the lengthening of the programmes—semi-unconscious process as it undoubtedly was—speak for themselves. If a conductor must limit the actual performance of music in a concert to one hour and a little more, he has scant room for the careful composition of his prog by any other standard than the clo can give it neither continuity nor c in such measure as he justly desi even in twenty-four pairs of conce can include far fewer pieces th should, if he is to keep the re catholic and alive and gratify the di likings of his hearers. The worl nowadays two hours is the usual le symphony concerts. In London Paris, it is usually more.

Again, both conductors were awa an appreciable part of their audier in no small measure that part of which the future life of the Sy Concerts depends—prefers the t programme, so long as it is interesti temper of the reviewers in these ma no test whatever. The "traditions" of their trade ordain that they shall quit a concert at the earliest possible moment—usually well before it has ended—and that they shall profess the uttermost boredom over the hearing of music. No more of a criterion is the mood of those whose presence at the Symphony Concerts is merely a weekly rite. They can come as late and depart as early as they are minded to do without let or hindrance. The real public to be considered are those eager, absorbed, stirred, and usually youthful auditors to whom the taking of a ticket for a series of Symphony Concerts means considerable expenditure and often harsh economies; to whom such performances as they now hear from conductor and orchestra are revelation of the beauty and power of music and of men with it; and whose ears and sensations are open equally to the old and the new. Much more than any elect matrons or weary reviewers, these unobtrusive folk hold the future of the Symphony Concerts in their hands; and it is they whose emotion and illusion, whose pleasure and satisfaction are the great reward of them. These humble listeners—the listeners for whom Mr. Higginson has finely said he most cares—do not complain of long programmes. No greater misfortune could befall the Symphony Concerts than to become concerts of, by, and for the elderly. They must renew their youth in the youth of their audiences, and must cultivate that youth accordingly.

Again—and what is most to the point in these controversies—the length of a programme by the clock is no test of the strain it lays upon the attention of the audience. That strain depends upon the nature of the pieces and the performance and the mental and the emotional repose of the hearers to both. It so happened that Enesco's new symphony, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem of Tintagiles and Ravel's subtle ballet-music, a week ago, made "hard listening" and exhausted many an emotional sensibility Hence the outcry over the length of the programme, especially when Dvorâk's "Huritzka" overture was added to it. Now, as a matter of fact, it was shorter by nearly a quarter of an hour than the programme of the preceding week, almost universally applauded as uncommonly interesting and plausible. The first programme merely laid less strain upon the receptive faculties of the audience and brought many in it more enjoyment. From no point of view, either on the stage or in the auditorium, can the clock be a hard-and-fast dictator of programmes. Nor should the grumblers forget that the conductor and the orchestra are under strain as well. Such a performance as that of Enesco's symphony or of Loeffler's "Tintagiles" last Saturday "takes it out" of conductor and players beyond the remotest notion of most of those who protested their fatigue. H. T. P.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

E 1884

MUSIC NOTES

WITH the first of the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give here this winter, the season of music in this city was brilliantly opened on Tuesday evening, an event which was followed on Friday by the first of the six afternoon concerts in the De Luxe Series. Between these two concerts came the opening meetings of the two largest musical clubs, which were especially noteworthy in the records of such events, making the week one of remarkable importance.

In marked contrast, the week to come is devoid of all musical interest except for the regular popular Sunday concert. From that on, however, there will not be a week, with the exception of that immediately preceding Christmas, in which there will not be one or more concerts of exceptional value until the middle of February. So far, March and April have only their alternate weeks marked by concert dates, while the last of such events is scheduled for the first week in May.

Between now and February, however, there is plenty of time for any number of plans to materialize for a supplementary season. What is of present paramount concern is the continuous procession of musical events of a high standard that has entered upon its course. Few years here have ever seen the like, and the right of Providence to occupy a place upon the musical map is not to be denied.

The first announcement of any local concert for a philanthropic purpose has been made and others are likely to follow as the weeks go on, since the spirit of the musical clubs in this city is to respond to calls for help.

From

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

Establis

MELBA SOLOIST AT FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Soprano Encored Many Times by Audience, Which Extends Warm Welcome to Musicians.—Few Changes in Membership of Orchestra.

For its 35th season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to this city last evening, and it needs no further proof that it was welcome than the statement that every seat in Infantry Hall was filled, even to the accommodation afforded by the stairways leading to the balcony. The welcome was of the sort one accords to an old friend who comes regularly; not vociferous nor over demonstrative, but sincere and quietly cordial, without extraordinary enthusiasm, either at the beginning or the end of the concert.

Mme. Melba as soloist was potent to assist in attracting the unusually large audience, and she received her full share of the applause, which recalled her again and again after she had left the stage each time.

Fewer changes than usual are to be noted in the personnel of the orchestra, which but for a half-dozen names, remains the same as last year. Dr. Muck, too, has apparently returned the same; imperturbable, serene, absorbed in his work and playing upon the units of his instrument, with undiminished mastery, expressing through them his interpretation of the will of the composer.

Remaining unchanged and to be again regretfully mentioned as doing much to mar the enjoyment of a vast number of persons, are the insistent lights which beat fiercely down, undimmed by any pretence of screen, and many a head nodded, not to mention the yawns, from the paralyzing glare, which it would take so little to remedy.

On the other hand a feature worthy of mention is the fact that notwithstanding the size of the audience, there were fewer late arrivals, and fewer early [illegible] and the [illegible] gram [illegible]

ing [illegible]

Beethoven..Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Handel..........................
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderator."
(Flute Obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)

Rimsky-Korsakoff..........
..........Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.

(Played without pause.)

Mozart..........................
..Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
"Porgi Amor."
"Voi Che sapete."

Wagner..........................
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Beethoven's symphonies find their way to the varied programme of the orchestra oftener than those of any other composer, a restrospective glance showing three Beethoven symphonies in the 12 concerts of the past two seasons, with the other nine concerts distributed among as many other composers, and yet it is over five years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler played the Fifth Symphony in C-minor here, at the April concert in 1910.

It was a welcome presentation last evening, played in masterly fashion under the direction of a master mind. Critics pronounce the C-minor symphony the most human in its qualities of the nine symphonies written by Beethoven, and most of them, following a clue suggested by the composer, agree that it pictures the struggle of the individual with Fate Be that as it may, each listener must interpret the music to his own needs, and few could fail to appreciate the extreme beauty of the second movement as played last evening. Coming as it did after the tempestuous struggle of the first movement, the pleaceful, elevating harmony of the andante con moto was an impressive reality.

Its characteristics, suggestive of those of similar movements in the Second and Seventh symphonies, must have impressed themselves upon the least musical, as the various instruments wove their melodies against the deep harmony of the 'celli and basses with their plecoral vibrations, or the violins provided a lighter background for the melody played by the 'celli. It was a noteworthy performance in spite of the climatic drawback resulting in an occasional broken string or imperfect quality of tone, notably in the drums.

The Fifth Symphony, the most powerful in sound which had been produced up to the time it was written over a century ago, will hold its own with many a modern rival in that quality, and is interesting from a historical point of view as affording the first appearance of trombones in symphony.

Of the other numbers by the orchestra, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was heard here less than two years ago. It is full of color, and its barbaric beauty received adequate treatment, that transmuted the instruments with a magician's wand till they sounded like the gpysy tambourines they represented.

To those who welcomed Mme. Melba as an old friend, and to those who heard her for the first time, her voice gave great pleasure, and if those who had never heard her before lacked something of what old admirers still found in her voice, her art was in itself a revelation.

The "golden voice" of Mme. Melba has been famed for the past three decades and there are few singers with whom the years have dealt so kindly, either in voice or appearance. If time has of necessity taken toll of the brilliancy of her extreme upper notes, or stolen something from the volume of her lower notes it has left her other beautiful quality of tone, and all the mastery of her art that keeps her one of the most prominent figures in the musical world.

What could her audience have asked more than she gave in her solos, Mr. Maquarre sharing the honors with her in the first by his beautiful flute obligato, which was the performance of a virtuoso. To many, Mme. Melba's most soul-satisfying solo was Mozart's Canzona, "Voi, Che Sapete" from "Le Nozzi di Figaro"? Again and again they called her back to the stage and demonstrated their approval until she would no longer appear, and the orchestra was permitted to finish the programme with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The second concert will be given on Nov. 23, when the soloist will be Laeta Hartley, pianist. A. W. C.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ROMANTIC BRAHMS AND CLASSIC CHOPIN

Music That Disclosed an Overlooked Side in Both Composers — Dr. Muck's Large Share in the Revelation—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Does His Part Also in the Reanimated Concerto — The Contrasts of Two Overtures

WHEN Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra played the first symphony of Brahms in Chicago the other day, some in the audience repined under the conductor's reading of the music. In their view, it was too subdued; it lacked the high emotional pitch to which they were accustomed; it wanted vivid strokes—all of which complaints may sound strangely in Bostonian ears, wont to believe that Dr. Muck's version of this symphony in C minor is remarkably eloquent and even dramatic. Of course, it is the fashion, nowadays, of almost every conductor to let loose his temperament upon the music of Brahms, as it was the way of almost every conductor fifteen or twenty years ago to repress that temperament whenever he opened a score of the great Johannes, apostle to the Gentiles to redeem them from an obsession of romantic music. Extremes are extremes at whichever end of the scale they happen to stand, and to set forth a mathematics and not music is to do it only a little more injustice than to discover and produce an effect in every other period. There is not a doubt that Brahms, listening across the Elysian fields to the sounds that rise from terrestrial concert-rooms, squares his sturdy shoulders in alarmed surprise when he hears one and another of his symphonies dramatized in the current fashion, as he used to stride indignantly away when he heard it reduced to a calculated pattern in tones that ought to end with the Q. E. D. of problems in geometry.

Somewhere between these extremes lies the mean of performance that neither deadens nor dramatizes the symphonies of Brahms; but makes them sound with characteristic voice and just eloquence. The music of Brahms is not dramatic as Liszt's, for example, or Berlioz's is. On the other hand, it is romantic, as Schumann's or even Mendelssohn's is in the generation of composers immediately preceding him. It is the hearer's instinct to associate romantic music with large, strenuous, vivid and sometimes actually flamboyant utterance. When it is in question, the ways of Weber, of Berlioz, of Liszt, of Tschaikovsky come spontaneously to mind. But it is quite possible for a composer to write romantic music and to keep to the relatively low intensities of Brahms's symphonic voice. Romantic music is such when it touches the imagination by the vistas that it opens; when it stirs the heart by the heights and the depths of feeling that it evokes; and when it fascinates ear and fancy by the new and strange beauties that it summons.

Brahms's first symphony does one and another of these things in the vivid transitional passage marshalled by the songful horns that leads into the Finale; in the mounting tumults of that Finale itself; in the recurring stress of the first movement; in the moody mystery of the slow division. Brahms's fourth symphony, played anew at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, does also one and another of these things in the returning melody that the first Allegro projects upon the hearers' ears; in the song that rises from 'celli and horns in the ensuing Andante; in the large tonal sport of the Scherzo; and perhaps in the measured and expressive march of the Finale through and in spite of the intricacies of the ancient form which Brahms chose for it. But for the romantic substance of these two symphonies—to go no farther in citation—Brahms's actual utterance is relatively low of pitch and subdued of color. It keeps romantic quality and accomplishment by virtue of a fine, rather than a large, intensity playing upon attuned ears; and if it sometimes flags and dries into music-making that shall fill periods and round out forms, be it remembered that unevenness and lapses pass almost for virtues with the more flamboyant and full-voiced romantics and the admirers of them.

No attributes more stamp Dr. Muck as a remarkable conductor than his sense of the distinctive voice of each composer and of the informing qualities of the music in hand. With it goes equal ability to impart both, quickened and illumined, to his hearers. Thus, in the symphony of yesterday, as in the symphony that Chicago heard mistrusting the performance, Brahms's music sounds romantic under his hand, yet keeps to its low pitch and fine intensities unless, being human, the composer "breaks loose" in the rhythmic stride and the upsweeping sonorities of the finale of the first symphony or in the robust revelling of the Scherzo of the fourth. Romantic beauty, stress and imagination rose on Friday afternoon out of the first Allegro; the swaying motion, the elastic rhythm, the broad progression, the murmured phrases; the latent or the outspoken energy of the whole all served them at the conductor's will. He seemed almost to humor Brahms when the composer is taking his familiar delight in plucked strings, in the songfulness of horns, in the dark tones of clarinets. As understandingly and as adroitly the conductor missed not a tint of Brahms's harmonic and instrumental color. Admittedly, it is a measured color, albeit more skilfully and imaginatively distributed than in many another of Brahms's orchestral pieces, but being such it accords better with a symphony that throughout is measured intensity of matter and feeling. The slow section sounded in like romantic beauty—the beauty that may be still but that yet haunts—and upon it Dr. Muck bestowed a wealth of quiet inflection and the players a wealth of tonal loveliness. In both their voices were the romantic strangeness, the romantic insistence, of the music.

Even Chicago might not doubt the large power and the bold sweep of the Scherzo as Dr. Muck and the orchestra played it. They would have it sound as though Brahms, for once forgetting measure, was gathering up his music in mind and imagination and then flinging it upon players and hearers as in exultant sport. Yet here and there, as contrast bade, the smoothest of euphonies tempered these tonal ardors. Finally, in that allegro "energico e passionato" in which Brahms would mask or melt his carefully built Chaconne, the conductor and the orchestra gave the composer the freest play with all his strokes—a favorite device of romantic music—upon the sensibilities of his hearers. Not a rolling drum beat, not a bite of the strings, not a whirl of flutes and wood winds, not a softening shadow from the horns, not a bold chord or a sweeping progression missed its effect. If the dry places in the symphony—and there are such—did not exactly blossom, conductor and band swept the hearer by so quickly and absorbedly that he hardly heeded. It is possible to be quietly as well as flamboyantly romantic. So Brahms's symphony sounded.

The foil to the romantic Brahms was the classic Chopin of the concerto in E minor, revived for the first time "at these concerts" in nine years. For there is a classic Chopin as truly as there is a romantic Brahms. The curious and the studious, as Mr. Huneker has lately been pointing out, may trace his sense of classical form and style even in the freest and most rhapsodic of his music. Perhaps in this concerto he is classic of matter and manner by necessity; but he is also so by no reluctant inclination. The purist may not complain of the formal exposition of the subject-matter necessity taken toll of the brilliancy of her extreme upper notes, or stolen something from the volume of her lower notes it has left her other beautiful quality of tone, and all the mastery of her art that keeps her one of the most prominent figures in the musical world.

[27]

What could her audience have asked more than she gave in her solos, of which to many, the most soul-satisfying was Mozart's Canzona, "Voi, Che Sapete" from "Le Nozzi di Figaro"? Again and again they called her back to the stage and demonstrated their approval, till she would no longer appear, and the orchestra was permitted to finish the programme with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The second concert will be given on Nov. 23, when the soloist will be Laeta Hartley, pianist. A. W. C.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 28,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AN OLD CONTROVERSY ONCE MORE RENEWED

Long Versus Short Programmes at the Symphony Concerts—The Side of the Clock and the Opposite and More Important Sides—More of "Daphnis and Chloe"—Mme. Powell's Mission to the Gentiles—Items and Opinions

EARLIER than usual the annual debate over the duration and the ordering of the programmes at the Symphony Concerts has begun and quite as certainly as usual it bids fair to lead nowhere. Between them, Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck have lengthened the concerts so that ordinarily they continue for two hours, less ten minutes and sometimes fifteen, for the intermission; at least five spent in applause for the orchestra and the "assisting artists"; and five or ten more for the grace allowed late comers and early goers. In all, the audience now actually hears music for an hour and a half, whereas under the vanished dispensation of Mr. Gericke, it heard it for little more than an hour. Ninety minutes, the objectors say, is the longest possible time that human beings can be receptive to music; and ninety minutes happens to be almost exactly the time during which they actually listen to music in what they call a "two-hour concert." However, that merely incidental fact, as all know that have had experience of such controversies, is neither here nor there.

The reasons that prompted Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler to the lengthening of the programmes—semi-unconscious process as it undoubtedly was—speak for themselves. If a conductor must limit the actual performance of music in a concert to one hour and a little more, he has scant room for the careful composition of his programme by any other standard than the clock. He can give it neither continuity nor contrast in such measure as he justly desires and even in twenty-four pairs of concerts, he can include far fewer pieces than he should, if he is to keep the repertory catholic and alive and gratify the divergent likings of his hearers. The world over nowadays two hours is the usual length of symphony concerts. In London and in Paris, it is usually more.

Again, both conductors were aware that an appreciable part of their audience—and in no small measure that part of it upon which the future life of the Symphony Concerts depends—prefers the two-hour programme, so long as it is interesting. The temper of the reviewers in these matters is no test whatever. The "traditions" of their trade ordain that they shall quit a concert at the earliest possible moment—usually well before it has ended—and that they shall profess the uttermost boredom over the hearing of music. No more of a criterion is the mood of those whose presence at the Symphony Concerts is merely a weekly rite. They can come as late and depart as early as they are minded to do without let or hindrance. The real public to be considered are those eager, absorbed, stirred, and usually youthful auditors to whom the taking of a ticket for a series of Symphony Concerts means considerable expenditure and often harsh economies; to whom such performances as they now hear from conductor and orchestra are revelation of the beauty and power of music and of men with it; and whose ears and sensations are open equally to the old and the new. Much more than any elect matrons or weary reviewers, these unobtrusive folk hold the future of the Symphony Concerts in their hands; and it is they whose emotion and illusion, whose pleasure and satisfaction are the great reward of them. These humble listeners—the listeners for whom Mr. Higginson has finely said he most cares—do not complain of long programmes. No greater misfortune could befall the Symphony Concerts than to become concerts of, by, and for the elderly. They must renew their youth in the youth of their audiences, and must cultivate that youth accordingly.

Again—and what is most to the point in these controversies—the length of a programme by the clock is no test of the strain it lays upon the attention of the audience. That strain depends upon the nature of the pieces and the performance and the mental and the emotional repose of the hearers to both. It so happened that Enesco's new symphony, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem of Tintagiles and Ravel's subtle ballet-music, a week ago, made "hard listening" and exhausted many an emotional sensibility. Hence the outcry over the length of the programme, especially when Dvorak's "Huritzka" overture was added to it. Now, as a matter of fact, it was shorter by nearly a quarter of an hour than the programme of the preceding week, almost universally applauded as uncommonly interesting and plausible. The first programme merely laid less strain upon the receptive faculties of the audience and brought many in it more enjoyment. From no point of view, either on the stage or in the auditorium, can the clock be a hard-and-fast dictator of programmes. Nor should the grumblers forget that the conductor and the orchestra are under strain as well. Such a performance as that of Enesco's symphony or of Loeffler's "Tintagiles" last Saturday "takes it out" of conductor and players beyond the remotest notion of most of those who protested their fatigue. H. T. P.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

MUSIC NOTES

E 1884

WITH the first of the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give here this winter, the season of music in this city was brilliantly opened on Tuesday evening, an event which was followed on Friday by the first of the six afternoon concerts in the De Luxe Series. Between these two concerts came the opening meetings of the two largest musical clubs, which were especially noteworthy in the records of such events, making the week one of remarkable importance.

In marked contrast, the week to come is devoid of all musical interest except for the regular popular Sunday concert. From that on, however, there will not be a week, with the exception of that immediately preceding Christmas, in which there will not be one or more concerts of exceptional value until the middle of February. So far, March and April have only their alternate weeks marked by concert dates, while the last of such events is scheduled for the first week in May.

Between now and February, however, there is plenty of time for any number of plans to materialize for a supplementary season. What is of present paramount concern is the continuous procession of musical events of a high standard that has entered upon its course. Few years here have ever seen the like, and the right of Providence to occupy a place upon the musical map is not to be denied.

The first announcement of any local concert for a philanthropic purpose has been made and others are likely to follow as the weeks go on, since the spirit of the musical clubs in this city is to respond to calls for help.

Providence, R. I.

LBA SOLOIST AT RST CONCERT OF OSTON SYMPHONY

Famous Soprano Encored Many Times by Audience, Which Extends Warm Welcome to Musicians.—Few Changes in Membership of Orchestra.

For its 35th season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to this city last evening, and it needs no further proof that it was welcome than the statement that every seat in Infantry Hall was filled, even to the accommodation afforded by the stairways leading to the balcony. The welcome was of the sort one accords to an old friend who comes regularly; not vociferous nor over demonstrative, but sincere and quietly cordial, without extraordinary enthusiasm, either at the beginning or the end of the concert.

Mme. Melba as soloist was potent to assist in attracting the unusually large audience, and she received her full share of the applause, which recalled her again and again after she had left the stage each time.

Fewer changes than usual are to be noted in the personnel of the orchestra, which but for a half-dozen names, remains the same as last year. Dr. Muck, too, has apparently returned the same; imperturbable, serene, absorbed in his work and playing upon the units of his instrument, with undiminished mastery, expressing through them his interpretation of the will of the composer.

Remaining unchanged and to be again regretfully mentioned as doing much to mar the enjoyment of a vast number of persons, are the insistent lights which beat fiercely down, undimmed by any pretence of screen, and many a head nodded, not to mention the yawns, from the paralyzing glare, which it would take so little to remedy.

On the other hand a feature worthy of mention is the fact that notwithstanding the size of the audience, there were fewer late arrivals, and fewer early [illegible]

[illegible]

Beethoven....Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro; Trio.
IV. Allegro.
Handel..
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato."
(Flute Obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)
Rimsky-Korsakoff............................
..........Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)
Mozart..
..Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
"Porgi Amor."
"Voi Che sapete."
Wagner..
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Beethoven's symphonies find their way to the varied programme of the orchestra oftener than those of any other composer, a restrospective glance showing three Beethoven symphonies in the 12 concerts of the past two seasons, with the other nine concerts distributed among as many other composers, and yet it is over five years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler played the Fifth Symphony in C-minor here, at the April concert in 1910.

It was a welcome presentation last evening, played in masterly fashion under the direction of a master mind. Critics pronounce the C-minor symphony the most human in its qualities of the nine symphonies written by Beethoven, and most of them, following a clue suggested by the composer, agree that it pictures the struggle of the individual with Fate Be that as it may, each listener must interpret the music to his own needs, and few could fail to appreciate the extreme beauty of the second movement as played last evening. Coming as it did after the tempestuous struggle of the first movement, the pleaceful, elevating harmony of the andante con moto was an impressive reality.

Its characteristics, suggestive of those of similar movements in the Second and Seventh symphonies, must have impressed themselves upon the least musical, as the various instruments wove their melodies against the deep harmony of the 'celli and basses with their plecoral vibrations, or the violins provided a lighter background for the melody played by the 'celli. It was a noteworthy performance in spite of the climatic drawback resulting in an occasional broken string or imperfect quality of tone, notably in the drums.

The Fifth Symphony, the most powerful in sound which had been produced up to the time it was written over a century ago, will hold its own with many a modern rival in that quality, and is interesting from a historical point of view as affording the first appearance of trombones in symphony.

Of the other numbers by the orchestra, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" was heard here less than two years ago. It is full of color, and its barbaric beauty received adequate treatment, that transmuted the instruments with a magician's wand till they sounded like the gpysy tambourines they represented.

To those who welcomed Mme. Melba as an old friend, and to those who heard her for the first time, her voice gave great pleasure, and if those who had never heard her before lacked something of what old admirers still found in her voice, her art was in itself a revelation.

The "golden voice" of Mme. Melba has been famed for the past three decades and there are few singers with whom the years have dealt so kindly, either in voice or appearance. If time has of necessity taken toll of the brilliancy of her extreme upper notes, or stolen something from the volume of her lower notes it has left her other beautiful quality of tone, and all the mastery of her art that keeps her one of the most prominent figures in the musical world.

What could her audience have asked more than she gave in her solos, Mr. Maquarre sharing the honors with her in the first by his beautiful flute obligato, which was the performance of a virtuoso. To many, Mme. Melba's most soul-satisfying solo was Mozart's Canzona, "Voi, Che Sapete" from "Le Nozzi di Figaro"? Again and again they called her back to the stage and demonstrated their approval until she would no longer appear, and the orchestra was permitted to finish the programme with the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The second concert will be given on Nov. 23, when the soloist will be Laeta Hartley, pianist. A. W. C.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ROMANTIC BRAHMS AND CLASSIC CHOPIN

Music That Disclosed an Overlooked Side in Both Composers — Dr. Muck's Large Share in the Revelation—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Does His Part Also in the Reanimated Concerto — The Contrasts of Two Overtures

WHEN Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra played the first symphony of Brahms in Chicago the other day, some in the audience repined under the conductor's reading of the music. In their view, it was too subdued; it lacked the high emotional pitch to which they were accustomed; it wanted vivid strokes—all of which complaints may sound strangely in Bostonian ears, wont to believe that Dr. Muck's version of this symphony in C minor is remarkably eloquent and even dramatic. Of course, it is the fashion, nowadays, of almost every conductor to let loose his temperament upon the music of Brahms, as it was the way of almost every conductor fifteen or twenty years ago to repress that temperament whenever he opened a score of the great Johannes, apostle to the Gentiles to redeem them from an obsession of romantic music. Extremes are extremes at whichever end of the scale they happen to stand, and to set forth a [illegible]

[illegible] mathematics and not music is to do it only a little more injustice than to discover and produce an effect in every other period. There is not a doubt that Brahms, listening across the Elysian fields to the sounds that rise from terrestrial concert-rooms, squares his sturdy shoulders in alarmed surprise when he hears one and another of his symphonies dramatized in the current fashion, as he used to stride indignantly away when he heard it reduced to a calculated pattern in tones that ought to end with the Q. E. D. of problems in geometry.

Somewhere between these extremes lies the mean of performance that neither deadens nor dramatizes the symphonies of Brahms; but makes them sound with characteristic voice and just eloquence. The music of Brahms is not dramatic as Liszt's, for example, or Berlioz's is. On the other hand, it is romantic, as Schumann's or even Mendelssohn's is in the generation of composers immediately preceding him. It is the hearer's instinct to associate romantic music with large, strenuous, vivid and sometimes actually flamboyant utterance. When it is in question, the ways of Weber, of Berlioz, of Liszt, of Tschaikovsky come spontaneously to mind. But it is quite possible for a composer to write romantic music and to keep to the relatively low intensities of Brahms's symphonic voice. Romantic music is such when it touches the imagination by the vistas that it opens; when it stirs the heart by the heights and the depths of feeling that it evokes; and when it fascinates ear and fancy by the new and strange beauties that it summons.

Brahms's first symphony does one and another of these things in the vivid transitional passage marshalled by the songful horns that leads into the Finale; in the mounting tumults of that Finale itself; in the recurring stress of the first movement; in the moody mystery of the slow division. Brahms's fourth symphony, played anew at the Symphony Concert of yesterday, does also one and another of these things in the returning melody that the first Allegro projects upon the hearers' ears; in the song that rises from 'celli and horns in the ensuing Andante; in the large tonal sport of the Scherzo; and perhaps in the measured and expressive march of the Finale through and in spite of the intricacies of the ancient form which Brahms chose for it. But for the romantic substance of these two symphonies—to go no farther in citation—Brahms's actual utterance is relatively low of pitch and subdued of color. It keeps romantic quality and accomplishment by virtue of a fine, rather than a large, intensity playing upon attuned ears; and if it sometimes flags and dries into music-making that shall fill periods and round out forms, be it remembered that unevenness and lapses pass almost for virtues with the more flamboyant and full-voiced romantics and the admirers of them.

No attributes more stamp Dr. Muck as a remarkable conductor than his sense of the distinctive voice of each composer and of the informing qualities of the music in hand. With it goes equal ability to impart both, quickened and illumined, to his hearers. Thus, in the symphony of yesterday, as in the symphony that Chicago heard mistrusting the performance, Brahms's music sounds romantic under his hand, yet keeps to its low pitch and fine intensities unless, being human, the composer "breaks loose" in the rhythmic stride and the upsweeping sonorities of the finale of the first symphony or in the robust revelling of the Scherzo of the fourth. Romantic beauty, stress and imagination rose on Friday afternoon out of the first Allegro; the swaying motion, the elastic rhythm, the broad progression, the murmured phrases; the latent or the outspoken energy of the whole all served them at the conductor's will. He seemed almost to humor Brahms when the composer is taking his familiar delight in plucked strings, in the songfulness of horns, in the dark tones of clarinets. As understandingly and as adroitly the conductor missed not a tint of Brahms's harmonic and instrumental color. Admittedly, it is a measured color, albeit more skilfully and imaginatively distributed than in many another of Brahms's orchestral pieces, but being such it accords better with a symphony that throughout is measured intensity of matter and feeling. The slow section sounded in like romantic beauty—the beauty that may be still but that yet haunts—and upon it Dr. Muck bestowed a wealth of quiet inflection and the players a wealth of tonal loveliness. In both their voices were the romantic strangeness, the romantic insistence, of the music.

Even Chicago might not doubt the large power and the bold sweep of the Scherzo as Dr. Muck and the orchestra played it. They would have it sound as though Brahms, for once forgetting measure, was gathering up his music in mind and imagination and then flinging it upon players and hearers as in exultant sport. Yet here and there, as contrast bade, the smoothest of euphonies tempered these tonal ardors. Finally, in that allegro "energico e passicnato" in which Brahms would mask or melt his carefully built Chaconne, the conductor and the orchestra gave the composer the freest play with all his strokes—a favorite device of romantic music—upon the sensibilities of his hearers. Not a rolling drum beat, not a bite of the strings, not a whirl of flutes and wood winds, not a softening shadow from the horns, not a bold chord or a sweeping progression missed its effect. If the dry places in the symphony—and there are such—did not exactly blossom, conductor and band swept the hearer by so quickly and absorbedly that he hardly heeded. It is possible to be quietly as well as flamboyantly romantic. So Brahms's symphony sounded.

The foil to the romantic Brahms was the classic Chopin of the concerto in E minor, revived for the first time "at these concerts" in nine years. For there is a classic Chopin as truly as there is a romantic Brahms. The curious and the studious, as Mr. Huneker has lately been pointing out, may trace his sense of classical form and style even in the freest and most rhapsodic of his music. Perhaps in this concerto he is classic of matter and manner by necessity; but he is also so by no reluctant inclination. The purist may not complain of the formal exposition of the subject-matter of the first movement, the working-out, the restatement and all the rest of the orthodox prescriptions. The middle section of slow and sentimental song and the finale with its returning themes and rhythms, rondo-wise, are as impeccable. But to be classic is not merely to write in the ordained forms and procedure; to be fully and truly so in music is to achieve therein and thereby a pattern in sound that shall fill hearers with a sense of beauty in invention, mood and expression, ordered yet penetrating and satisfying, and that shall kindle in them something of the excitement and the fascination of creation in tones. These qualities and this power do dwell in this seldom-heard concerto of Chopin; but they are muted, so to say, to many an ear nowadays because—outside fitful but often very beautiful strokes—Chopin was inept with orchestral speech and color. His instrumental idiom is not our instrumental idiom or anyone's else except his own.

[27]

Accordingly, when the concerto is played, it ought to be the first concern of conductor and pianist to free it so far as possible from this inarticulateness and to disengage from it the classical quality that in form, substance and appeal endures and is alive within it. Fortunately it was precisely this release that Dr. Muck and Mr. Gabrilowitsch yesterday accomplished. Out of the pianist's crystalline tone, yet free from all trace of hardness; out of the delicacy of his phrasing; out of the warmth, the variety and the fluidity of his tonal color; out of his fleetness, evenness and grace of touch; out of his just sense of pace, rhythm and climax; and out of his adroit mingling of poise and brilliancy spoke the very voice of the music. Once more Mr. Gabrilowitsch was giving proof of the range and the fineness alike of his perceiving and his imparting faculties. In turn, he called from the music—and especially from the first movement and the finale—the impression of eager and absorbed creation that is latent in it and that it will readily yield to apprehending imagination and sympathetic imparting. Here Dr. Muck was at one with the pianist and together they made the sheer evolution of the first movement exciting to hear in its zest, of creation, and the bright suspense and the sharp returns of theme and rhythms in the Rondo a fascination in themselves. So played, the concerto was alive—and classically alive—again.

Two romantic overtures filled the rest of the programme—Schumann's to Byron's poetic tragedy of "Manfred" and Berlioz's of "The Roman Carnival" in his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini"—repertory overtures withal long entitled to at least biennial performance in all well-ordered symphony concerts. Perhaps in these days, Berlioz's seems to deserve it the more. The years and the changes in orchestral speech and tonal fashions have not a wit whithered it; the melodies are as arresting, the rhythms as stinging, the harmonic and instrumental coloring as rich; the glow and the march of the whole as vivid and quick-footed as they ever were. Out of it shines the pure glory of romantic music to stir the imagination and the emotions, to outfling and animate the fancied scene until the hearer knows and feels that he is there in bodily presence and excited pleasure. Moreover, relegated to the concert-room as the overture has been these seventy-five years, it is still stirring and vivid music of the theatre. Fortunate the producer and the ballet-master who could make the dancers steal upon the stage as they do through the music and then fill it with the fire and wildness of their saltarello. Fortunate the tenor who might sing to his Teresa with the ardors that the overture gives to Cellini's amorous tune. Dr. Muck and the orchestra transmuted the music yesterday into picture and passion such as the stage may rarely yield. Some day it should be the pastime of the psychologists to discover why these German conductors succeed so much better with Berlioz's music than his own Frenchmen. Even the Parisians sent for Mr. Weingartner when they would celebrate a Berlioz centenary.

The overture to "Manfred," like the symphony of Brahms aforesaid, is romantic music that shuns the obviousness in its kind that Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" glorifies. Like Brahms, Schumann with all his romantic temperament, courted the low pitch and the fine intensity when he would impart the ardors of imagination and expression that it kindled in him. Byron's poem is a turgid thing beside the overture that it suggested. The Astarte of the blank verse has no such beauty as the Astarte of Schumann's theme; she appears not in the poem with the dramatic and the pictorial force with which her theme returns in the music. The thematic struggle is quite as poignant as the versified conflicts of the tragedy and the overture excels the poem in the suggestion of romantic gloom unpierced. And yet and yet, while Berlioz's piece still glows with its romantic fires; Schumann's seems more and more faded. Before long, it may sit on the shelf as little disturbed in his "collected works" as is "Manfred" among Byron's.

H. T. P.

[illegible] R. I.,

OCTOBER 29 1915.

WELCOME FOR MELBA AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Large Audience Hears Song Queen at Infantry Hall—Splendid Programme.

Madame Nellie Melba, for a generation one of the world's greatest singers, made her first appearance in a number of years in Providence last evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receiving an ovation only to be won by an artist of her superlative ability. It was the first concert of the symphony season, and with Mme. Melba as an added attraction nothing more was needed to crowd Infantry Hall to its capacity.

Mme. Melba's wonderful coloratura voice has lost nothing with the passing of the years, her superb technique is as absolutely flawless as ever, and the art mellowed by years of experience remains potent to sway audiences aroused to the highest enthusiasm by her marvellous gifts. Her redition of two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" was a triumph which proved beyond a doubt that the march of time has not in the least marred her wonderful abilities. Repeated recalls on each of her two appearances were her tributes, but the custom which forbids repetitions at symphony concerts forced the audience to remain satisfied with the regular programme numbers.

The symphony chosen for the evening by Dr. Karl Muck was Beethoven's fifth in C minor, a work which has not been heard in Providence for several years, but is familiar to symphony audiences everywhere. It has been called the greatest work of the German master, a work of the distinctly classic school. The splendid second movement was executed with marvellous precision and a seductive charm which was an eloquent illustration of the interpretative ability of the conductor.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, played by the orchestra before in Providence, was given the second place in the orchestra programme. This piece, abounding in themes distinctly Castillian, rippling with the lilt of the Spanish influence, is a work of beauty which requires such a splendid body of players as the Boston orchestra to interpret. The alluring ring of the castanet with which the piece open awakens at once the interest of the auditor, who is held close to the orchestra until the closing of the final theme. Warm applause was the reward of the players as they finished.

The prelude to "Die Meistersingers von Nurnberg," splendidly played, brought the concert to the close. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven..
......Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andanate con moto.
- III. Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Handel..
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderator."
(Flute obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)

Rimsky-Korsakoff..................................
......Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
- I. Alborade.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturius.
(Played without pause.)

Mozart..
Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
"Porgi Amor."
"Voi Che sapete."

Wagner ....
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, will be the soloist at the next concert, to be given Nov. 23.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 30,

MUSIC OF BRAHMS AND CHOPIN GIVEN BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Oct. 29. The program: Brahms, symphony in E minor, No. 4; Schumann, overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Chopin, concerto in E minor for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, "Roman Carnival" overture. Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

All the works on the program were given a straightforward presentation. None of them were such as to mark the rehearsal as a brilliant occasion and no endeavor was made to give them a fictitious interest. The list of compositions was, saving the final number, somewhat dry; and from first to last it was strictly and academically interpreted. Nevertheless the audience enjoyed the performance and expressed itself with just as enthusiastic applause as if the symphony were something modern and of high color and as if the solo piece were a repertory favorite. The day was the kind that must come now and then in the career of any orchestral organization, and if it can be the cause of thorough pleasure, so much the more credit to both performers and public. And under the present conductor's policy it must come with considerable regularity in the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Formerly some of the more progressive listeners thought that Dr. Muck was not always shrewd in his choice of pieces. They used to say that though a brilliant conductor he was not a remarkable program maker. But less is heard on that subject today than a year or two ago. His scheme of giving a program of old works one week and one containing a new work the next is now accepted, and, as the first concerts of this season have shown, is even warmly approved.

The Brahms symphony was read with a perspicacity that is only attainable when a studious attitude on the part of the players and close attention on the part of the hearers exist. For this work will not bear a forced interpretation. Neither will it compel interest in itself from a cold audience. It is one of the works of Brahms in which the lyric persuasion is very unassertive, though most delightfully present if the listener is only open to it. It sings with a voice of the deepest feeling, but it sings gently. It simply will not make itself heard above mundane noises if on the day when it lifts its voice the world happens to be in a roaring mood. It is unlike the first Brahms symphony in this respect. It pays less attention to the building up of effect than that work and it teaches the joys of calm thinking.

The Chopin concerto is a work for a small hall. Indeed it is but a recital piece, considered from the standpoint of the solo instrument. And the work is not an attractive one to think of from any point else. Here again a closely attentive house was just what was wanted.

If the audience had demanded that Mr. Gabrilowitsch get their attention on the brilliance and fire of his playing the concerto would have gone to pieces. And even with the advantage of the keenest sympathy on the part of his public, the soloist scarcely made the music have its true effect. He executed the notes with greater smoothness than at his trial of the work at a Symphony concert in the small theater at Harvard University a little while ago, but he could not make the sentiment of Chopin so vivid as he could there.

Chopin for once at least in his piano writing was a humorist, and that was when he set to paper the piano part of the last movement of the E minor concerto. In Cambridge Mr. Gabrilowitsch could show this, because of the small auditorium and the perfect acoustics. In Boston he could not do it, although he had everything in his favor.

Perhaps one of the greatest Schumann successes Dr. Muck has ever made since he became the Symphony conductor was with the "Manfred" overture. He has never shown remarkable enthusiasm for the type of romanticism which is Schumann's. He has inclined to the ingratiating kind of Schubert and to the aggressive kind of Strauss, he has been rather disinclined to the introspective kind of Schumann. But he got at the Schumann of "Manfred" on Friday with as much mastery as if one of the scores of the objective type of composer were on the desk before him.

St. Louis Daily Globe-Democrat

October 10,

MUCK'S ORCHESTRA PLAYS AS IF GUIDED BY UNSEEN POWER

Boston Symphony Reaches Its Climax in Richard Strauss' Number.

BY RICHARD SPAMER.

Great expectations as to what Dr. Karl Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra could do to evoke the amazement of St. Louis orchestra sharps were not only realized but far exceeded at the Odeon last night.

Even those conversant with this wonderful organization and its uncannily able conductor were surprised that these musicians, not inured to the hardship of long journeys, could do so well.

Playing in Symphony Hall, Boston, is one thing. Traveling hundreds of miles nightly and playing every day in a different auditorium filled with strangers, is quite another.

Boston knows its Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra knows its Boston. Leader and men cannot be expected to know even superficially the various cities visited on tour and Dr. Muck evidenced his unfamiliarity with St. Louis ways when he delayed the beginning of his concert last night many minutes beyond the advertised time simply because he believed the promptness of his Boston audiences must, by this time have become known far away from home and served as a worthy example to other communities.

Conductor Is Gracious.

Dr. Muck gave the audience more than ample time to assemble and expected he would be able to play the Beethoven Symphony without having the intervals between the four movements interrupted by latecomers. But the belated folk ordered otherwise. The allegro finished, there swarmed into the aisles hundreds of persons who delayed the continuation of the performance many minutes, disturbing the quiet of the house. The same thing occurred after the second movement and was repeated after the third. The tardy ones kept coming in after the Beethoven number was concluded, arriving in time, however, to partake of the ovation tendered to the dirigent who, to show his appreciation, asked his men to rise and bow acknowledgment.

Thanks to Max Zach of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and other visiting organizations, Beethoven's "Eroica" has come to be one of the master's best-known works. Dr. Muck's reading different from others in that the rendition was according to the Muck school of musical expression. He has his own well-developed ideas of accent, and these came forth in the scherzo in a truly charming manner.

Great Student of Beethoven.

The conductor's study of the Beethoven syncopations approaches profundity. He, like the best students of Shakespeare, has read new but perfectly warranted locutions into the text, giving the scherzo, for instance, an airier grace than merely nimble presentation would impart to it. Through it all Dr. Muck held to a somewhat formally classic expression. He is so sure of his men and they of him that whole sentences in this masterpiece were ayed without so much as a lift of the ton.

look was sufficient to give the various irs their cues. Nor was there the ntest intimation of artistic bravado this process. The coherence of the formance was, if anything, increased the use of what might truly be called chic force. Nor was this exhibition of rdependence lost upon the orchestra ps, although those "in the know" expected to see a display of the manners of the conductor.

or the audience as a whole, it pro- the calculated effect. There stood im, elegant figure at the desk, ngly immovable, and just beyond sat a liberal hundred of men and d as if under a spell. It was a fine , one long to be remembered. Dr. 's classic pose here made a pretty re, and it informed lovers of orches- music just how much inordinate re- sal and devotion to duty was neces- to make safe such mutual reliance. h the conclusion of the "Eroica" the taking up of Liszt's symphonic "Hungaria," the conductor became nged man. That little white wand e air at sharp angles, it beat aston- g time with metronomic exactness the bizarre tonalities of the greatest one poets, the true progenitor of the gner cult, blared forth with uplifting ority. We heard sounds such as might sue if all the thirteen or more Hun- arian rhapsodies were being played at once. Yet in all that seeming confusion there was clarity and even a measure of repose. Liszt's yearning strains, the gypsy-like songs came forth from that wondrous brass sections in truly entrancing beauty.

Evening's Tonal Apex.

But the great moment of the evening was Dr. Muck's presentation of the Wagner Siegfried Idyl, the scene in which the young hero, faring forth, enters the forest, hears the voices of the birds, which tell him—oh, so many things that birds can tell a fairy prince. Here the flutes, the oboes, the bassoons, the French horns, wrought their heavenly harmonies while an almost painful silence pervaded the house.

The memorable evening was brought to a reluctant close with Richard Strauss' symphonic tour de force, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Till, you know, was the careless wight, much given to revelry and ungodly glee. Few things found favor in his sight, and he was right from the start of his brief and inglorious career against that awful thing, yclept, "the established order."

The legends of mediaeval Germany are rich in legends about Till Eulenspiegel. Richard Strauss tells his entire story in this rondo-like work. The songs Till sings form part of the theme which is wrought in Strauss' finest fashion. The work is generous in its opportunities for the display of the Boston Symphony's colossal virtuosity. From the time Till Owlglass starts on his final prankish journey to the moment the halter tightens around his neck, we can trace his progress.

His is truly a short life and a merry one. The comic value of the story is most pronounced, and Dr. Muck's fiddlers told it all in almost so many words.

They are a fine lot of men, those Boston Symphony Orchestralists. They afforded some 2000 St. Louisans at the Odeon last night a superb musical diversion. Sorry their visits are so few and so far between.

of the first movement, the working-out, the restatement and all the rest of the orthodox prescriptions. The middle section of slow and sentimental song and the finale with its returning themes and rhythms, rondo-wise, are as impeccable. But to be classic is not merely to write in the ordained forms and procedure; to be fully and truly so in music is to achieve therein and thereby a pattern in sound that shall fill hearers with a sense of beauty in invention, mood and expression, ordered yet penetrating and satisfying, and that shall kindle in them something of the excitement and the fascination of creation in tones. These qualities and this power do dwell in this seldom-heard concerto of Chopin; but they are muted, so to say, to many an ear nowadays because—outside fitful but often very beautiful strokes—Chopin was inept with orchestral speech and color. His instrumental idiom is not our instrumental idiom or anyone's else except his own.

Accordingly, when the concerto is played, it ought to be the first concern of conductor and pianist to free it so far as possible from this inarticulateness and to disengage from it the classical quality that in form, substance and appeal endures and is alive within it. Fortunately it was precisely this release that Dr. Muck and Mr. Gabrilowitsch yesterday accomplished. Out of the pianist's crystalline tone, yet free from all trace of hardness; out of the delicacy of his phrasing; out of the warmth, the variety and the fluidity of his tonal color; out of his fleetness, evenness and grace of touch; out of his just sense of pace, rhythm and climax; and out of his adroit mingling of poise and brilliancy spoke the very voice of the music. Once more Mr. Gabrilowitsch was giving proof of the range and the fineness alike of his perceiving and his imparting faculties. In turn, he called from the music—and especially from the first movement and the finale—the impression of eager and absorbed creation that is latent in it and that it will readily yield to apprehending imagination and sympathetic imparting. Here Dr. Muck was at one with the pianist and together they made the sheer evolution of the first movement exciting to hear in its zest, of creation, and the bright suspense and the sharp returns of theme and rhythms in the Rondo a fascination in themselves. So played, the concerto was alive—and classically alive—again.

Two romantic overtures filled the rest of the programme—Schumann's to Byron's poetic tragedy of "Manfred" and Berlioz's of "The Roman Carnival" in his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini"—repertory overtures withal long entitled to at least biennial performance in all well-ordered symphony concerts. Perhaps in these days, Berlioz's seems to deserve it the more. The years and the changes in orchestral speech and tonal fashions have not a wit whithered it; the melodies are as arresting, the rhythms as stinging, the harmonic and instrumental coloring as rich; the glow and the march of the whole as vivid and quick-footed as they ever were. Out of it shines the pure glory of romantic music to stir the imagination and the emotions, to outfling and animate the fancied scene until the hearer knows and feels that he is there in bodily presence and excited pleasure. Moreover, relegated to the concert-room as the overture has been these seventy-five years, it is still stirring and vivid music of the theatre. Fortunate the producer and the ballet-master who could make the dancers steal upon the stage as they do through the music and then fill it with the fire and wildness of their saltarello. Fortunate the tenor who might sing to his Teresa with the ardors that the overture gives to Cellini's amorous tune. Dr. Muck and the orchestra transmuted the music yesterday into picture and passion such as the stage may rarely yield. Some day it should be the pastime of the psychologists to discover why these German conductors succeed so much better with Berlioz's music than his own Frenchmen. Even the Parisians sent for Mr. Weingartner when they would celebrate a Berlioz centenary.

The overture to "Manfred," like the symphony of Brahms aforesaid, is romantic music that shuns the obviousness in its kind that Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" glorifies. Like Brahms, Schumann with all his romantic temperament, courted the low pitch and the fine intensity when he would impart the ardors of imagination and expression that it kindled in him. Byron's poem is a turgid thing beside the overture that it suggested. The Astarte of the blank verse has no such beauty as the Astarte of Schumann's theme; she appears not in the poem with the dramatic and the pictorial force with which her theme returns in the music. The thematic struggle is quite as poignant as the versified conflicts of the tragedy and the overture excels the poem in the suggestion of romantic gloom unpierced. And yet and yet, while Berlioz's piece still glows with its romantic fires; Schumann's seems more and more faded. Before long, it may sit on the shelf as little disturbed in his "collected works" as is "Manfred" among Byron's.

H. T. P.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

OCTOBER 20 1915.

WELCOME FOR MELBA AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Large Audience Hears Song Queen at Infantry Hall—Splendid Programme.

Madame Nellie Melba, for a generation one of the world's greatest singers, made her first appearance in a number of years in Providence last evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receiving an ovation only to be won by an artist of her superlative ability. It was the first concert of the symphony season, and with Mme. Melba as an added attraction nothing more was needed to crowd Infantry Hall to its capacity.

Mme. Melba's wonderful coloratura voice has lost nothing with the passing of the years, her superb technique is as absolutely flawless as ever, and the art mellowed by years of experience remains potent to sway audiences aroused to the highest enthusiasm by her marvellous gifts. Her redition of two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" was a triumph which proved beyond a doubt that the march of time has not in the least marred her wonderful abilities. Repeated recalls on each of her two appearances were her tributes, but the custom which forbids repetitions at symphony concerts forced the audience to remain satisfied with the regular programme numbers.

The symphony chosen for the evening by Dr. Karl Muck was Beethoven's fifth in C minor, a work which has not been heard in Providence for several years, but is familiar to symphony audiences everywhere. It has been called the greatest work of the German master, a work of the distinctly classic school. The splendid second movement was executed with marvellous precision and a seductive charm which was an eloquent illustration of the interpretative ability of the conductor.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, played by the orchestra before in Providence, was given the second place in the orchestra programme. This piece, abounding in themes distinctly Castillian, rippling with the lilt of the Spanish influence, is a work of beauty which requires such a splendid body of players as the Boston orchestra to interpret. The alluring ring of the castanet with which the piece open awakens at once the interest of the auditor, who is held close to the orchestra until the closing of the final theme. Warm applause was the reward of the players as they finished.

The prelude to "Die Meistersingers von Nurnberg," splendidly played, brought the concert to the close. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven.......................................
......Symphony in C-minor, No. 5, Op. 67
  I. Allegro con brio.
  II. Andanate con moto.
  III. Allegro: Trio.
  IV. Allegro.
Handel.......................................
  Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderator."
  (Flute obligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.)
Rimsky-Korsakoff.......................................
......Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
  I. Alborada.
  II. Variations.
  III. Alborada.
  IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
  V. Fandango of the Asturius.
  (Played without pause.)
Mozart.......................................
  Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."
    "Porgi Amor."
    "Voi Che sapete."
Wagner ....
  Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, will be the soloist at the next concert, to be given Nov. 23.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

OCTOBER 30,

MUSIC OF BRAHMS AND CHOPIN GIVEN BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Oct. 29. The program: Brahms, symphony in E minor, No. 4; Schumann, overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Chopin, concerto in E minor for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, "Roman Carnival" overture. Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

All the works on the program were given a straightforward presentation. None of them were such as to mark the rehearsal as a brilliant occasion and no endeavor was made to give them a fictitious interest. The list of compositions was, saving the final number, somewhat dry; and from first to last it was strictly and academically interpreted. Nevertheless the audience enjoyed the performance and expressed itself with just as enthusiastic applause as if the symphony were something modern and of high color and as if the solo piece were a repertory favorite. The day was the kind that must come now and then in the career of any orchestral organization, and if it can be the cause of thorough pleasure, so much the more credit to both performers and public. And under the present conductor's policy it must come with considerable regularity in the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Formerly some of the more progressive listeners thought that Dr. Muck was not always shrewd in his choice of pieces. They used to say that though a brilliant conductor he was not a remarkable program maker. But less is heard on that subject today than a year or two ago. His scheme of giving a program of old works one week and one containing a new work the next is now accepted, and, as the first concerts of this season have shown, is even warmly approved.

The Brahms symphony was read with a perspicacity that is only attainable when a studious attitude on the part of the players and close attention on the part of the hearers exist. For this work will not bear a forced interpretation. Neither will it compel interest in itself from a cold audience. It is one of the works of Brahms in which the lyric persuasion is very unassertive, though most delightfully present if the listener is only open to it. It sings with a voice of the deepest feeling, but it sings gently. It simply will not make itself heard above mundane noises if on the day when it lifts its voice the world happens to be in a roaring mood. It is unlike the first Brahms symphony in this respect. It pays less attention to the building up of effect than that work and it teaches the joys of calm thinking.

The Chopin concerto is a work for a small hall. Indeed it is but a recital piece, considered from the standpoint of the solo instrument. And the work is not an attractive one to think of from any point else. Here again a closely attentive house was just what was wanted.

If the audience had demanded that Mr. Gabrilowitsch get their attention on the brilliance and fire of his playing the concerto would have gone to pieces. And even with the advantage of the keenest sympathy on the part of his public, the soloist scarcely made the music have its true effect. He executed the notes with greater smoothness than at his trial of the work at a Symphony concert in the small theater at Harvard University a little while ago, but he could not make the sentiment of Chopin so vivid as he could there.

Chopin for once at least in his piano writing was a humorist, and that was when he set to paper the piano part of the last movement of the E minor concerto. In Cambridge Mr. Gabrilowitsch could show this, because of the small auditorium and the perfect acoustics. In Boston he could not do it, although he had everything in his favor.

Perhaps one of the greatest Schumann successes Dr. Muck has ever made since he became the Symphony conductor was with the "Manfred" overture. He has never shown remarkable enthusiasm for the type of romanticism which is Schumann's. He has inclined to the ingratiating kind of Schubert and to the aggressive kind of Strauss, he has been rather disinclined to the introspective kind of Schumann. But he got at the Schumann of "Manfred" on Friday with as much mastery as if one of the scores of the objective type of composer were on the desk before him.

St. Louis Daily Globe-Democrat

October 10,

MUCK'S ORCHESTRA PLAYS AS IF GUIDED BY UNSEEN POWER

Boston Symphony Reaches Its Climax in Richard Strauss' Number.

BY RICHARD SPAMER.

Great expectations as to what Dr. Karl Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra could do to evoke the amazement of St. Louis orchestra sharps were not only realized but far exceeded at the Odeon last night.

Even those conversant with this wonderful organization and its uncannily able conductor were surprised that these musicians, not inured to the hardship of long journeys, could do so well.

Playing in Symphony Hall, Boston, is one thing. Traveling hundreds of miles nightly and playing every day in a different auditorium filled with strangers, is quite another.

Boston knows its Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra knows its Boston. Leader and men cannot be expected to know even superficially the various cities visited on tour and Dr. Muck evidenced his unfamiliarity with St. Louis ways when he delayed the beginning of his concert last night many minutes beyond the advertised time simply because he believed the promptness of his Boston audiences must, by this time have become known far away from home and served as a worthy example to other communities.

Conductor Is Gracious.

Dr. Muck gave the audience more than ample time to assemble and expected he would be able to play the Beethoven Symphony without having the intervals between the four movements interrupted by latecomers. But the belated folk ordered otherwise. The allegro finished, there swarmed into the aisles hundreds of persons who delayed the continuation of the performance many minutes, disturbing the quiet of the house. The same thing occurred after the second movement and was repeated after the third. The tardy ones kept coming in after the Beethoven number was concluded, arriving in time, however, to partake of the ovation tendered to the dirigent who, to show his appreciation, asked his men to rise and bow acknowledgment.

Thanks to Max Zach of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and other visiting organizations, Beethoven's "Eroica" has come to be one of the master's best-known works. Dr. Muck's reading different from others in that the rendition was according to the Muck school of musical expression. He has his own well-developed ideas of accent, and these came forth in the scherzo in a truly charming manner.

Great Student of Beethoven.

The conductor's study of the Beethoven syncopations approaches profundity. He, like the best students of Shakespeare, has read new but perfectly warranted locutions into the text, giving the scherzo, for instance, an airier grace than merely nimble presentation would impart to it. Through it all Dr. Muck held to a somewhat formally classic expression. He is so sure of his men and they of him that hole sentences in this masterpiece were ayed without so much as a lift of the ton.

look was sufficient to give the various irs their cues. Nor was there the ntest intimation of artistic bravado this process. The coherence of the formance was, if anything, increased the use of what might truly be called chic force. Nor was this exhibition of rdependence lost upon the orchestra ps, although those "in the know" expected to see a display of the manners of the conductor.

or the audience as a whole, it pro- the calculated effect. There stood im, elegant figure at the desk, ngly immovable, and just beyond sat a liberal hundred of men and d as if under a spell. It was a fine one long to be remembered. Dr. 's classic pose here made a pretty re, and it informed lovers of orches- music just how much inordinate re- sal and devotion to duty was neces- to make safe such mutual reliance. h the conclusion of the "Eroica" the taking up of Liszt's symphonic "Hungaria," the conductor became nged man. That little white wand e air at sharp angles, it beat aston- g time with metronomic exactness the bizarre tonalities of the greatest one poets, the true progenitor of the gner cult, blared forth with uplifting iority. We heard sounds such as might sue if all the thirteen or more Hun- arian rhapsodies were being played at nce. Yet in all that seeming confusion there was clarity and even a measure of repose. Liszt's yearning strains, the gypsy-like songs came forth from that wondrous brass sections in truly entrancing beauty.

Evening's Tonal Apex.

But the great moment of the evening was Dr. Muck's presentation of the Wagner Siegfried Idyl, the scene in which the young hero, faring forth, enters the forest, hears the voices of the birds, which tell him—oh, so many things that birds can tell a fairy prince. Here the flutes, the oboes, the bassoons, the French horns, wrought their heavenly harmonies while an almost painful silence pervaded the house.

The memorable evening was brought to a reluctant close with Richard Strauss' symphonic tour de force. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Till, you know, was the careless wight, much given to revelry and ungodly glee. Few things found favor in his sight, and he was right from the start of his brief and inglorious career against that awful thing, yclept, "the established order."

The legends of mediaeval Germany are rich in legends about Till Eulenspiegel. Richard Strauss tells his entire story in this rondo-like work. The songs Till sings form part of the theme which is wrought in Strauss' finest fashion. The work is generous in its opportunities for the display of the Boston Symphony's colossal virtuosity. From the time Till Owlglass starts on his final prankish journey to the moment the halter tightens around his neck, we can trace his progress.

His is truly a short life and a merry one. The comic value of the story is most pronounced, and Dr. Muck's fiddlers told it all in almost so many words.

They are a fine lot of men, those Boston Symphony Orchestralists. They afforded some 2000 St. Louisans at the Odeon last night a superb musical diversion. Sorry their visits are so few and so far between.

ST. LOUIS REPUBLIC:

OCTOBER 10.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS PERFECTLY UNDER GREAT CHIEF

Audience Which Packs Odeon Is Spontaneously Enthusiastic Over Concert.

EVEN MAN ON KETTLE DRUM MUST BE RANKED AS ARTIST

Orchestra at Least 20 Pieces Better Than That of St. Louis, Dodge Says.

BY LOUIS DODGE.

When Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, mounted his platform at the Odeon last night and bowed to the audience, he faced such an assemblage as is not to be seen hereabouts more than a very few times in a season. It was a "capacity house," as the theatrical people say, and it was an audience of people who went to hear rather than to be seen.

There was a row of chairs down in front, put in temporarily to accommodate the overflow, and the balcony was packed. These are signs which greatly signify. Such an audience hasn't been seen in the Odeon since the last popular concert by our own Symphony Orchestra was given last spring.

The concert must have met the highest expectations of every individual who attended it. We have all heard so much about the Boston organization, and so few of us have heard it, that there might have been a bit of disappointment if the program hadn't been just right, and if Dr. Muck hadn't been in just the right mood. But the program couldn't have been improved upon, and Dr. Muck couldn't have been surpassed as a quiet, forceful leader, bent upon putting his best foot forward.

Dr. Muck Good Conductor.

For half an hour or so the conductor probably was more interesting to the audience than the orchestra or the program. There is, admittedly, something mysterious in those qualities which make one man a good conductor, while another man, seemingly quite as competent, isn't a good conductor at all. It isn't possible to say just what these qualities are.

But Dr. Muck is a good conductor. There is something quietly authoritative about him. He seems ever so much more than just a musician. You ~~might imagine him to be Disraeli come~~ back and employing a baton instead of aphorisms. The most unusual thing about him is that after you have deliberately set yourself the task of sizing him up you become quite unconscious of him. His influence is of a compact, inconspicuous kind. Coming back to him, in the midst of a number, you think of him as the exponent of the orchestra—using the word in its mathematical sense. There he stands, like the little symbol placed above the unknown quantity, an integral part of the whole, but causing the unknown quantity to be multiplied by itself.

Orchestra Better Than Ours.

That is how the orchestra plays, too—as if its effectiveness were being multiplied. It is better than our own orchestra. It is at least 20 men better, which is a good deal. But it seems better, too, because of its stability, its freedom from insecurity. It plays precisely as if it were a unit. It appears to have rarely fine instruments, and the finish of each musician is seen whenever there is a solo bit in a composition.

The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Liszt's "Hungaria," a symphonic poem; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The symphony, because, amazingly, a perfectly simple work, with an obvious architectural scheme in its first movement; a kind of universal sadness in the second movement (the "marcia funebre"), and a steadily progressive note of triumph in the two final movements. Such a work would doubtless present unsurmountable difficulties to the average understanding if it were not played perfectly. But everybody in the audience last night realized that it was being played perfectly.

Audience Enthusiastic.

The audience was as spontaneously enthusiastic as a throng at a circus. Everybody enjoyed it immensely. And Dr. Muck brought the members of the orchestra to their feet after he had acknowledged the applause two or three times himself. In fact, the orchestra had to get up several times [illegible] the evening was over.

The Liszt number was an admirable example of the resourcefulness of one of the most popular of all composers, and its wide extremes in tone quantity and quality enabled the orchestra again to prove the extraordinary accordance of its members.

The "Siegfried Idyl" was only a little Wagnerian. Throughout half its length it introduced no spookish note, though toward the end there was a somewhat mystical strain, introduced by the oboe, and this was succeeded by a period of that carefully arranged disorder of which Wagner was master. The work ends in a beautifully pensive manner, with the violin choirs singing a perfect love-song.

Kind Word for the Drummer.

The closing number belonged to the realm of "humorous" music. In such a mood as Strauss', a modern composer would evolve something called "A Trip Down the Midway," or "Seeing the Sights" "Till Eulenspiegel," whose merry pranks the work is supposed to portray, was not at all visualized, and the piece is beautiful, rather than humorous, save that it injects much grotesquerie among its strongly rhythmic melodies

We cannot turn away from even a brief consideration of the concert without writing a word about the whole-souled chap who played the kettle-drum. Is the kettle-drum an artistic instrument? It most assuredly is, though we never realized this fully until last night. It's like carrying a cigar into a powder factory to beat with full force upon a drum at long intervals during the playing of a symphony. But the man who plays the kettle-drum for the Boston band knows his business as completely as the concert-meister. He is quite as much an artist. And his single-hearted performance was simply typical of the manner in which all the other members of the orchestra played.

In the boxes were:

CHICAGO HERALD,

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays

By FELIX BOROWSKI

IT WOULD be difficult to set down exaggerated words of praise concerning the performance given at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. If the prospective beauty of this performance did not attract to the theater so large a gathering that every seat was sold, the numerous assemblage that was there gave to Dr. Muck, the director of the orchestra, and his musicians every reason to be convinced that their efforts had filled the listeners' hearts with joy. The applause was given often and heartily. Three times did the conductor have to motion to his men to rise and acknowledge with him the enthusiasm of the multitude. Much oftener than that he was constrained to turn to the people and to bow in his grave fashion.

As it is eight years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Chicago it will be obvious that its qualities of art are not very familiar to the concert-going portion of this community. When the organization played in the Auditorium in 1907 it was Dr. Muck who led it. In the period between that time and this Max Fiedler worked for four seasons his artistic will upon the orchestra, but in 1912 he gave way to the director who set forth his art in the Auditorium yesterday.

* * * * *

When Dr. Muck and the orchestra performed here last the charm of tone and the impeccable technique of the organization were the outstanding features of playing whose skill is approached by that of only few other orchestras in the world. Those qualities still are salient. Particularly is the tone of the strings of great richness and power. The conductor has reason indeed to carry in his heart a feeling of pride in the accomplishments of his strings. The wind instrument players also are of admirable worth, but the gifts of their colleagues in other orchestras—and in particular those in the Chicago Symphony Orchestra—have in a measure neutralized the astonishment which might be felt here for the abilities of performers on those instruments who are led by Dr. Muck.

The program which the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra interpreted was well adapted to disclose all the virtues of the organization. It began with the first symphony by Brahms. Now these symphonies are familiar creations to the public which takes its artistic joys in Orchestra Hall. Mr. Stock has played them lovingly and often. If it is stated here that Dr. Muck interpreted the C minor symphony rather less lovingly than his colleague, that statement is intended to signify that the visitor gave a reading of the work which placed more emphasis upon its austerity and that the dramatic excitements to which the Chicago orchestra has accustomed its patrons were replaced by an interpretation that was more introspective and more reserved. Yet the playing in it was of wonder-working beauty.

* * * * *

Dr. Muck did not employ his program as a peg upon which to hang only long-familiar masterpieces. At least one of his pieces was comparatively unknown. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria," is so little hackneyed that never once has it figured on the artistic schemes of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. As the concert was not provided with the admirable programatic explanations which Mr. Hale furnishes for the Boston audiences, it is well to state here that Liszt's composition was the outcome of some patriotic verses addressed to the composer in 1840 by Martin von Vörösmarty. It took however, a year or two before Liszt allowed the inspiration in the poetry to drive him to the creation of "Hungaria," and after he had begun it ten years elapsed before the work was finished.

That "Hungaria" pleased the public when it was produced at Budapest in 1856 must have been satisfying to so patriotic a musician as Liszt. "There was something better than applause. Men and women wept," wrote the composer. There was less outward demonstration of emotion in the Auditorium yesterday possibly because only a limited number of Hungarians were there to be moved by patriotic zeal and partly because the passage of nearly sixty years has worn away some of the impressiveness of Liszt's "effects." Perhaps the most sensational aspect of the music was the brilliant performance of it by the orchestra.

The remaining pieces were the Siegfried Idyl, by Wagner, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Dr. Muck could not have made more effective selections if his intention was to disclose—and presumably it was—the versatility of his musicians. The Siegfried Idyl was set forth with ravishing charm. The delicacy of the strings, their loveliness of tone, the poetry of the whole was enchanting to the ear. Strauss' Rondo asked for other qualities. The virtuosity of the work is its outstanding feature, and this virtuosity was exhileratingly set forth by the conductor and his men.

PERFORMANCE IS MARRED.

Auditorium Was Without Heat Last Night and Women In Evening Gowns Suffered Severely.

General regret was expressed last night and today that the pleasure of hearing the splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been marred by failure to have the interior of the Auditorium at a comfortable temperature. The big hall was as cold as the proverbial iceberg and women in evening dress suffered acutely. Several cases of indisposition as a result of this condition were reported today. Many said that they did not enjoy the concert because of their physical discomfort, and nearly all sat with wraps and coats on.

Mrs. Francis Henry Hill, whose series of musical entertainments opened with last night's concert, expressed sincere regret and today disclaimed responsibility for the lack of heat in the building. She said she had spent the evening in the box office, having assumed that the Auditorium management would have the building properly heated. H. G. Getchell, secretary of the Auditorium, said he had caused the heating plant to be started up in the afternoon, but that the musicians had advised James L. Davidson, president of the board of directors, that higher temperature might interfere with the effectiveness of the music. Getchell said, which possibly none will deny, that the temperature began to fall when the doors were opened and that the fire in the heating plant was not rekindled for fear that drafts caused by the fans which cause the warm air to circulate might prove an annoyance.

Mrs. Hill has given assurance that she will personally look after the heating of the building when future attractions are presented under her direction.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 10, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT A GREAT MUSICAL TREAT

Orchestra Recognized as One of Best in World Draws Big Crowd to Odeon.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

Dr. Muck, Conductor Who Was Decorated by Kaiser, Is Loudly Applauded.

By RICHARD L. STOKES.

A fine combination of superlatives—one of the best orchestras in the [illegible] [illegible] foremost living conductor [illegible] some of the most distinguished [illegible] ever written—resulted in a memorable exposition of orchestral music at its noblest, at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Odeon.

This orchestra has been pronounced by connoisseurs like Fritz Kreisler to be the most perfect in existence. Its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was decorated by Emperor William of Germany with the title of General Music Director—an honor which had been bestowed but thrice previously—upon Spontini, Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn. And then the Boston organization of musicians has an intimate local interest, in that it is the model upon which the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra is being constructed by Max Zach, formerly assistant director of the Boston orchestra. This body appeared here by invitation of the St. Louis Symphony Society, partly as a stirring object lesson as to what our own orchestra may in time become.

Odeon Filled to Overflowing.

These manifold attractions filled the Odeon to overflowing with a wildly enthusiastic audience, whose applause compelled Dr. Muck to bow again and again, and twice to call his musicians to their feet to share with him in the honors of the evening.

The group of compositions chosen to display the mettle of the orchestra was a most effective example of program making. It began with Beethoven's mighty Third Symphony, named by him Napoleon. Next came Liszt's thunderous symphonic poem, "Hungaria." It was followed by Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," a tender love song written as a birthday gift to his wife. As the climax, the concluding number was Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a composition of the modern realistic school, in which the orchestra is made to describe the clatter of broken china and the twitching of a knave's limbs as he is strangled on the scaffold.

All eyes were bent upon Dr. Muck as he took his place on the dais and as his musicians stole softly into the opening bars of the Beethoven symphony. They saw a man of small stature and gaunt features, apparently idling with a baton, the most exciting gesture of which seemed to describe a circumference of about half an inch. Sometimes he lifted a finger of his left hand, and sometimes he sent a swift glance toward one section of the orchestra or the other.

Witchery in Motions.

But these minute motions had a witchery which brought forth miracles from his orchestra. An almost imperceptible extension of his fingers, and from a whispering pianissimo the sound welled up into a sonority which seemed to make the roof reverberate. His fingers tightened slightly, and the sound vanished as if it had leaped off a sheer precipice. It was as if the master had built a perfect machine requiring only the lightest pressure of the finger to operate it, if indeed he could not stand aside and watch it run itself.

And then the audience became sensible of the fact that under the conductor's enchanted baton was flowing forth a luxury of luscious sound such as was never before heard in this city. Never have violins so sung and soared, or wood-winds spoken in such voices of pure silver, or horns chanted in such mellow and golden tones. The larger brass, for the most part, firmly subdued, provided an organ-like foundation for the rest, and only at rare moments was its tongue of thunder unleashed.

The first movement (Allegro) of the Beethoven Symphony was played with a restraint, with a delicacy and deftness of nuance, with a sure insight into its subtlest meanings, and at the same time with an underlying intensity of feeling, which stamped Dr. Muck as one in the first rank of interpreters. Then came the famous funeral march, which the audience applauded for several minutes, and the sprightly and delicious scherzo, which proved even more popular.

A Prolonged Demonstration.

The orchestra, held sternly within bounds throughout this symphony, was permitted to pour out all the length of the reins in the Liszt number, a wild and poignant Magyar composition, with a sharp rhythmic bite. The effect of Liszt's rhetorical employment of all the resources of the orchestra was electrifying, and brought forth a prolonged demonstration of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck and his musicians poetized in the Wagner idyl, a masterpiece of the greatest of musical delineators of love. This exquisite piece was in striking contrast to those which preceded, and that which followed it.

Into the musical narrative of the adventures of Till Eulenspiegel, orchestra and conductor threw the verve of a Rabelais relating the exploits of Pantagruel. The Strauss composition was not music in the old sense and did not aim to be—it had little concern with melodic line and harmony; it piled discord upon discord; it played in several keys at once; sometimes it seemed pandemonium roaring from bedlam. Yet its performance was such as to make it interesting music even to those unfamiliar with the story it was telling; and to those who knew it was a masterpiece of description.

The listeners heard medieval practical joker galloping into a group of

ST. LOUIS REPUBLIC:

OCTOBER 10,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS PERFECTLY UNDER GREAT CHIEF

Audience Which Packs Odeon Is Spontaneously Enthusiastic Over Concert.

EVEN MAN ON KETTLE DRUM MUST BE RANKED AS ARTIST

Orchestra at Least 20 Pieces Better Than That of St. Louis, Dodge Says.

BY LOUIS DODGE.

When Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, mounted his platform at the Odeon last night and bowed to the audience, he faced such an assemblage as is not to be seen hereabouts more than a very few times in a season. It was a "capacity house," as the theatrical people say, and it was an audience of people who went to hear rather than to be seen.

There was a row of chairs down in front, put in temporarily to accommodate the overflow, and the balcony was packed. These are signs which greatly signify. Such an audience hasn't been seen in the Odeon since the last popular concert by our own Symphony Orchestra was given last spring.

The concert must have met the highest expectations of every individual who attended it. We have all heard so much about the Boston organization, and so few of us have heard it, that there might have been a bit of disappointment if the program hadn't been just right, and if Dr. Muck hadn't been in just the right mood. But the program couldn't have been improved upon, and Dr. Muck couldn't have been surpassed as a quiet, forceful leader, bent upon putting his best foot forward.

Dr. Muck Good Conductor.

For half an hour or so the conductor probably was more interesting to the audience than the orchestra or the program. There is, admittedly, something mysterious in those qualities which make one man a good conductor, while another man, seemingly quite as competent, isn't a good conductor at all. It isn't possible to say just what these qualities are.

But Dr. Muck is a good conductor. There is something quietly authoritative about him. He seems ever so much more than just a musician. You might imagine him to be Disraeli come back and employing a baton instead of aphorisms. The most unusual thing about him is that after you have deliberately set yourself the task of sizing him up you become quite unconscious of him. His influence is of a compact, inconspicuous kind. Coming back to him, in the midst of a number, you think of him as the exponent of the orchestra—using the word in its mathematical sense. There he stands, like the little symbol placed above the unknown quantity, an integral part of the whole, but causing the unknown quantity to be multiplied by itself.

Orchestra Better Than Ours.

That is how the orchestra plays, too—as if its effectiveness were being multiplied. It is better than our own orchestra. It is at least 20 men better, which is a good deal, But it seems better, too, because of its stability, its freedom from insecurity. It plays precisely as if it were a unit. It appears to have rarely fine instruments, and the finish of each musician is seen whenever there is a solo bit in a composition.

The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Liszt's "Hungaria," a symphonic poem; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The symphony, because, amazingly, a perfectly simple work, with an obvious architectural scheme in its first movement; a kind of universal sadness in the second movement (the "marcia funebre"), and a steadily progressive note of triumph in the two final movements. Such a work would doubtless present unsurmountable difficulties to the average understanding if it were not played perfectly. But everybody in the audience last night realized that it was being played perfectly.

Audience Enthusiastic.

The audience was as spontaneously enthusiastic as a throng at a circus. Everybody enjoyed it immensely. And Dr. Muck brought the members of the orchestra to their feet after he had acknowledged the applause two or three times himself. In fact, the orchestra had to get up several times before the evening was

The Liszt number was an advirable example of the resourcefulness of one of the most popular of all composers, and its wide extremes in tone quantity and quality enabled the orchestra again to prove the extraordinary accordance of its members.

The "Siegfried Idyl" was only a little Wagnerian. Throughout half its length it introduced no spookish note, though toward the end there was a somewhat mystical strain, introduced by the oboe, and this was succeeded by a period of that carefully arranged disorder of which Wagner was master. The work ends in a beautifully pensive manner, with the violin choirs singing a perfect love-song.

Kind Word for the Drummer.

The closing number belonged to the realm of "humorous" music. In such a mood as Strauss', a modern composer would evolve something called "A Trip Down the Midway," or "Seeing the Sights" "Till Eulenspiegel," whose merry pranks the work is supposed to portray, was not at all visualized, and the piece is beautiful, rather than humorous, save that it injects much grotcsquerie among its strongly rhythmic melodies

We cannot turn away from even a brief consideration of the concert without writing a word about the whole-souled chap who played the kettle-drum. Is the kettle-drum an artistic instrument? It most assuredly is, though we never realized this fully until last night. It's like carrying a cigar into a powder factory to beat with full force upon a drum at long intervals during the playing of a symphony. But the man who plays the kettle-drum for the Boston band knows his business as completely as the concert-meister. He is quite as much an artist. And his single-hearted performance was simply typical of the manner in which all the other members of the orchestra played.

In the boxes were:

CHICAGO HERALD,

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays

By FELIX BOROWSKI

IT WOULD be difficult to set down exaggerated words of praise concerning the performance given at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. If the prospective beauty of this performance did not attract to the theater so large a gathering that every seat was sold, the numerous assemblage that was there gave to Dr. Muck, the director of the orchestra, and his musicians every reason to be convinced that their efforts had filled the listeners' hearts with joy. The applause was given often and heartily. Three times did the conductor have to motion to his men to rise and acknowledge with him the enthusiasm of the multitude. Much oftener than that he was constrained to turn to the people and to bow in his grave fashion.

As it is eight years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Chicago it will be obvious that its qualities of art are not very familiar to the concert-going portion of this community. When the organization played in the Auditorium in 1907 it was Dr. Muck who led it. In the period between that time and this Max Fiedler worked for four seasons his artistic will upon the orchestra, but in 1912 he gave way to the director who set forth his art in the Auditorium yesterday.

* * * * *

When Dr. Muck and the orchestra performed here last the charm of tone and the impeccable technique of the organization were the outstanding features of playing whose skill is approached by that of only few other orchestras in the world. Those qualities still are salient. Particularly is the tone of the strings of great richness and power. The conductor has reason indeed to carry in his heart a feeling of pride in the accomplishments of his strings. The wind instrument players also are of admirable worth, but the gifts of their colleagues in other orchestras—and in particular those in the Chicago Symphony Orchestra—have in a measure neutralized the astonishment which might be felt here for the abilities of performers on those instruments who are led by Dr. Muck.

The program which the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra interpreted was well adapted to disclose all the virtues of the organization. It began with the first symphony by Brahms. Now these symphonies are familiar creations to the public which takes its artistic joys in Orchestra Hall. Mr. Stock has played them lovingly and often. If it is stated here that Dr. Muck interpreted the C minor symphony rather less lovingly than his colleague, that statement is intended to signify that the visitor gave a reading of the work which placed more emphasis upon its austerity and that the dramatic excitements to which the Chicago orchestra has accustomed its patrons were replaced by an interpretation that was more introspective and more reserved. Yet the playing in it was of wonder-working beauty.

* * * * *

Dr. Muck did not employ his program as a peg upon which to hang only long-familiar masterpieces. At least one of his pieces was comparatively unknown. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria," is so little hackneyed that never once has it figured on the artistic schemes of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. As the concert was not provided with the admirable programatic explanations which Mr. Hale furnishes for the Boston audiences, it is well to state here that Liszt's composition was the outcome of some patriotic verses addressed to the composer in 1840 by Martin von Vörösmarty. It took however, a year or two before Liszt allowed the inspiration in the poetry to drive him to the creation of "Hungaria," and after he had begun it ten years elapsed before the work was finished.

That "Hungaria" pleased the public when it was produced at Budapest in 1856 must have been satisfying to so patriotic a musician as Liszt. "There was something better than applause. Men and women wept," wrote the composer. There was less outward demonstration of emotion in the Auditorium yesterday possibly because only a limited number of Hungarians were there to be moved by patriotic zeal and partly because the passage of nearly sixty years has worn away some of the impressiveness of Liszt's "effects." Perhaps the most sensational aspect of the music was the brilliant performance of it by the orchestra.

The remaining pieces were the Siegfried Idyl, by Wagner, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Dr. Muck could not have made more effective selections if his intention was to disclose—and presumably it was—the versatility of his musicians. The Siegfried Idyl was set forth with ravishing charm. The delicacy of the strings, their loveliness of tone, the poetry of the whole was enchanting to the ear. Strauss' Rondo asked for other qualities. The virtuosity of the work is its outstanding feature, and this virtuosity was exhileratingly set forth by the conductor and his men.

PERFORMANCE IS MARRED.

Auditorium Was Without Heat Last Night and Women In Evening Gowns Suffered Severely.

General regret was expressed last night and today that the pleasure of hearing the splendid Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been marred by failure to have the interior of the Auditorium at a comfortable temperature. The big hall was as cold as the proverbial iceberg and women in evening dress suffered acutely. Several cases of indisposition as a result of this condition were reported today. Many said that they did not enjoy the concert because of their physical discomfort, and nearly all sat with wraps and coats on.

Mrs. Francis Henry Hill, whose series of musical entertainments opened with last night's concert, expressed sincere regret and today disclaimed responsibility for the lack of heat in the building. She said she had spent the evening in the box office, having assumed that the Auditorium management would have the building properly heated. H. G. Getchell, secretary of the Auditorium, said he had caused the heating plant to be started up in the afternoon, but that the musicians had advised James L. Davidson, president of the board of directors, that higher temperature might interfere with the effectiveness of the music. Getchell said, which possibly none will deny, that the temperature began to fall when the doors were opened and that the fire in the heating plant was not rekindled for fear that drafts caused by the fans which cause the warm air to circulate might prove an annoyance.

Mrs. Hill has given assurance that she will personally look after the heating of the building when future attractions are presented under her direction.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 10, 1915.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT A GREAT MUSICAL TREAT

Orchestra Recognized as One of Best in World Draws Big Crowd to Odeon.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

Dr. Muck, Conductor Who Was Decorated by Kaiser, Is Loudly Applauded.

By RICHARD L. STOKES.

A fine combination of superlatives—one of the best orchestras in the world, [illegible] foremost living conductors and playing some of the most distinguished music ever written—resulted in a memorable exposition of orchestral music at its noblest, at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Odeon.

This orchestra has been pronounced by connoisseurs like Fritz Kreisler to be the most perfect in existence. Its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was decorated by Emperor William of Germany with the title of General Music Director—an honor which had been bestowed but thrice previously—upon Spontini, Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn. And then the Boston organization of musicians has an intimate local interest, in that it is the model upon which the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra is being constructed by Max Zach, formerly assistant director of the Boston orchestra. This body appeared here by invitation of the St. Louis Symphony Society, partly as a stirring object lesson as to what our own orchestra may in time become.

Odeon Filled to Overflowing.

These manifold attractions filled the Odeon to overflowing with a wildly enthusiastic audience, whose applause compelled Dr. Muck to bow again and again, and twice to call his musicians to their feet to share with him in the honors of the evening.

The group of compositions chosen to display the mettle of the orchestra was a most effective example of program making. It began with Beethoven's mighty Third Symphony, named by him Napoleon. Next came Liszt's thunderous symphonic poem, "Hungaria." It was followed by Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," a tender love song written as a birthday gift to his wife. As the climax, the concluding number was Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a composition of the modern realistic school, in which the orchestra is made to describe the clatter of broken china and the twitching of a knave's limbs as he is strangled on the scaffold.

All eyes were bent upon Dr. Muck as he took his place on the dais and as his musicians stole softly into the opening bars of the Beethoven symphony. They saw a man of small stature and gaunt features, apparently idling with a baton, the most exciting gesture of which seemed to describe a circumference of about half an inch. Sometimes he lifted a finger of his left hand, and sometimes he sent a swift glance toward one section of the orchestra or the other.

Witchery in Motions.

But these minute motions had a witchery which brought forth miracles from his orchestra. An almost imperceptible extension of his fingers, and from a whispering pianissimo the sound welled up into a sonority which seemed to make the roof reverberate. His fingers tightened slightly, and the sound vanished as if it had leaped off a sheer precipice. It was as if the master had built a perfect machine requiring only the lightest pressure of the finger to operate it, if indeed he could not stand aside and watch it run itself.

And then the audience became sensible of the fact that under the conductor's enchanted baton was flowing forth a luxury of luscious sound such as was never before heard in this city. Never have violins so sung and soared, or wood-winds spoken in such voices of pure silver, or horns chanted in such mellow and golden tones. The larger brass, for the most part, firmly subdued, provided an organ-like foundation for the rest, and only at rare moments was its tongue of thunder unleashed.

The first movement (Allegro) of the Beethoven Symphony was played with a restraint, with a delicacy and deftness of nuance, with a sure insight into its subtlest meanings, and at the same time with an underlying intensity of feeling, which stamped Dr. Muck as one in the first rank of interpreters. Then came the famous funeral march, which the audience applauded for several minutes, and the sprightly and delicious scherzo, which proved even more popular.

A Prolonged Demonstration.

The orchestra, held sternly within bounds throughout this symphony, was permitted to pour out all the length of the reins in the Liszt number, a wild and poignant Magyar composition, with a sharp rhythmic bite. The effect of Liszt's rhetorical employment of all the resources of the orchestra was electrifying, and brought forth a prolonged demonstration of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck and his musicians poetized in the Wagner idyl, a masterpiece of the greatest of musical delineators of love. This exquisite piece was in striking contrast to those which preceded, and that which followed it.

Into the musical narrative of the adventures of Till Eulenspiegel, orchestra and conductor threw the verve of a Rabelais relating the exploits of Pantagruel. The Strauss composition was not music in the old sense and did not aim to be—it had little concern with melodic line and harmony; it piled discord upon discord; it played in several keys at once; sometimes it seemed pandemonium roaring from bedlam. Yet its performance was such as to make it interesting music even to those unfamiliar with the story it was telling; and to those who knew it was a masterpiece of description.

The listeners heard medieval practical joker galloping into a group of market women and scattering their china into crashing fragments; they heard him speak in unctuous accents in his stolen vestments of a priest; and finally, when he was laid by the heels, heard him pleading in vain for mercy and finally dangling on the gallows.

The .Boston. Symphony Orchestra which is in its thiryt-fifth season has been made possible by the generosity of Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker. As money goes, it has not cost him an exorbitant sum to build this world-famous monument to his name.

From the beginning he pledged himself to meet the deficits incurred by the organization, and the total which he has expended amounts to something less than $1,000,000, which, distributed over more than 30 years, makes a yearly average of something like $30,000.

ST. JOSEPH NEWS-PRESS,
OCTOBER 9, 1915.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at the Auditorium last night to an almost capacity house. The event was an auspicious beginning to the season's concert course under the direction of Mrs. Fraucis Henry Hill, St. Joseph's enterprising impresario.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is perhaps the greatest musical organization the world has ever known and it was received with great enthusiasm by the audience here. The "team work" has been brought to a perfection that leaves nothing to be desired. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, has his men trained to such a high development of perfect accord that sometimes passages written for one set of instruments were mistaken for solos, by the uninitiated. The program was a most delightful one and was played with singular beauty of interpretation.

The concert opened with Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8, F Major, Opus 93," with the allegro vivace e con brio movement. The second movement, allegretto scherzando, was fascinating in its rippling, laughing theme, played chiefly by the strings against the oboes and clarinets, every phrase echoed by the basses. The following tempo di minuetto was in contrast, given with dignity and yet gayety of character, and the closing allegro vivace, F major, exemplified sudden changes of harmonies.

Next was the charming overture to Weber's "Oberon," brimful of delicious fairy music, varied with melodies of more earthly themes and ending in a brilliant close. Most enjoyed by the audience were the two following numbers, "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Bizet's suite. The former has a wild, reckless theme suggestive of all the joy of a gypsy's life, and in its endless variations and repetitions, carried out by seemingly every possible combination in the orchestra, impressed and completely satisfied. The alborada movement, or morning serenade, has a peculiar freshness; in the second movement, the variations, the dialogue between the horns was especially effective and the closing movements, scene and gypsy song and fandango of the Asturias, were no less pleasing.

The Bizet suite was made wonderfully expressive. Here the tragedy of the theme is alternated with the dance movement and with the calm beauty of the strains that typify the love of the elder couple. Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" was a brilliant conclusion introducing the many themes of the opera and ending in a combination of all of them.

So great is the art of the conductor and those who compose this remarkable band of men that their art is forgotten by the listener. They interpret the music so wonderfully that the means of its production are obscured. It is so marvelously flawless, so far above criticism, that the hearer is conscious only of the moods and ideas that existed in the mind of the composer.

It is earnestly to be hoped that the success of last evening will result in a return of the orchestra to St. Joseph. The next number in the Hill concert series will be Mme. Melba, who will sing at the Auditorium Dec. 6, assisted by Beatrice Harrison, cellist; Robert Parker, baritone, and Frank St. Legere, pianist.

News, Friday, October 8, 1915.

CHARITY SERIES' SUCCESS ASSURED

Associated Retailers Declare Boston Players' Audience Satisfactory.

ORCHESTRA PLEASES MANY

Following the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium last night, the first of the charity series being given by the Associated Retailers, Louis S. Nash announced that the guarantee for the series is assured. [illegible] single admission tickets will be purchased [illegible] to pay for the series and all tickets sold henceforth through efforts of charity workers or their friends will be practically clear money for Omaha charity.

Exceed Prospects.

George Brandeis said that financially, the concert series began better than the retailers expected.

"We ran out of tickets last night and used card board slips to handle sales at the door," Brandeis said. "I can see a big fund for charity, to come from this series. I predict that the next concert, by Geraldine Farrar, will attract more people than the Boston orchestra did."

The Boston orchestra cost $5,000. The money was paid by check last night, not taking half of the fund from season ticket sales.

Nearly 4,000 people heard the concert.

"I am optimistic over the outlook for results of this effort to raise money for charity," Charles C. Belden of the retailers' committee, said. "The people last night were all pleased, and they will tell their friends about the series, and persuade more to attend next time.

When Dr. Karl Muck, director of the orchestra, waved his baton for the first notes from his 100 players Thursday evening he faced one of the biggest audiences ever assembled in the Auditorium.

The opening of the concert series, under auspices of the Associated Retailers of Omaha, drew local residents and Ak-Sar-Ben visitors, society and musical folk.

Autos Crowd Street.

For an hour a line of automobiles extended from the Auditorium door to Sixteenth street, while the streets were parked with cars in every direction.

The entrance to the carnival grounds blazed on the men and women as they went in the canvas-covered entrance to the Auditorium, but the noises were stilled and the promise that no brass band should set up a rival voice was adhered to strictly.

It was the first appearance in Omaha of the Boston symphony, which enjoys the reputation of being the greatest organization of this kind in the country. It was expected that the work of this orchestra would be as near perfection as it could be made, and this was the concensus of opinion.

A Lace Work of Sounds.

A veritable lacework of beautiful sounds is woven by the instruments under Dr. Muck's quiet baton. This leader has no idiosyncrasies or superfluous movements, and his hair is neatly trimmed, just like that of a business man.

He presented the same kind of program he would give in his native Boston, omitting the popular "Humoresque" and variations on "Last Rose of Summer."

He responded to no encores, although he was called out several times at the close of the concert by the thoroughly pleased audience. Most of the program was familiar.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was given here by Walter Damrosch last spring, and the "Preludes" by Liszt, with their melody and charming passages, have been on the programs of many orchestras playing here. Dr. Muck, who is a famous interpreter of Wagner, brought out the storm and stress of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. The other numbers were the caprice on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff and the suite "L'Arlesienne" by Bizet.

EVENING WORLD-HERALD:

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8,

OVATION FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, Upholds His Reputation as a Musician.

Five of World's Greatest Musical Celebrities to Be Heard in Omaha.

BY A. M. BORGLUM.

The first appearance in Omaha of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium last evening was the occasion for the gathering of an audience which filled this large building from the front rows of the parquet to the last rows of the balcony. The audience comprised not only a large part of the social and musical element of the city, but also many of the visitors who are here for the Ak-Sar-Ben festivities.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, whose reputation as a musician of the highest standing in the country and whose position as head of the Boston Symphony orchestra gives him an enviable standing, was treated with rather a reverential reception at the opening number; this later warmed up to most enthusiastic applause, developing into [illegible] two or three occasions [illegible] selections which pleased the audience the most. The listeners became especially effusive in their approbation when Dr. Muck on two occasions permitted his orchestra to rise.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert is the first of a series of five concerts to be given this winter under the auspices of the Associated Retailers of Omaha. The series will include five of the greatest musical celebrities before the world today, and the net profits will be given over to charity.

Epoch in Music Here.

The presentation of these artists by the retailers' association marks an epoch in the musical history of Omaha, inasmuch as it is the first organized effort by the business men for the promotion of music on a grand scale. If it had not been for the retailers' association Omaha would have gone without these concerts, for every other source had failed. But from the signing of the contract up to the present time there has been most enthusiastic support and co-operation from every source, with the result that the movement has been and is destined to be a final tremendous success.

This response of the public, the support of the press and the enthusiasm shown last night are all sufficiently convincing that there exists a spirit for the development of music in this community which needs but to be awakened.

The committee in charge of the concerts is composed of Charles C. Belden, George Brandeis and Louis Nash, with Lucius Pryor as local manager. And there is every reason to believe that this will only be the beginning of substantial promotion and support of musical institutions by commercial interests and that at no distant day Omaha will be able to put forward a symphony orchestra of which it will be proud, and that will be a credit to the city in every respect.

Program Familiar to Omaha.

The program presented by Dr. Muck comprised numbers which are all more or less familiar to Omaha audiences, the Symphony having been given in the spring by Mr. Walter Damrosch, and the other numbers by other orchestras within the last two or three years. The previous performances have, however, prepared us for the art and mastery of Dr. Muck and his superb organization. The Beethoven Symphony No. 7, with its joyous mirthful character and the natural tendencies which this might lead to, was treated in a very tactful and reserved manner in dynamics and tempos. There was, however, a subtle virility throughout, manifest not only in the movements requiring delicacy, but also in the grand climaxes. The "quail-call" rhythm in the first movement was treated with quiet, but sparkling animation, leading up to rather an interesting climax. A characteristic of the Allegretto movement was the almost andante tempo given it; the interest did not lag, however, but permitted the full development of its beautiful themes and their full enjoyment. The Scherzo was conspicuous for the delicacy of its movement and tone, while the Allegro and final movement was given all the animation and dash possible, the tempo being kept at a point of terrific hilarity from start to finish. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Seventh Symphony may be summed up as reverential, refined and in admirable proportion from beginning to end.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," by Wagner, was interpreted with a great variety of tone color, vigorous rhythms and passionate effects bringing out all the possibilities of the orchestra and conductor.

Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The brilliant Caprice on Spanish Themes, with its typical flavor and intoxicating rhythms, lacked nothing in local color and proved a trip to Spain for those who have a versatile imagination. Nothing could be more characteristic than the interpretation given by Dr. Muck, typifying, as it did, all the fire and grace of the Latin race, bordering on the Moorish.

The Arlesienne Suite No. 1, with its many and varied beauties, so full of the brilliant colors and tender pathos of southern French life, was very well understood and well rendered, the massive and vigorous character of the prelude being brought out in virile fashion. The minuette in waltz form, with its beautiful melodic phrases and delicate accompaniment proved very refreshing, while it remained for the adagietto to show the most exquisite tonal ensemble and admirable legato of the strings. It was a delight. The Carillon, with its sonorous chimes and rural gaiety, ends the suite in a fitting fashion.

"The Preludes" has become by this time familiar to Omaha audiences, as it has been given by almost every orchestra that has visited here. Besides, its tuneful melodic phrases make it easy for most ears to remember. It received a new attractiveness under the hand of Dr. Muck.

An interesting feature of the evening was the incidental solo work by Anton Witek, the celebrated violinist, who is the concert meister of the orchestra. Some of Omaha's violin students have studied with Mr. Witek.

The remaining artists in this series will be:

Geraldine Farrar.
Madame Melba.
Paderewski.
Fritz Kreisler.

[30]

DAILY NEWS.
OCTOBER 11.

DR. KARL MUCK LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Performance of Modern Classics Given Yesterday at Auditorium.

OF SUPREME EXCELLENCE

On Program Were Represented Two Extremes of Standard Modern Compositions.

BY STANLEY K. FAYE.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Chicago yesterday after an eight year absence and formally opened the concert season with a performance of modern classics in the Auditorium theater. Though their fame and their claim to pre-eminence has in late years taken on some of the slighter hues of the circus poster, the concert of yesterday amply justified every assertion of excelence that has ever been made for them.

On the program were represented the two extremes of standard modern compositions—Brahms' first symphony for the classicists, and for the freer thinkers Liszt's ninth symphonic poem, "Hungaria"; Wagner's "Siegirled Idyl," and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss. The Daily News has received at least two protests against this collocation of the pure Brahms with his earthly contemporaries, but to less reverent ears the program was highly satisfactory.

Brahms a Problem in Performance.

Brahms is a problem in performance, because most people refuse to appreciate him in his more ambitious manifestatons. In the first movement of this first symphony we have Brahms in his most difficult aspect, impeccably correct, but as devoid of grace as is a formal garden. This movement was played with austerity and an ascetic regard for what may be called musical mathematics.

But with the ensuing andante, what a change! Here is the link between poetic thought and harmony of tone. The utmost Philistine must make genuflection in this presence. Such holy sounds rise to the ear of Sandalphon, the angel of prayer, and well from the heart string lute of that other angel, Israfel, or transcend all things in the music of the spheres and of the stars that sing.

This tenuous effect of the instruments is marked "sostenuto," and under Dr. Muck's direction the word takes on a new meaning. Only the human voice can surpass the subtlety with which the diaphanous strains of tone were made to hang suspended, imponderable, in the air.

Harmony of the Ensemble.

It is sordid to think what labor must have been expended to train the men of the orchestra into such concord. Of course, the strings are all important, but several times the wood winds made their perfection so apparent that they must be accorded equal importance. The harmony of the ensemble is quite extraordinary.

This harmonious result is not attained by the players alone. It is as much resultant from the peculiar qualities of Dr. Muck, who keeps his men as if under a strong pressure that his firm hand may momentarily relieve. This was especially noticeable in the vigorous last movement, with its reminiscence of Beethoven's ninth sympony, in which the resilience of tone was remarkable.

Liszt's "Hungaria," which the Chicago orchestra has never played, suffered somewhat in anticlimax. It is less vivid, but its strong points were brought out well, as was the delicacy of the Siegfried idyl. "Till Eulenspiegel" played about much as he does under the eye of Frederick Stock.

CHICAGO DAILY JOURNAL

OCTOBER 11.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT IN AUDITORIUM; FIRST IN EIGHT YEARS

If the Boston Symphony orchestra performed no other service in its brief visit to the Auditorium yesterday afternoon, the first since 1907, it at least aroused considerable interest in orchestra playing as such. Long after the concert was over and the audience had dispersed, knots of hearers stood in the vicinity of the theater and hotel, eagerly arguing its merits and weaknesses, compared with those of every other symphony orchestra in America and Europe. For once there was discussion over an orchestra, and discussion is a good thing for the cause of music.

That is a supberb organization capable of giving a magnificent performance is unquestionable. That its playing is worth 100 per cent more to the community than any other orchestra, speaking in terms of the box office, is equally unquestionable. It is not 100 per cent better, nor anything like it. Where it surpasses other organizations, judging from yesterday's performance, is in certain small details, the individual playing of one artist over another artist. At times the balance even leaned the other way. In the broad masses of entire sections, there was frequently little to choose between it and other orchestras, and then the choice frequently became a matter of taste.

The string section was extremely good. Charting the isotherms of genius is an uncertain matter, but it would seem that the pressure in this region was highly favorable. So is it also in the Chicago Symphony orchestra; so is it to a marked degree in the New York Philharmonic. Anton Witek, the concertmeister, was a tower of strength among the first violins, except that in his solo passages he played persistently and exasperatingly off pitch. In the wood wind section, the first oboist, Longy, displayed himself as the finest performer on this instrument of anyone who has visited Chicago within a reasonable memory, the first clarinetist—names except in a few instances were not furnished—was not quite as good as Schreurs of the Chicago organization, the flutist a little better than what we are accustomed to, the bassoonist a little better, the ensemble about the same. The brass section, being of larger dimensions than customary, produced a tone slightly more brilliant than do the Chicago players; the first trumpeter, competent and safe, was not the equal of Chicago's. In all 101 men were announced to play, or five more than the Chicago Symphony orchestra at full strength.

So much for the organization; the conductor, Dr. Carl Muck deserves to stand by himself and without comparison. He looks like a mixture of John Drew and Napoleon, the whole slightly Teutonized; he conducts as one might imagine such a combination might, were the two musicians. He is at once suave and strong, elastic and firm, impassioned and cool. In other words, he does what a highly educated, imaginative, sanely thinking, deeply feeling musician ought to do, but what so few are able to do. He is a great man among musicians, and his greatness was well displayed in a programme of many sides.

Be it known that Dr. Muck has not sufficient respect for the late comers at a concert to make his first number a short one. He plunged at once into the symphony, Brahms' first, the C minor it was in this instance. It was a very calm, serene Brahms that he brought before his hearers. Respectability stalked unchecked throughout the performance, and bliss reigned supreme among that part of the hearers who think that musical art stopped short with the bearded Johannes.

The second half was more varied. Liszt's little-known symphonic poem, "Hungaria," was given forth with enough paprika to nearly cause forgetfulness of the fact that the original brew is exceedingly thin stuff; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" sang its gentle measures as soothingly as though it were intended for its original invalid hearer; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was impishness, impudence, and high spirits raised to the level of a fine art.

It was a fine concert, ma played, but, except as a standa followed, there is no reason why forget our own orchestra.

Emmy Destinn's return to Am eral times delayed, is now tenta for Oct. 13. A number of her r pearances in California and the have been canceled. She is still to appear in "La Gioconda" on N opening performance of the Chic association.

The George Hamlin prize of $ best aria for tenor and orches
American composer has been Carlo Minetti of Pittsburg. mention is given to "Columbus"
Siemonn, a resident of New Yor

Charles Dalmores, tenor, will shortly come to America to sin here and concert elsewhere. H
Coppet, Switzerland, recupera protracted services in the Frenc

From another Swiss city, Luc the Diarghileff Russian ballet ing, word comes that two scene added to its repertoire, one fr
Korsakoff's "Sadko," in the pa river-god under the waves; th melting of the snow-maiden i embrace in the forest, from the poser's "Snegourotchka."

EDWARD C

THE BEE: OMAHA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8,

SPIRIT OF MUSIC AT FIRST CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Draws Delighted Audience to Auditorium to Begin Charity Course.

PROGRAM ONE OF WONDERS

By THOMAS J. KELLY.

Last night the Spirit of Music Visited Omaha.

It was through the medium of the most noted band of players upon instruments in the world. The Boston Symphony orchestra. The wand which brought the manifestation was in the hand of Dr. Karl Muck.

Omaha felt the presence and potency of the spiritual visitant and was glad.

The occasion was the opening of the course of concerts undertaken by the Associated Retailers of Omaha and known as the Charity Concert Course, because of the fact that the profits will go to Sweet Charity.

If there has been just one thing which has acted in a way as a "brake" on Omaha's progress it has been the ancient old grouch bearing the name of "Precedent."

Good-Bye to Precedent.

"Precedent" has kept more good from being accomplished than almost any other cause. "We must not establish a precedent," had been the funeral anthem of many a splendid project and many a good man and many a good woman. It is un-American. It is only the proverbial Englishman who is credited with the remark "You know we have never done it that way."

Last night the Associated Retailers took the old fossil "Precedent" out of his cave, broke his backbone beyond possibility of repair and gently but completely kicked the corpse out of doors.

And in all reverence let us say "Thank God!"

The business men of Omaha who have made King Ak-Sar-Ben the most popular of reigning monarchs (as well as the [illegible] and sanest), those men who have made the "week of weeks" in Omaha [illegible] annual joyfest and jubilee, have [illegible] the "brake" off, and precedent, [illegible] will be a thing of the past.

[illegible] Enterprise Endorsed.

[illegible] which assembled at the [illegible] proved to the Associated Retail action in presenting this of concerts was tremendo

They have surely no re their action and every proud. Any future music taken by them or given reaction will be sure to w great cities are noted f which are "unseen and e as for the things which temporal," Omaha has speindid step forward.

Dr. Muck Expresse

The audience was as f
tion of people as one n
where and gave the m might almost say devoti every musical offering.
dience which made every of his city. Dr. Muck to the present reviewer, and also of the Audito said surpassed most of those he had encountered, and especially made a glowing comparison with one very famous American city. (Not Boston).

The suppression of outside noises was complete, and the governors of Ak-Sar-Ben deserve to be apprised of the public appreciation of their solution of a real difficulty. Governor Black promised that there would be no disturbance, and he kept his word. There was one single toot from an automobile horn at the beginning of a phrase by the clarinet in one of the numbers and it was in tune, in fact exactly an octave below!

Wonders of the Orchestra.

With such a wonderful organization of players, one hundred and one, to be exact, it is possible to do things which are not within the scope of the smaller orchestral bodies which have visited here from time to time, and the orchestra last night was a revelation, even to those who knew that they were to have the treat of their lives. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, like Woman, needs no eulogy. It speaks for itself. One could exhaust adjectives for a column and leave much unsaid. Strings which were actually spiritualized, flutes which were like celestial shells from which pearls were blown, clarinets which sounded as if they had been found in the Isles of the Blessed, oboes which sounded like the one which the great god Pan played when he "drew the pith like the heart of a man, from the reed which grew in the river." The brilliant sunshine of the trumpets, and trombones, —splendour without glare,—the gentle "rain-showers" of the tympani and drums, played pianissimo: all these things will never be forgotten by those who heard them last night.

Majesty of Conductor.

And over all, and above all, or rather behind all, was the person of Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of conductors of all time. One says advisedly, "behind all," for he is of the quiet type

In his conducting, he never exaggerates; he never gets between the listener and the work. It is the true domination of the spirit of man.

As the "Flying Dutchman" overture was being played one could not but think of the fact that Dr. Muck has for years been conducting at Bayreuth, the shrine of the Richard Wagner musical philosophy and of the Music of the Future. It seemed as though one could feel the actual atmosphere of the great temple and of its most illustrious founder, the great Wagner, as the overture unfolded itself.

Would it not have been better to have opened the program with this number rather than the Symphony? Omaha will not arrive in time even for the Boston Symphony Orchestra: in this respect Omaha audiences should listen to friendly advice. Omaha is alive, very much alive, and should never have to be alluded to as "the late Miss Omaha."

Beauties of Beethoven.

The Symphony, in A major, known everywhere as "No. 7," was a great delight. It has no "program" that is, it is not descriptive, and some have therefore called it the "Romantic" symphony, in contrast to the "Eroica" and the "Pastoral." One can just sit still and drink in its beauties, without wondering what anything means. It is the symphony which Beethoven considered one of his very greatest works. Many people en[illegible] last night who never

Wagner..........
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman
Rimsky-Korsakoff..................
....Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause)
Bizet..............................
Suit, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1. Music to Alphonse Daudet's Play.
I. Prelude.
II. Minuetto.
III. Adagietto.
IV. Carillon.
Liszt..............................
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine).

CHICAGO EVENING P

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

Boston Symphony At Auditorium

By Karleton Hackett.

TO ONE BORN and raised under the aegis of the Sacred Codfish the mere name "Boston Symphony Orchestra" has an awe-inspiring sound. All our earliest impressions of music were gained from this orchestra and all of us Bostonians grew up with the instinctive feeling this represented the ultimate goal of symphonic art. A thing so bred in the bone of a race as tenacious as the New Englanders colors a man's whole cast of thought, so it is with something more than diffidence that I venture to express the feelings evoked by the playing of this famous orchestra under the baton of Dr. Muck.

It is an extraordinary organization, a mighty instrument as sensitive to the wand of the conductor as his own hands, and responsive to his slightest indication with an elasticity that bespeaks the capacity of the individuals and the relentless routine

[illegible] prevails [illegible] virtuosity their playing is [illegible] mortal mind can conceive of as [illegible] The Liszt symphonic poem, "Hungaria," was tremendous in virility, and the Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," the most brilliant display of orchestral virtuosity.

The opening movements of the Brahms symphony in C minor, No. 1, left me cold. Everything was there with absolute distinctness, but it seemed as tho the score had been studied with the precision of the mathematical mind to discover each minute detail, each shade of color, each contrapuntal device in an inner voice, and everything was brought out save only the heart, which had ceased beating. It was rather the artioulation of the scientist, in the labratory than the living thing as it came forth from the artist's fancy.

It made Brahms appear even the more severe academician than his enemies have dared to paint him, and while it was wonderfully conceived and evidently exactly what Dr. Muck intended, it was almost repellant in its aloof self-containedness. The outlines were so clear-cut that they became hard, and the tone colors in place of blending together into a perfect harmonic texture stood apart in contrasting shades of antogonism. It was a construction not a creation; a thing made with extraordinary skill yet lacking the spark which should vivify it into a living entity.

In the allegretto there came a change, a softening of the outlines, a plasticity that caught the more genial mood of the music, and that led us into the adagio of ovement in the manner we ex-this famous orchestra. The nt of the symphony was noble n and beautiful in the manner n—broad, sustained, with the the everlasting hills and the e sun breaking thru the clouds r afternoon.
ve been precisely this contrast Muck believed essential to the the music, but there seemed flaw in the working out. It t the first two movements were that they sounded mechanical;
ng spirit was lacking which ve given us the clew. Severity understand in Brahms, but it rity of thought, the repression sed to the strictest self-analy-mere calculation of the means.
ot been for the illumination of vo movements I should have d to distrust the evidence of my but the thing which was so sent in the first two movements iously present at the close that be no question.
ngaria" had the dominating was magnificent, concentrated npact mass that moved to its a power that was irresistible.
he grasp of the whole, with deuisite variety, yet all tributary idea, and it all came to us with tread of a great host marching ts blowing and banners spread.
fried Idyl" was lovely, as warm as plastic in outline as tho the chard Wagner himself had been en as they played; and well it been, for if any man has been this spirit it is Dr. Muck.
many artists it is hardly fair few, yet the program was so at it was impossible not to nonarkable beauty of the playing oboist. The wood-wind choir of ation is famous, and most deand the brass choir was won-ellow and sonorous. Anton oncertmaster, played the obblithority and a tone of domina-tho not of very beautiful ss "Till Eulenspiegel," with program closed, was a feat of irtuosity, yet in which this skill properly applied to the matter
o make the meaning come out must be done just in this way, and the virtuosity was merely incidental to the thing itself.

Coming to what concerns us most nearly here in Chicago, it was impossible not to feel the beauty which the tone of the orchestra has in the Auditorium. The laws of acoustics are even to the experts almost a sealed book, but whatever the cause the Auditorium is the place in which to listen to music. The tone of the orchestra takes on a richness of quality, a mellowness, that is of a perfect beauty nowhere else to be found. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a wonderful organization, with famous artists playing upon the finest of instruments, and it was both their good fortune and ours that we were permitted to hear them in the Auditorium.

MEMORANDA

W. E. WALTER

SYMPHONY HALL - - BOSTON, MASS.

[31]

CHICAGO DAILY JOURNAL.

OCTOBER 11.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT IN AUDITORIUM; FIRST IN EIGHT YEARS

If the Boston Symphony orchestra performed no other service in its brief visit to the Auditorium yesterday afternoon, the first since 1907, it at least aroused considerable interest in orchestra playing as such. Long after the concert was over and the audience had dispersed, knots of hearers stood in the vicinity of the theater and hotel, eagerly arguing its merits and weaknesses, compared with those of every other symphony orchestra in America and Europe. For once there was discussion over an orchestra, and discussion is a good thing for the cause of music.

That is a supberb organization capable of giving a magnificent performance is unquestionable. That its playing is worth 100 per cent more to the community than any other orchestra, speaking in terms of the box office, is equally unquestionable. It is not 100 per cent better, nor anything like it. Where it surpasses other organizations, judging from yesterday's performance, is in certain small details, the individual playing of one artist over another artist. At times the balance even leaned the other way. In the broad masses of entire sections, there was frequently little to choose between it and other orchestras, and then the choice frequently became a matter of taste.

The string section was extremely good. Charting the isotherms of genius is an uncertain matter, but it would seem that the pressure in this region was highly favorable. So is it also in the Chicago Symphony orchestra; so is it to a marked degree in the New York Philharmonic. Anton Witek, the concertmeister, was a tower of strength among the first violins, except that in his solo passages he played persistently and exasperatingly off pitch. In the wood wind section, the first oboist, Longy, displayed himself as the finest performer on this instrument of anyone who has visited Chicago within a reasonable memory, the first clarinetist—names except in a few instances were not furnished—was not quite as good as Schreurs of the Chicago organization, the flutist a little better than what we are accustomed to, the bassoonist a little better, the ensemble about the same. The brass section, being of larger dimensions than customary, produced a tone slightly more brilliant than do the Chicago players; the first trumpeter, competent and safe, was not the equal of Chicago's. In all 101 men were announced to play, or five more than the Chicago Symphony orchestra at full strength.

So much for the organization: the conductor, Dr. Carl Muck deserves to stand by himself and without comparison. He looks like a mixture of John Drew and Napoleon, the whole slightly Teutonized; he conducts as one might imagine such a combination might, were the two musicians. He is at once suave and strong, elastic and firm, impassioned and cool. In other words, he does what a highly educated, imaginative, sanely thinking, deeply feeling musician ought to do, but what so few are able to do. He is a great man among musicians, and his greatness was well displayed in a programme of many sides.

Be it known that Dr. Muck has not sufficient respect for the late comers at a concert to make his first number a short one. ~~He plunged at once into the sym~~phony, Brahms' first, the C minor it was in this instance. It was a very calm, serene Brahms that he brought before his hearers. Respectability stalked unchecked throughout the performance, and bliss reigned supreme among that part of the hearers who think that musical art stopped short with the bearded Johannes.

The second half was more varied. Liszt's little-known symphonic poem, "Hungaria," was given forth with enough paprika to nearly cause forgetfulness of the fact that the original brew is exceedingly thin stuff; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" sang its gentle measures as soothingly as though it were intended for its original invalid hearer; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was impishness, impudence, and high spirits raised to the level of a fine art.

It was a fine concert, magnificently played, but, except as a standard to be followed, there is no reason why we should forget our own orchestra.

Emmy Destinn's return to America, several times delayed, is now tentatively set for Oct. 13. A number of her recital appearances in California and the northwest have been canceled. She is still announced to appear in "La Gioconda" on Nov. 15, the opening performance of the Chicago Opera association.

The George Hamlin prize of $200 for the best aria for tenor and orchestra by an American composer has been awarded to Carlo Minetti of Pittsburg. Honorable mention is given to "Columbus" by George Siemonn, a resident of New York.

Charles Dalmores, tenor, will, it is said, shortly come to America to sing in opera here and concert elsewhere. He is now in Coppet, Switzerland, recuperating after protracted services in the French army.

From another Swiss city, Lucerne, where the Diarghileff Russian ballet is rehearsing, word comes that two scenes have been added to its repertoire, one from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," in the palace of the river-god under the waves; the other, the melting of the snow-maiden in the sun's embrace in the forest, from the same composer's "Snegourotchka."

EDWARD C. MOORE.

THE BEE: OMAHA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8, 191

SPIRIT OF MUSIC AT FIRST CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Draws Delighted Audience to Auditorium to Begin Charity Course.

PROGRAM ONE OF WONDERS

By THOMAS J. KELLY.

Last night the Spirit of Music Visited Omaha.

It was through the medium of the most noted band of players upon instruments in the world. The Boston Symphony orchestra. The wand which brought the manifestation was in the hand of Dr. Karl Muck.

Omaha felt the presence and potency of the spiritual visitant and was glad.

The occasion was the opening of the course of concerts undertaken by the Associated Retailers of Omaha and known as the Charity Concert Course, because of the fact that the profits will go to Sweet Charity.

If there has been just one thing which has acted in a way as a "brake" on Omaha's progress it has been the ancient old grouch bearing the name of "Precedent."

Good-Bye to Precedent.

"Precedent" has kept more good from being accomplished than almost any other cause. "We must not establish a precedent," had been the funeral anthem of many a splendid project and many a good man and many a good woman. It is un-American. It is only the proverbial Englishman who is credited with the remark "You know we have never done it that way."

Last night the Associated Retailers took the old fossil "Precedent" out of his cave, broke his backbone beyond possibility of repair and gently but completely kicked the corpse out of doors.

And in all reverence let us say "Thank God!"

The business men of Omaha who have made King Ak-Sar-Ben the most popular of reigning monarchs (as well as the safest and sanest), those men who have made the "week of weeks" in Omaha an annual joyfest and jubilee, have kicked the "brake" off, and precedent, hereabouts, will be a thing of the past.

Retailers' Enterprise Endorsed.

The audience which assembled at the [illegible] last night certainly proved to the Associated Retailers that their action in presenting this wonderful chain of concerts was tremendously endorsed. They have surely no reason to regret their action and every reason to be proud. Any future musical work undertaken by them or given under their direaction will be sure to win. And as all great cities are noted for those things which are "unseen and eternal," as well as for the things which are "seen and temporal," Omaha has taken another speIndid step forward.

Dr. Muck Expresses Pleasure.

The audience was as fine an aggregation of people as one might find anywhere and gave the most intense, one might almost say devotional, interest to every musical offering. It was an audience which made every musician proud of his city. Dr. Muck personally spoke to the present reviewer, of the audience and also of the Auditorium, which he said surpassed most of those he had encountered, and especially made a glowing comparison with one very famous American city. (Not Boston).

The suppression of outside noises was complete, and the governors of Ak-Sar-Ben deserve to be apprised of the public appreciation of their solution of a real difficulty. Governor Black promised that there would be no disturbance, and he kept his word. There was one single toot from an automobile horn at the beginning of a phrase by the clarinet in one of the numbers and it was in tune, in fact exactly an octave below!

Wonders of the Orchestra.

With such a wonderful organization of players, one hundred and one, to be exact, it is possible to do things which are not within the scope of the smaller orchestral bodies which have visited here from time to time, and the orchestra last night was a revelation, even to those who knew that they were to have the treat of their lives. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, like Woman, needs no eulogy. It speaks for itself. One could exhaust adjectives for a column and leave much unsaid. Strings which were actually spiritualized, flutes which were like celestial shells from which pearls were blown, clarinets which sounded as if they had been found in the Isles of the Blessed, oboes which sounded like the one which the great god Pan played when he "drew the pith like the heart of a man, from the reed which grew in the river." The brilliant sunshine of the trumpets, and trombones, —splendour without glare,—the gentle "rain-showers" of the tympani and drums, played pianissimo: all these things will never be forgotten by those who heard them last night.

Majesty of Conductor.

And over all, and above all, or rather behind all, was the person of Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of conductors of all time. One says advisedly, "behind all," for he is of the quiet type but in his conducting: he never exaggerates, he never gets between the listener and the work. It is the true domination of the spirit of man.

As the "Flying Dutchman" overture was being played one could not but think of the fact that Dr. Muck has for years been conducting at Bayreuth, the shrine of the Richard Wagner musical philosophy and of the Music of the Future. It seemed as though one could feel the actual atmosphere of the great temple and of its most illustrious founder, the great Wagner, as the overture unfolded itself.

Would it not have been better to have opened the program with this number rather than the Symphony? Omaha will not arrive in time even for the Boston Symphony Orchestra: in this respect Omaha audiences should listen to friendly advice. Omaha is alive, very much alive, and should never have to be alluded to as "the late Miss Omaha."

Beauties of Beethoven.

The Symphony, in A major, known everywhere as "No. 7," was a great delight. It has no "program" that is, it is not descriptive, and some have therefore called it the "Romantic" symphony, in contrast to the "Eroica" and the "Pastoral." One can just sit still and drink in its beauties, without wondering what anything means. It is the symphony which Beethoven considered one of his very greatest works. Many people enjoyed Beethoven last night who never did before, and those who knew him before loved him better.

It is over 100 years since it was first given to the public in Vienna, at a concert for wounded Austrian and Bavarian Soldiers. And while it has lived, alas Peace has not, for again tonight there are wounded Austrian and Bavarian soldiers. The pity of it!

Other Sublime Features.

When the great Tschaikowsky proclaims of a work that 'it is a colossal masterpiece of instrumentation," people should listen: and they did last night, as they heard the "Caprice on Spanish themes" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the work alluded to. Hear the virtuosity of the various artists was so evident. English horn, Flute, Oboe, Violin (solo), Clarinet, Harp, even Triangle and Side-drum were glorified.

The Suite, "L'Arlesienne," by Georges Bizet contained beauties innumerable and especially one must note the "Adagietto" which was played by the muted strings (minus the double-basses). This was simply heavenly, and was listened to with breathless attention. The big building was as quiet as a small sanctuary.

The program closed with the favorite "Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes," by Franz Liszt and was listened to with eagerness, the audience not leaving until not only Dr. Muck but the entire orchestra had been called to bow. That was the second time during the evening that the audience brought the orchestra to its feet.

Surely Florence Moore should have been there last night: she would have seen an audience which did not appear to be "handcuffed," as she suggested to a somewhat slow audience the other night at the Boyd. The applause was given with a free hand and much gusto at the Auditorium.

The splendid program notes were from the pen of the distinguished veteran critic, Philip Hale of Boston. They are worth preserving. Mr. Anton Witek displayed the fact that he was the most temperamental "Concert-master" who has ever honored this town with a visit.

The Program.

Beethoven..................................

....Symphony in A major, N. 7, Op.92
- I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
- IV. Allegro con brio.

Wagner..................................

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"

Rimsky-Korsakoff..........................

....Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.

(Played without pause)

Bizet..................................

Suit, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1. Music to Alphonse Daudet's Play.
- I. Prelude.
- II Minuetto.
- III. Adagietto.
- IV. Carillon.

Liszt..................................

Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine).

CHICAGO EVENING P

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

Boston Symphony At Auditorium

By Karleton Hackett.

TO ONE BORN and raised under the aegis of the Sacred Codfish the mere name "Boston Symphony Orchestra" has an awe-inspiring sound. All our earliest impressions of music were gained from this orchestra and all of us Bostonians grew up with the instinctive feeling this represented the ultimate goal of symphonic art. A thing so bred in the bone of a race as tenacious as the New Englanders colors a man's whole cast of thought, so it is with something more than diffidence that I venture to express the feelings evoked by the playing of this famous orchestra under the baton of Dr. Muck.

It is an extraordinary organization, a mighty instrument as sensitive to the wand of the conductor as his own hands, and responsive to his slightest indication with an elasticity that bespeaks the capacity of the individuals and the relentless routine

In everything that pertains to orchestral virtuosity their playing is all that one mortal mind can conceive of as perfection. The Liszt symphonic poem, "Hungaria," was tremendous in virility, and the Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," the most brilliant display of orchestral virtuosity.

The opening movements of the Brahms symphony in C minor, No. 1, left me cold. Everything was there with absolute distinctness, but it seemed as tho the score had been studied with the precision of the mathematical mind to discover each minute detail, each shade of color, each contrapuntal device in an inner voice, and everything was brought out save only the heart, which had ceased beating. It was rather the articulation of the scientist, in the labratory than the living thing as it came forth from the artist's fancy.

It made Brahms appear even the more severe academician than his enemies have dared to paint him, and while it was wonderfully conceived and evidently exactly what Dr. Muck intended, it was almost repellant in its aloof self-containedness. The outlines were so clear-cut that they became hard, and the tone colors in place of blending together into a perfect harmonic texture stood apart in contrasting shades of antogonism. It was a construction not a creation; a thing made with extraordinary skill yet lacking the spark which should vivify it into a living entity.

In the allegretto there came a change, a softening of the outlines, a plasticity that caught the more genial mood of the music, and that led us into the adagio of the final movement in the manner we expected from this famous orchestra. The last movement of the symphony was noble in conception and beautiful in the manner of expression—broad, sustained, with the solidity of the everlasting hills and the charm of the sun breaking thru the clouds on a summer afternoon.

It may have been precisely this contrast which Dr. Muck believed essential to the meaning of the music, but there seemed somehow a flaw in the working out. It was not that the first two movements were stern, but that they sounded mechanical; the animating spirit was lacking which ought to have given us the clew. Severity we can well understand in Brahms, but it is the severity of thought, the repression of a man used to the strictest self-analysis, not the mere calculation of the means.

Had it not been for the illumination of the last two movements I should have been inclined to distrust the evidence of my own senses, but the thing which was so palpably absent in the first two movements was so gloriously present at the close that there could be no question.

The "Hungaria" had the dominating force that was magnificent, concentrated into one compact mass that moved to its climax with a power that was irresistible. There was the grasp of the whole, with details of exquisite variety, yet all tributary to the main idea, and it all came to us with the stately tread of a great host marching with trumpets blowing and banners spread.

The "Siegfried Idyl" was lovely, as warm in color and as plastic in outline as tho the spirit of Richard Wagner himself had been over the men as they played; and well it might have been, for if any man has been imbued with this spirit it is Dr. Muck.

Out of so many artists it is hardly fair to choose a few, yet the program was so arranged that it was impossible not to notice the remarkable beauty of the playing of the first oboist. The wood-wind choir of this organization is famous, and most deservedly so, and the brass choir was wonderfully mellow and sonorous. Anton Witek, the concertmaster, played the obbligati with authority and a tone of dominating power, tho not of very beautiful quaitiy.

The Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel," with which the program closed, was a feat of orchestral virtuosity, yet in which this skill seemed all properly applied to the matter in hand. To make the meaning come out clearly it must be done just in this way, and the virtuosity was merely incidental to the thing itself.

Coming to what concerns us most nearly here in Chicago, it was impossible not to feel the beauty which the tone of the orchestra has in the Auditorium. The laws of acoustics are even to the experts almost a sealed book, but whatever the cause the Auditorium is the place in which to listen to music. The tone of the orchestra takes on a richness of quality, a mellowness, that is of a perfect beauty nowhere else to be found. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a wonderful organization, with famous artists playing upon the finest of instruments, and it was both their good fortune and ours that we were permitted to hear them in the Auditorium.

CHICAGO EXAMINER.

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FROM BOSTON HEARD IN PERFECT PERFORMANCE

Dr. Muck's Conducting Is in Consonance With His Organization of Artists.

BY JAMES WHITTAKER

AN AUDIENCE none too large and a well controlled enthusiasm greeted our visitor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon.

There are a few social conventions of the concert hall which add to the pleasure, both of the artist and the audience. One of these is the convention of hearty applause at the start and the close of the performance of a visiting organization. It is a translation of the formal cordialities of a good hostess. In a sense the City of Boston was our guest yesterday. It is too bad that her hostess was not in better form and that so many of the family stayed in their homes.

Those who were there heard:

Brahms	Symphony No. 1, C minor
Liszt	Symphonic Poem "Hungaria"
Wagner	Siegfried Idyl
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks"

A classic-romantic program.

* * *

A RHETORICAL figure illustrates very well the distinction between the classic and romantic schools of music. The one is conversational and the other oratorical; the virtue of one is limpidity, of the other eloquence; the vice of one is preciousness, of the other bombasticism.

There may have been many conversations in the salons of Mme. de Stael or Mme. de Sevigne which fitted exactly into the classic symphony form. The first theme an assertion ending politely with the rising inflection which means "Do you not think so?" (an invitation or modulation to a well-considered reply); then the passing of the conversational skein around the circle of guests, where, though it is woven into the patterns of several different prejudices it is never tangled; at the proper moment the recapitulation of the original idea to which the opposition now agrees—a bon mot—and finis—there you have the form and manner of the first movement of the classic symphony.

Dr. Muck interpreted Brahms in this conversational spirit, so much so that were one to follow his rendition score and pencil in hand one could mark all his artful interphrasic pauses with commas, periods and semi-colons. To be able to give such an interpretation one must have a virtuoso orchestra. Dr. Muck has a virtuoso orchestra. His artists have besides knowledge the two virtues particular to virtuosi—flexibility and versatility. They can mold their rhythm unanimously to the least motion of their leader's hand and they can modulate the tones of their instruments to several distinct qualities. The oboe, for instance, sounded at times (at proper times) like its ancestor, the coarse "Shalmei," and at other times it had almost the tenderness of a flute.

* * *

DR. MUCK'S interpretive style demands a great deal of his hearers. Here is no striking mass of color to impose itself on the eye, but a thing of fine craftsmanship the parts of which must be discovered before one sees the whole. It is ascetic like the lean, intellectual face of Dr. Muck. It is the best style. It would be nice to be able, even at the expense of an effort, to appreciate it.

The symphonic poem, "Hungaria," by Liszt, does not compare favorably with his better-known symphonic poems. It is influenced a great deal by Liszt's pianistic style and it seems to be impossible for puffy trombones to give a good imitation of the "con abandonata" of a recitativo in octaves fortissimo or for a flute to perform brilliantly the fireworks of a semi-demi-quaver rush into altissimo. Even the Friska of the Piano Rhapsodie, which he uses as a finale, sounds less brilliant when played by trumpets and triangles than on the piano.

* * *

THE Siegfried Idyl should be cut. Some courageous conductor must do the public this favor some time. It is said that no true beauty is without strangeness. The idyl is truly beautiful for five minutes and then the strangeness wears off. A perfect composition would either put on some more strangeness or retire.

In "Till Eulenspiegel" we have a composition that makes a boast of finding both matter and manner in the literature of which it is a paraphrase. Like in any translation the atmosphere of the original evaporates in the passage from one medium to another, and only incident remains. The true humor of "Till Eulenspiegel" is in the quanit style of the popular German fable; there is only horse-play in the incident. Try as I can, I can find no humor but a great deal of horse-play in Strauss. A great deal of laughter but no joke.

Curiously enough, the program illustrated the deterioration which I believe has taken place in the personality of the Teutonic musician in the last fifty years. There is Brahms, the fine, who says, "How great is music!" There is Liszt, the less fine, who says "How great is my country"; Wagner, who says "How great is my child," and there is Strauss, the least fine, who says, "How great am I."

* * *

WHAT is there to say about the performance? Nothing; it was too perfect. The Boston Symphony is an organization which, like the Orchestra du Conservatoire of Paris, is composed of artists who have consented to submerge their separate personalities in favor of the personality of the ensemble.

The woodwinds (probably French) were perfect, the brass (probably German) perfect, the strings and the percussion perfect, the leadership perfect, the horns—the horns—the horns—so-so, as horns always are. Why do horn players always fill their instruments with saliva, and why do they always tremble like the rabbit in "Alice in Wonderland?" This is the king mystery of the musical temperament.

We shall have to ask Mr. Neumann to give us more detailed programs of his future concerts. We can dispense with program notes, but not with, for instance, the names of the members of the orchestra. It would have been a pleasure to mention the name of the first oboist had it been published.

Omaha DAILY NEWS
OMAHA, NEB.

WON'T POSTPONE CONCERT.

Scores of requests today were made to have the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium not begin until after the Billy Sunday meeting. The orchestra will begin at 8:15 p. m. promptly. Autos going to the Auditorium will approach the Auditorium from the west on Howard street and drive east.

BOSS OF BOSTON PLAYERS IS ALSO FOND OF RESTING

Dr. Carl Muck, director of the Boston Syphony orchestra, rivals Billy Sunday in his jealousy for rest. When the special train carrying the orchestra arrived over the Burlington at 11:30 o'clock this morning Mr. Mach was still asleep. He imitates the evangelist by spending as much of his time as possible in bed, according to the players.

The orchestra, of 150 pieces, which appears in the first of the charity concert series tonight at the Auditorium, travels in a special train of seven cars. Besides a diner, four Pullmans and one private car for the director, the train carries a specially made baggage car for the instruments.

The players are young business men of Boston. The present ten-day trip was started Sunday and a concert was given at Peori, Ill.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date 0 1915
Established 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The usual three concerts by the famous Poston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr Karl Muck's conducting, will be given at the Parsons Theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15, December 13 and March 27. The soloist for the first concert will be Miss Florence Hinkle, foremost among America's concert sopranos. Miss Hinkle was among the most successful soloists of the Boston series last year and has been engaged for several concerts of the orchestra this season. Other soloists will be Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, and Anton Witek, violinist. The orchestra is one of the finest musical organizations in the world today and is everywhere playing before packed houses and arousing enthusiasm by the brilliant finish and virtuosity of the performances under Dr. Muck's remarkable leadership. Hartford people have always found these concerts ideal musical entertainments. Season tickets are on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store. Seats for first concert will go on sale next Saturday.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
OCT 11 1915
Date
Established:

Boston's Musical History Written in Programmes

It was fifteen years ago that the legend "With historical and descriptive notes by Philip Hale" first appeared upon the title page of a programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has stood there ever since, and the row of volumes which it embellishes can be counted one of the treasures of any library containing them. A wonderful thesaurus of historical and critical information, combined with fanciful and sometimes fantastic speculation, they are, and to a real lover of high class music the pleasure of reading them is secondary only to hearing the music to which they open the doors of meaning. Persons who regard them as reading matter with which to while away the intermissions at the Boston concerts show little appreciation of their value. They are not to be absorbed thus hurriedly, and the fact that concertgoers as a rule leave them behind them (if they succeed in getting them, which is not always the case in New York) makes it fortunate that the publisher, C. A. Ellis, in Boston, puts each year's series into sound binders' boards, so that those who know how to appreciate them may get them after the season is over. In a way they are also a compendium of Boston's musical history, for Mr. Hale, by reference to earlier performances, keeps his readers advised of what was done in the long ago, as well as under the consulships of Gericke, Paur, Fiedler and Muck. He keeps alive, too, some of the always suggestive writings of his predecessor, William F. Apthorpe, and in his "Entr' Actes" keeps us abreast with contemporary musical literature at home and abroad.

Evening
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Est 184

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS NEW SEASON

Doctor Muck Conducts an Excellent Program at the Academy

In a program which was all of a piece, and in which his orchestra developed all the extraordinary powers for which it is noted, Doctor Muck last night opened the 31st season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia. The audience at the Academy was evidently one thoroughly familiar with both the Orchestra and its conductor. It welcomed Anton Witek as it welcomed Doctor Muck, and twice it called for the orchestra to receive its plaudits by rising.

There is something of a discussion concerning tonality in the pages of the familiar buff-covered programs. Even without it the listener must have felt the sense of overpowering gloom in almost every part of the program. Brahms, whose second symphony was heard here last week, has not been noted as a frivolous composer, yet it was the scherzo of his symphony (in E minor, No. 4) which provided whatever relief there was. Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," mystic and eerie, in the entire romantic tradition; Strauss' "Tod und Verkalerung," and Liszt's "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) completed the program, and each was a variation of the theme of death. Suicide would have been the only issue were it not for one thing.

That thing is the consummate perfection of playing which the Boston Orchestra invariably brings here. Last night that perfection was not a bit cold; it was pulsing and energetic and warm. It took beautiful shades. And it had the tone concerning which it is impossible to speak. Gilding the lily is not only futile. By long repitition it becomes boresome.

In conducting a program which was all romantic, Doctor Muck missed none of the distinctions owing to each composer. He understood everything, and under him each flowered magnificently. The whole was a beautiful and an impressive occasion.

G. V. S.

CHICAGO EXAMINER.

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FROM BOSTON HEARD IN PERFECT PERFORMANCE

Dr. Muck's Conducting Is in Consonance With His Organization of Artists.

BY JAMES WHITTAKER

AN AUDIENCE none too large and a well controlled enthusiasm greeted our visitor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon.

There are a few social conventions of the concert hall which add to the pleasure, both of the artist and the audience. One of these is the convention of hearty applause at the start and the close of the performance of a visiting organization. It is a translation of the formal cordialities of a good hostess. In a sense the City of Boston was our guest yesterday.

It is too bad that her hostess was not in better form and that so many of the family stayed in their homes.

Those who were there heard:

Brahms..............Symphony No. 1, C minor
Liszt............Symphonic Poem "Hungaria"
Wagner ....Siegfried Idyl
Strauss......"Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks"

A classic-romantic program.

* * *

A RHETORICAL figure illustrates very well the distinction between the classic and romantic schools of music. The one is conversational and the other oratorical; the virtue of one is limpidity, of the other eloquence; the vice of one is preciousness, of the other bombasticism.

There may have been many conversations in the salons of Mme. de Stael or Mme. de Sevigne which fitted exactly into the classic symphony form. The first theme an assertion ending politely with the rising inflection which means "Do you not think so?" (an invitation or modulation to a well-considered reply); then the passing of the conversational skein around the circle of guests, where, though it is woven into the patterns of several different prejudices it is never tangled; at the proper moment the recapitulation of the original idea to which the opposition now agrees—a bon mot—and finis—there you have the form and manner of the first movement of the classic symphony.

Dr. Muck interpreted Brahms in this conversational spirit, so much so that were one to follow his rendition score and pencil in hand one could mark all his artful interphrasic pauses with commas, periods and semi-colons. To be able to give such an interpretation one must have a virtuoso orchestra. Dr. Muck has a virtuoso orchestra. His artists have besides knowledge the two virtues particular to virtuosi—flexibility and versatility. They can mold their rhythm unanimously to the least motion of their leader's hand and they can modulate the tones of their instruments to several distinct qualities. The oboe, for instance, sounded at times (at proper times) like its ancestor, the coarse "Shalmei," and at other times it had almost the tenderness of a flute.

* * *

DR. MUCK'S interpretive style demands a great deal of his hearers. Here is no striking mass of color to impose itself on the eye, but a thing of fine craftsmanship the parts of which must be discovered before one sees the whole. It is ascetic like the lean, intellectual face of Dr. Muck. It is the best style. It would be nice to be able, even at the expense of an effort, to appreciate it.

The symphonic poem, "Hungaria," by Liszt, does not compare favorably with his better-known symphonic poems. It is influenced a great deal by Liszt's pianistic style and it seems to be impossible for puffy trombones to give a good imitation of the "con abandonata" of a recitativo in octaves fortissimo or for a flute to perform brilliantly the fireworks of a semi-demi-quaver rush into altissimo. Even the Friska of the Piano Rhapsodie, which he uses as a finale, sounds less brilliant when played by trumpets and triangles than on the piano.

* * *

THE Siegfried Idyl should be cut. Some courageous conductor must do the public this favor some time. It is said that no true beauty is without strangeness. The idyl is truly beautiful for five minutes and then the strangeness wears off.

A perfect composition would either put on some more strangeness or retire.

In "Till Eulenspiegel" we have a composition that makes a boast of finding both matter and manner in the literature of which it is a paraphrase. Like in any translation the atmosphere of the original evaporates in the passage from one medium to another, and only incident remains. The true humor of "Till Eulenspiegel" is in the quanit style of the popular German fable; there is only horse-play in the incident. Try as I can, I can find no humor but a great deal of horse-play in Strauss. A great deal of laughter but no joke.

Curiously enough, the program illustrated the deterioration which I believe has taken place in the personality of the Teutonic musician in the last fifty years. There is Brahms, the fine, who says, "How great is music!" There is Liszt, the less fine, who says "How great is my country"; Wagner, who says "How great is my child," and there is Strauss, the least fine, who says, "How great am I."

* * *

WHAT is there to say about the performance? Nothing; it was too perfect. The Boston Symphony is an organization which, like the Orchestra du Conservatoire of Paris, is composed of artists who have consented to submerge their separate personalities in favor of the personality of the ensemble.

The woodwinds (probably French) were perfect, the brass (probably German) perfect, the strings and the percussion perfect, the leadership perfect, the horns—the horns—the horns—so-so, as horns always are. Why do horn players always fill their instruments with saliva, and why do they always tremble like the rabbit in "Alice in Wonderland?" This is the king mystery of the musical temperament.

We shall have to ask Mr. Neumann to give us more detailed programs of his future concerts. We can dispense with program notes, but not with, for instance, the names of the members of the orchestra. It would have been a pleasure to mention the name of the first oboist had it been published.

Omaha DAILY NEWS
OMAHA, NEB.

WON'T POSTPONE CONCERT.

Scores of requests today were made to have the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium not begin until after the Billy Sunday meeting. The orchestra will begin at 8:15 p. m. promptly. Autos going to the Auditorium will approach the Auditorium from the west on Howard street and drive east.

BOSS OF BOSTON PLAYERS IS ALSO FOND OF RESTING

Dr. Carl Muck, director of the Boston Syphony orchestra, rivals Billy Sunday in his jealousy for rest. When the special train carrying the orchestra arrived over the Burlington at 11:30 o'clock this morning Mr. Mach was still asleep. He imitates the evangelist by spending as much of his time as possible in bed, according to the players.

The orchestra, of 150 pieces, which appears in the first of the charity concert series tonight at the Auditorium, travels in a special train of seven cars. Besides a diner, four Pullmans and one private car for the director, the train carries a specially made baggage car for the instruments.

The players are young business men of Boston. The present ten-day trip was started Sunday and a concert was given at Peori, Il.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From COURANT

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The usual three concerts by the famous Poston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr Karl Muck's conducting, will be given at the Parsons Theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15, December 13 and March 27. The soloist for the first concert will be Miss Florence Hinkle, foremost among America's concert sopranos. Miss Hinkle was among the most successful soloists of the Boston series last year and has been engaged for several concerts of the orchestra this season. Other soloists will be Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, and Anton Witek, violinist. The orchestra is one of the finest musical organizations in the world today and is everywhere playing before packed houses and arousing enthusiasm by the brilliant finish and virtuosity of the performances under Dr. Muck's remarkable leadership. Hartford people have always found these concerts ideal musical entertainments. Season tickets are on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store. Seats for first concert will go on sale next Saturday.

, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City 1915

Date

Established:

Boston's Musical History Written in Programmes

It was fifteen years ago that the legend "With historical and descriptive notes by Philip Hale" first appeared upon the title page of a programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has stood there ever since, and the row of volumes which it embellishes can be counted one of the treasures of any library containing them. A wonderful thesaurus of historical and critical information, combined with fanciful and sometimes fantastic speculation, they are, and to a real lover of high class music the pleasure of reading them is secondary only to hearing the music to which they open the doors of meaning. Persons who regard them as reading matter with which to while away the intermissions at the Boston concerts show little appreciation of their value. They are not to be absorbed thus hurriedly, and the fact that concertgoers as a rule leave them behind them (if they succeed in getting them, which is not always the case in New York) makes it fortunate that the publisher, C. A. Ellis, in Boston, puts each year's series into sound binders' boards, so that those who know how to appreciate them may get them after the season is over. In a way they are also a compendium of Boston's musical history, for Mr. Hale, by reference to earlier performances, keeps his readers advised of what was done in the long ago, as well as under the consulships of Gericke, Paur, Fiedler and Muck. He keeps alive, too, some of the always suggestive writings of his predecessor, William F. Apthorpe, and in his "Entr' Actes" keeps us abreast with contemporary musical literature at home and abroad.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS NEW SEASON

Est 184

Doctor Muck Conducts an Excellent Program at the Academy

In a program which was all of a piece, and in which his orchestra developed all the extraordinary powers for which it is noted, Doctor Muck last night opened the 31st season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia. The audience at the Academy was evidently one thoroughly familiar with both the Orchestra and its conductor. It welcomed Anton Witek as it welcomed Doctor Muck, and twice it called for the orchestra to receive its plaudits by rising.

There is something of a discussion concerning tonality in the pages of the familiar buff-covered programs. Even without it the listener must have felt the sense of overpowering gloom in almost every part of the program. Brahms, whose second symphony was heard here last week, has not been noted as a frivolous composer, yet it was the scherzo of his symphony (in E minor, No. 4) which provided whatever relief there was. Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," mystic and eerie, in the entire romantic tradition; Strauss' "Tod und Verkalerung," and Liszt's "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) completed the program, and each was a variation of the theme of death. Suicide would have been the only issue were it not for one thing.

That thing is the consummate perfection of playing which the Boston Orchestra invariably brings here. Last night that perfection was not a bit cold; it was pulsing and energetic and warm. It took beautiful shades. And it had the tone concerning which it is impossible to speak. Gilding the lily is not only futile. By long repitition it becomes boresome.

In conducting a program which was all romantic, Doctor Muck missed none of the distinctions owing to each composer. He understood everything, and under him each flowered magnificently. The whole was a beautiful and an impressive occasion.

G. V. S.

CHICAGO EXAMINER.

OCTOBER 11, 1915.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FROM BOSTON HEARD IN PERFECT PERFORMANCE

Dr. Muck's Conducting Is in Consonance With His Organization of Artists.

BY JAMES WHITTAKER

AN AUDIENCE none too large and a well controlled enthusiasm greeted our visitor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon.

There are a few social conventions of the concert hall which add to the pleasure, both of the artist and the audience. One of these is the convention of hearty applause at the start and the close of the performance of a visiting organization. It is a translation of the formal cordialities of a good hostess. In a sense the City of Boston was our guest yesterday. It is too bad that her hostess was not in better form and that so many of the family stayed in their homes.

Those who were there heard:

Brahms	Symphony No. 1, C minor
Liszt	Symphonic Poem "Hungaria"
Wagner	Siegfried Idyl
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks"

A classic-romantic program.

* * *

A RHETORICAL figure illustrates very well the distinction between the classic and romantic schools of music. The one is conversational and the other oratorical; the virtue of one is limpidity, of the other eloquence; the vice of one is preciousness, of the other bombasticism.

There may have been many conversations in the salons of Mme. de Stael or Mme. de Sevigne which fitted exactly into the classic symphony form. The first theme an assertion ending politely with the rising inflection which means "Do you not think so?" (an invitation or modulation to a well-considered reply); then the passing of the conversational skein around the circle of guests, where, though it is woven into the patterns of several different prejudices it is never tangled; at the proper moment the recapitulation of the original idea to which the opposition now agrees—a bon mot—and finis—there you have the form and manner of the first movement of the classic symphony.

Dr. Muck interpreted Brahms in this conversational spirit, so much so that were one to follow his rendition score and pencil in hand one could mark all his artful interphrasic pauses with commas, periods and semi-colons. To be able to give such an interpretation one must have a virtuoso orchestra. Dr. Muck has a virtuoso orchestra. His artists have besides knowledge the two virtues particular to virtuosi—flexibility and versatility. They can mold their rhythm unanimously to the least motion of their leader's hand and they can modulate the tones of their instruments to several distinct qualities. The oboe, for instance, sounded at times (at proper times) like its ancestor, the coarse "Shalmei," and at other times it had almost the tenderness of a flute.

* * *

DR. MUCK'S interpretive style demands a great deal of his hearers. Here is no striking mass of color to impose itself on the eye, but a thing of fine craftsmanship the parts of which must be discovered before one sees the whole. It is ascetic like the lean, intellectual face of Dr. Muck. It is the best style. It would be nice to be able, even at the expense of an effort, to appreciate it.

The symphonic poem, "Hungaria," by Liszt, does not compare favorably with his better-known symphonic poems. It is influenced a great deal by Liszt's pianistic style and it seems to be impossible for puffy trombones to give a good imitation of the "con abandonata" of a recitativo in octaves fortissimo or for a flute to perform brilliantly the fireworks of a semi-demi-quaver rush into altissimo. Even the Friska of the Piano Rhapsodie, which he uses as a finale, sounds less brilliant when played by trumpets and triangles than on the piano.

* * *

THE Siegfried Idyl should be cut. Some courageous conductor must do the public this favor some time. It is said that no true beauty is without strangeness. The idyl is truly beautiful for five minutes and then the strangeness wears off.

A perfect composition would either put on some more strangeness or retire.

In "Till Eulenspiegel" we have a composition that makes a boast of finding both matter and manner in the literature of which it is a paraphrase. Like in any translation the atmosphere of the original evaporates in the passage from one medium to another, and only incident remains. The true humor of "Till Eulenspiegel" is in the quanit style of the popular German fable; there is only horse-play in the incident. Try as I can, I can find no humor, but a great deal of horse-play in Strauss. A great deal of laughter, but no joke.

Curiously enough, the program illustrated the deterioration which I believe has taken place in the personality of the Teutonic musician in the last fifty years. There is Brahms, the fine, who says, "How great is music!" There is Liszt, the less fine, who says "How great is my country"; Wagner, who says "How great is my child," and there is Strauss, the least fine, who says, "How great am I."

* * *

WHAT is there to say about the performance? Nothing; it was too perfect. The Boston Symphony is an organization which, like the Orchestra du Conservatoire of Paris, is composed of artists who have consented to submerge their separate personalities in favor of the personality of the ensemble.

The woodwinds (probably French) were perfect, the brass (probably German) perfect, the strings and the percussion perfect, the leadership perfect, the horns—the horns—the horns—so-so, as horns always are. Why do horn players always fill their instruments with saliva, and why do they always tremble like the rabbit in "Alice in Wonderland?" This is the king mystery of the musical temperament.

We shall have to ask Mr. Neumann to give us more detailed programs of his future concerts. We can dispense with program notes, but not with, for instance, the names of the members of the orchestra. It would have been a pleasure to mention the name of the first oboist had it been published.

Omaha DAILY NEWS
OMAHA, NEB.

WON'T POSTPONE CONCERT.

Scores of requests today were made to have the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium not begin until after the Billy Sunday meeting. The orchestra will begin at 8:15 p. m. promptly. Autos going to the Auditorium will approach the Auditorium from the west on Howard street and drive east.

BOSS OF BOSTON PLAYERS IS ALSO FOND OF RESTING

Dr. Carl Muck, director of the Boston Syphony orchestra, rivals Billy Sunday in his jealousy for rest. When the special train carrying the orchestra arrived over the Burlington at 11:30 o'clock this morning Mr. Mach was still asleep. He imitates the evangelist by spending as much of his time as possible in bed, according to the players.

The orchestra, of 150 pieces, which appears in the first of the charity concert series tonight at the Auditorium, travels in a special train of seven cars. Besides a diner, four Pullmans and one private car for the director, the train carries a specially made baggage car for the instruments.

The players are young business men of Boston. The present ten-day trip was started Sunday and a concert was given at Peori, Ill.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From COURANT

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date ... 30 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The usual three concerts by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr Karl Muck's conducting, will be given at the Parsons Theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15, December 13 and March 27. The soloist for the first concert will be Miss Florence Hinkle, foremost among America's concert sopranos. Miss Hinkle was among the most successful soloists of the Boston series last year and has been engaged for several concerts of the orchestra this season. Other soloists will be Miss Laeta Hartley, pianist, and Anton Witck, violinist. The orchestra is one of the finest musical organizations in the world today and is everywhere playing before packed houses and arousing enthusiasm by the brilliant finish and virtuosity of the performances under Dr. Muck's remarkable leadership. Hartford people have always found these concerts ideal musical entertainments. Season tickets are on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store. Seats for first concert will go on sale next Saturday.

, 1884

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

OCT 1 1915

Date

Published:

Boston's Musical History Written in Programmes

It was fifteen years ago that the legend "With historical and descriptive notes by Philip Hale" first appeared upon the title page of a programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has stood there ever since, and the row of volumes which it embellishes can be counted one of the treasures of any library containing them. A wonderful thesaurus of historical and critical information, combined with fanciful and sometimes fantastic speculation, they are, and to a real lover of high class music the pleasure of reading them is secondary only to hearing the music to which they open the doors of meaning. Persons who regard them as reading matter with which to while away the intermissions at the Boston concerts show little appreciation of their value. They are not to be absorbed thus hurriedly, and the fact that concertgoers as a rule leave them behind them (if they succeed in getting them, which is not always the case in New York) makes it fortunate that the publisher, C. A. Ellis, in Boston, puts each year's series into sound binders' boards, so that those who know how to appreciate them may get them after the season is over. In a way they are also a compendium of Boston's musical history, for Mr. Hale, by reference to earlier performances, keeps his readers advised of what was done in the long ago, as well as under the consulships of Gericke, Paur, Fiedler and Muck. He keeps alive, too, some of the always suggestive writings of his predecessor, William F. Apthorpe, and in his "Entr' Actes" keeps us abreast with contemporary musical literature at home and abroad.

Evening

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS NEW SEASON

Doctor Muck Conducts an Excellent Program at the Academy

In a program which was all of a piece, and in which his orchestra developed all the extraordinary powers for which it is noted, Doctor Muck last night opened the 31st season of the Boston Orchestra in Philadelphia. The audience at the Academy was evidently one thoroughly familiar with both the Orchestra and its conductor. It welcomed Anton Witek as it welcomed Doctor Muck, and twice it called for the orchestra to receive its plaudits by rising.

There is something of a discussion concerning tonality in the pages of the familiar buff-covered programs. Even without it the listener must have felt the sense of overpowering gloom in almost every part of the program. Brahms, whose second symphony was heard here last week, has not been noted as a frivolous composer, yet it was the scherzo of his symphony (in E minor, No. 4) which provided whatever relief there was. Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," mystic and eerie, in the entire romantic tradition; Strauss' "Tod und Verkalerung," and Liszt's "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) completed the program, and each was a variation of the theme of death. Suicide would have been the only issue were it not for one thing.

That thing is the consummate perfection of playing which the Boston Orchestra invariably brings here. Last night that perfection was not a bit cold; it was pulsing and energetic and warm. It took beautiful shades. And it had the tone concerning which it is impossible to speak. Gilding the lily is not only futile. By long repitition it becomes boresome.

In conducting a program which was all romantic, Doctor Muck missed none of the distinctions owing to each composer. He understood everything, and under him each flowered magnificently. The whole was a beautiful and an impressive occasion.

G. V. S.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 31 1915

SPLENDID MUSIC FOR BROOKLYN

Boston Symphony With Melba as Soloist.

CONCERT TO BE GIVEN FRIDAY AT THE ACADEMY

Miss Winifred Marshall in Costume Recital at Adelphi College Alumnae Association Concert on Nov. 10—John McCormack Here Nov. 14.

The series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 5. With the largest subscription the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn and with the incomparable Melba as soloist and a programme of unusual beauty, the concert should be one of the memorable events of the season.

This will be Melba's only appearance in Brooklyn this year, and all accounts have it that she has never sung more beautifully than she has in the various concerts she has given this fall. Melba at her worst is worth going miles to hear. At her best the beauty of her voice is indescribable.

The symphony will be the lovely eighth of Beethoven, "the little symphony in F," as the composer called it. An outstanding number will be the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, one of the greatest of the modern orchestral repertoires.

Madame Melba will sing twice. Her first number will be the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso." Her second number will be two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."

The programme in full is as follows: Beethoven Symphony No. 8, in F Major; Handel, aria "Sweet Bird" from "Il Penseroso;" Loeffler, "La Mort de Tintagiles; Mozart, two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro,' "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Soloist, Madame Melba.

These concerts are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Brahms' Fourth Symphony by Dr. Muck's Men on Initial Program.

Gloom and grandeur possessed the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy last evening. Dr. Karl Muck, looking as much as ever like Dante, led his stately band through four imposing numbers—Brahms' great "Sophocles" Symphony (the fourth), Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and "Les Preludes," by Liszt.

It was a concert that, when it was not big, which was only in the Strauss tone poem, was beautiful. The separate splendors of the Boston's choirs are long proven; but last night, in the symphony, the reeds were really "half angel, and half bird," and the soprano and tenor strings were "all a wonder and a wild desire." A very large house showered applause on the sombre music and the musicians, forcing two "rising recalls" from Muck's men. It was an occasion without glitter—but without tinsel.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN.
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony

Dr. Muck Conducts First Program of Season, Without Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving the first of its series of five concerts, scheduled to take place this season at the Academy of Music, its local appearances having for several years been limited to that number, was given a cordial welcome by the usual large audience last evening, the house being completely filled. While the concert was without a soloist, the program, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was one of the best ever given here by the Boston orchestra, and the concert scarcely can fail to remain as a memory spot in the musical experience of every person that heard it.

The first of the four compositions presented was Brahms's fourth symphony, in E minor, a work of great scope and profound musicianship, if not more beautiful, at least in noticeable contrast to the composer's second symphony, because of its general tone of melodious simplicity frequently called the "Pastoral," which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra at its last week's concerts. In his fourth symphonic work, Brahms sounded wonderful depths and soared to marvelous heights, and while, as seems to be the case with the majority of great compositions, there was at first some doubts of its acceptance as a masterpiece, the passing years have declared its true value, and to-day it is named as one of the greatest achievements of the famous German.

Dr. Muck read it last evening with the calmness of manner so characteristic of him, and which at times seems almost to partake of indifference, but which nevertheless produces the finest of results, and it is quite evident that the musicians under his baton have been so well drilled in rehearsals, and are so sure of doing just what is required of them, that the conductor is spared anything in the way of strenuous effort, when before an audience. Nothing more beautiful in the way of orchestral tone color can be imagined than was presented in the andante of the symphony, fairly ravishing being the effects produced by the pizzicato strings and the horns and woodwinds, while the brasses were veiled in a mellowness of vibrant sound that enriched the ensemble without once breaking the flow of exquisite melodization. The scherzo movement, allegro giocoso, was taken at a rapid pace, and played with delightful vigor and sprightliness, and the finale was so splendidly given that an ovation of applause followed.

Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," receiving an interpretation that emphasized its classic beauty, was followed by a graphic presentation of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Tod un Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguration"), full value being given to the many passages of true melody in the first part, while the succeeding climax of tremendous vociferation, in which the full force of the combined instruments is heard with impressive effect, is followed by more of the melodious strains that Strauss is capable of writing when he choses, and in which the warbling of the flutes and the rhapsodizing of the harps mark passing episodes of irresistible charm. After the superb interpretation of this work, and again at the end of the program, which was closed with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," played in a manner that was absolutely thrilling, the orchestra was given a genuine ovation, for the third time, at the signal of the conductor, the musicians rising in a body to acknowledge the applause. The second concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, November 29, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Opening of Local Season With Dr. Muck Again Directing.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated its thirty-first season last night at the Academy of Music. With Brahms' E minor symphony and the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," on the same program, in addition to the "Manfred" overture of Schumann and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," it can readily be seen that the concert was generously long. The orchestra was in superb condition. It might almost be said to have improved in tone and general work. Certainly a more perfect ensemble than that heard last night would be impossible to imagine.

This was particularly in evidence during the closing moments of the Strauss tone poem, when the unison was so flawless that it assumed an almost supernatural quality. The tonal proportions seemed absolutely even—not an instrument heard individually, but all sinking into a harmonious accord. The Brahms Symphony was given with a clearness and conciseness that laid bare every theme and left the hearer free to follow the beauty of the execution, revel in the flexibility of tone exhibited and the fine, scholarly interpretation offered.

For manipulation of the orchestra the Strauss tone poem stood supreme. Dr. Muck obtained from this erratic, but moving work every vestige of power and expression it possesses. Despite this powerful portrayal, however, the real treat of the evening was the beautiful treatment of Schumann's "Manfred" overture. The subtle grace of Schumann was present every moment and made the interpretation memorable. The Liszt "Les Preludes" was an expressive conclusion to an evening of great interest.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2.—Miss Marga Wilson, who has returned from a short stay in New York, today attended the opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theatre. In the box reserved for the President's family Miss Wilson entertained Commissioner and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, Mrs. William Hitz and Carmine Fabrizio, violinist. Mr. Fabrizio assisted Miss Wilson in some of her recent recitals.

Mrs. George W. Vanderbilt and her young daughter, Miss Cornelia Vanderbilt, arrived yesterday from their estate at Biltmore, N. C., and are at their K street home for the early winter.

Alberto de I. Moriera, first secretary of the Brazilian Embassy, and Manuel de Freyre y Santander, secretary of the Peruvian Legation, were among those entertaining luncheon parties at the Willard today.

[33].

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brahms' Fourth Symphony Feature of Opening Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Karl Muck opened its local season before a large and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the most substantial and important feature of the programme was Brahms' fourth symphony in E minor. This is an austere and erudite work, which even those who have learned to love the music of Brahms for the perfection of its form, the elevation of its sentiment and the noble beauty of its themes are apt to find somewhat exacting and which certainly needs to be well known to be properly enjoyed and fully understood.

It is not music which can be appreciated without any mental effort. Only when it is listened to with a careful and intelligent attention does it disclose its message, and to those who want obvious melodies or resounding climaxes it must be disappointing. Yet it is unquestionably a masterpiece of art, and while it lacks something of the second's charm and of the fervor and poetic majesty of the third, it is very great music and it is suffused with a most sincere and eloquently communicative emotion. It was admirably played, with a remarkable loveliness of tone and a fine lucidity of analysis, and the impression which its performance produced was profound. It exhibited the orchestra in its best form and anticipated all the rest.

Other numbers on the programme were Schumann's gloomy "Manfred" overture and Richard Schumann's wonderful tone poem, "Death and Resurrection," perhaps the best and the most valuable among compositions of its class, which was rendered with a surpassing brilliancy of execution and with a volume of tone which conveyed the full significance of its tremendous crescendos. An inspired and inspiring interpretation of Liszt's "Préludes" brought the proceedings to a satisfying close.

Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 4 - 1915

To-night the Boston Symphony men open a sold out season at Carnegie Hall. The symphony number is Brahms's Fourth, followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's "Husitzka."

W. B. CHASE.

Cutting Bureau in the World

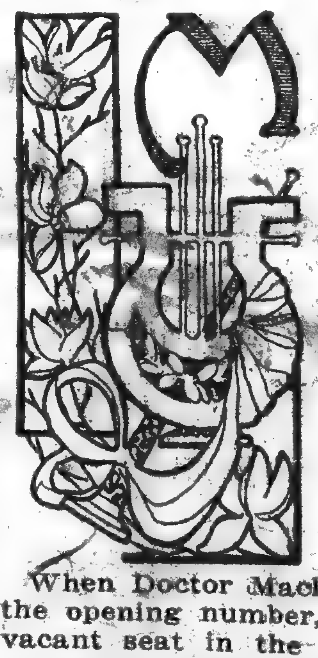
From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS ACCORDED AN OVATION

Orchestra Obliged to Rise to Its Feet to Acknowledge Plaudits

IN ROMANTIC PROGRAM

Strauss' 'Tod Und Verklarung' Most Profound Number Presented



MUCH of the manner of long-etablished friendship characterized the exchange of amenities between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and local music-lovers last night, when the organization appeared at the Academy of Music in the first concert of its thirty-first annual series in this city.

When Doctor Mack lifted his baton for the opening number, there was hardly a vacant seat in the big auditorium. And twice during the program—after the symphony and after a spirited performance of Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung"—the entire orchestra was compelled to acknowledge applause by rising.

The program was entirely orthodox both in construction and content. It was chosen from modern composers, and of the moderns, those commonly labeled romanticists. True, it opened with a Brahms symphony, but it was Brahms in his most romantic mood—the fourth in E minor; and offsetting the weightier elements of this work were Schuman's "Manfred" overture, the Strauss number, and the familiar "Les Preludes" of Liszt.

The first interest of the concert [illegible]

[illegible] not only because Doctor Muck and his organization are authoritative on Strauss, but because it was the most profound offering of the evening. This is a work which wears well. It was eloquently rendered last night—simply, without exaggeration, but in a boldly declarative manner.

The academic point of view that made Doctor Muck's reading of Brahms entirely conventional gave the Strauss interpretation its finest qualities. Doctor Muck conducted as a man who merely starts, so to speak, a well-ordered instrument. The brass choir, which had more than usual prominence in this program, did excellent work and the strings were especially adroit. Conspicuous in the organization was T. Cella, the youth-

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ACADEMY

Season Begins With Brahms' Fourth Symphony in Concert Without Soloist

PROGRAM.

Fourth Symphony	Brahms
"Manfred" Overture	Schumann
"Tod und Verklaesung"	Strauss
"Les Preludes"	Liszt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, played gloriously at the Academy last evening, and held a crowded house spellbound from the first note to the last. As usual with the opening concert in the series, there was no soloist, though the orchestra itself played as one man. If there be a stricture to offer as to the composition of the program it might be said that the final number—played just as well as any of the rest—did not seem to belong in such noble company; its sentimental "sound and fury" does not ring true when tested by the standard set in the second movement of the great E minor symphony of Brahms. The Vennsberg is not Parnassus, and with the passage of time even the Liszt idolaters must begin to discover the feet of clay supporting the object of their adoration.

The playing of the symphony fairly glowed with fervent life; the first violins with their inimitable old Italian tone sang through the opening movement with a choral resonance, bowing unerringly together, and giving a vital pulsebeat of accent and nuance to every line of the score. It is a foolish habit of some persons who accept any shopworn opinion they hear, to say that the Boston players are too coldly and classically perfect; that they are polished and refined till all the life and primal fire have been expunged from their performance. Those who have fallen into that error should have been present last night to feel the enormous gusto, the vibrant drive, the elan and elasticity that went into the "Allegro Giocoso." In the Andante there was a celestial outpour of hymning voices, of oboe and horn and clarinet, in confluent pure streams of sound; and there were mighty hammer-strokes in the finale (not the best of the movements), with the basses and 'cellos grandly fundamental now and again.

The "Manfred" overture maintained the same plane of feeling and inspiration in romantic mood and variegated idiom as the reflex of Byronic passion. Doctor Muck in the latter part of his program, it is obvious, juxtaposed three different readings of the riddle of human life and destiny. Schumann, Strauss and Liszt in the works chosen depict the human soul at odds with fate, and out of fever and turbulence reaching now and then quiescent interludes, till the spirit at last inherits "the vasty hall of Death." In the Strauss tone-poem, with its opulence of clangor and color, the delicious mellowness of answering voices among oboe, flute and violin was in the similarity of timbre hardly distinguishable. Anton Wilek's violin outbreathed like a wind instrument. There was a mountainous climax with a thundercloud of brasses atop of it, and the tympanist's strength was as the strength of ten. Let it be noted that Theodore Cella, our youthful and gifted Philadelphia harpist, made his debut as a member of the Boston organization at this point in the evening's proceedings, at the second harp. F. L. W.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

1915

Date

Establi

SPLENDID MUSIC FOR BROOKLYN

Boston Symphony With Melba as Soloist.

CONCERT TO BE GIVEN FRIDAY AT THE ACADEMY

Miss Winifred Marshall in Costume Recital at Adelphi College Alumnae Association Concert on Nov. 10—John McCormack Here Nov. 14.

The series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 5. With the largest subscription the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn and with the incomparable Melba as soloist and a programme of unusual beauty, the concert should be one of the memorable events of the season.

This will be Melba's only appearance in Brooklyn this year, and all accounts have it that she has never sung more beautifully than she has in the various concerts she has given this fall. Melba at her worst is worth going miles to hear. At her best the beauty of her voice is indescribable.

The symphony will be the lovely eighth of Beethoven, "the little symphony in F," as the composer called it. An outstanding number will be the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, one of the greatest of the modern orchestral repertoires.

Madame Melba will sing twice. Her first number will be the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso." Her second number will be two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro."

The programme in full is as follows: Beethoven Symphony No. 8, in F Major; Handel, aria "Sweet Bird" from "Il Penseroso;" Loeffler, "La Mort de Tintagiles; Mozart, two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro,' "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Soloist, Madame Melba.

These concerts are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

...ting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Esta ...884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Brahms' Fourth Symphony by Dr. Muck's Men on Initial Program.

Gloom and grandeur possessed the first concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy last evening. Dr. Karl Muck, looking as much as ever like Dante, led his stately band through four imposing numbers—Brahms' great "Sophocles" Symphony (the fourth), Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and "Les Preludes," by Liszt.

It was a concert that, when it was not big, which was only in the Strauss tone poem, was beautiful. The separate splendors of the Boston's choirs are long proven; but last night, in the symphony, the reeds were really "half angel, and half bird," and the soprano and tenor strings were "all a wonder and a wild desire." A very large house showered applause on the sombre music and the musicians, forcing two "rising recalls" from Muck's men. It was an occasion without glitter—but without tinsel.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estal ...884

Boston Symphony

Dr. Muck Conducts First Program of Season, Without Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving the first of its series of five concerts, scheduled to take place this season at the Academy of Music, its local appearances having for several years been limited to that number, was given a cordial welcome by the usual large audience last evening, the house being completely filled. While the concert was without a soloist, the program, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was one of the best ever given here by the Boston orchestra, and the concert scarcely can fail to remain as a memory spot in the musical experience of every person that heard it.

The first of the four compositions presented was Brahms's fourth symphony, in E minor, a work of great scope and profound musicianship, if not more beautiful, at least in noticeable contrast to the composer's second symphony, because of its general tone of melodious simplicity frequently called the "Pastoral," which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra at its last week's concerts. In his fourth symphonic work, Brahms sounded wonderful depths and soared to marvelous heights, and while, as seems to be the case with the majority of great compositions, there was at first some doubts of its acceptance as a masterpiece, the passing years have declared its true value, and to-day it is named as one of the greatest achievements of the famous German.

---

Dr. Muck read it last evening with the calmness of manner so characteristic of him, and which at times seems almost to partake of indifference, but which nevertheless produces the finest of results, and it is quite evident that the musicians under his baton have been so well drilled in rehearsals, and are so sure of doing just what is required of them, that the conductor is spared anything in the way of strenuous effort, when before an audience. Nothing more beautiful in the way of orchestral tone color can be imagined than was presented in the andante of the symphony, fairly ravishing being the effects produced by the pizzicato strings and the horns and woodwinds, while the brasses were veiled in a mellowness of vibrant sound that enriched the ensemble without once breaking the flow of exquisite melodization. The scherzo movement, allegro giocoso, was taken at a rapid pace, and played with delightful vigor and sprightliness, and the finale was so splendidly given that an ovation of applause followed.

Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," receiving an interpretation that emphasized its classic beauty, was followed by a graphic presentation of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Tod un Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguration"), full value being given to the many passages of true melody in the first part, while the succeeding climax of tremendous vociferation, in which the full force of the combined instruments is heard with impressive effect, is followed by more of the melodious strains that Strauss is capable of writing when he choses, and in which the warbling of the flutes and the rhapsodizing of the harps mark passing episodes of irresistible charm. After the superb interpretation of this work, and again at the end of the program, which was closed with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," played in a manner that was absolutely thrilling, the orchestra was given a genuine ovation, for the third time, at the signal of the conductor, the musicians rising in a body to acknowledge the applause. The second concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, November 29, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estab ...88

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Opening of Local Season With Dr. Muck Again Directing.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated its thirty-first season last night at the Academy of Music. With Brahms' E minor symphony and the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," on the same program, in addition to the "Manfred" overture of Schumann and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," it can readily be seen that the concert was generously long. The orchestra was in superb condition. It might almost be said to have improved in tone and general work. Certainly a more perfect ensemble than that heard last night would be impossible to imagine.

This was particularly in evidence during the closing moments of the Strauss tone poem, when the unison was so flawless that it assumed an almost supernatural quality. The tonal proportions seemed absolutely even—not an instrument heard individually, but all sinking into a harmonious accord. The Brahms Symphony was given with a clearness and conciseness that laid bare every theme and left the hearer free to follow the beauty of the execution, revel in the flexibility of tone exhibited and the fine, scholarly interpretation offered.

For manipulation of the orchestra the Strauss tone poem stood supreme. Dr. Muck obtained from this erratic, but moving work every vestige of power and expression it possesses. Despite this powerful portrayal, however, the real treat of the evening was the beautiful treatment of Schumann's "Manfred" overture. The subtle grace of Schumann was present every moment and made the interpretation memorable. The Liszt "Les Preludes" was an expressive conclusion to an evening of great interest.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2.—Miss Marga Wilson, who has returned from a short stay in New York, today attended the opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theatre. In the box reserved for the President's family Miss Wilson entertained Commissioner and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, Mrs. William Hitz and Carmine Fabrizio, violinist. Mr. Fabrizio assisted Miss Wilson in some of her recent recitals.

Mrs. George W. Vanderbilt and her young daughter, Miss Cornelia Vanderbilt, arrived yesterday from their estate at Biltmore, N. C., and are at their K street home for the early winter.

Alberto de I. Moriera, first secretary of the Brazilian Embassy, and Manuel de Freyre y Santander, secretary of the Peruvian Legation, were among those entertaining luncheon parties at the Willard today.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Esta 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Brahms' Fourth Symphony Feature of Opening Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Karl Muck opened its local season before a large and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the most substantial and important feature of the programme was Brahms' fourth symphony in E minor. This is an austere and erudite work, which even those who have learned to love the music of Brahms for the perfection of its form, the elevation of its sentiment and the noble beauty of its themes are apt to find somewhat exacting and which certainly needs to be well known to be properly enjoyed and fully understood.

It is not music which can be appreciated without any mental effort. Only when it is listened to with a careful and intelligent attention does it disclose its message, and to those who want obvious melodies or resounding climaxes it must be disappointing. Yet it is unquestionably a masterpiece of art, and while it lacks something of the second's charm and of the fervor and poetic majesty of the third, it is very great music and it is suffused with a most sincere and eloquently communicative emotion. It was admirably played, with a remarkable loveliness of tone and a fine lucidity of analysis, and the impression which its performance produced was profound. It exhibited the orchestra in its best form and anticipated all the rest.

Other numbers on the programme were Schumann's gloomy "Manfred" overture and Richard Schumann's wonderful tone poem, "Death and Resurrection," perhaps the best and the most valuable among compositions of its class, which was rendered with a surpassing brilliancy of execution and with a volume of tone which conveyed the full significance of its tremendous crescendos. An inspired and inspiring interpretation of Liszt's "Preludes" brought the proceedings to a satisfying close.

...Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York City

Date NOV 4 - 1915

Es 1884

To-night the Boston Symphony men open a sold out season at Carnegie Hall. The symphony number is Brahms's Fourth, followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's "Husitzka."

W. S. CHASE.

...Cutting Bureau in the World

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

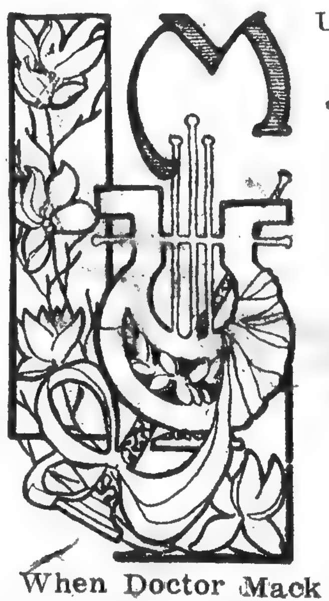
Esta ...4

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS ACCORDED AN OVATION

Orchestra Obliged to Rise to Its Feet to Acknowledge Plaudits

IN ROMANTIC PROGRAM

Strauss' 'Tod Und Verklarung' Most Profound Number Presented



MUCH of the manner of long-etablished friendship characterized the exchange of amenities between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and local music-lovers last night, when the organization appeared at the Academy of Music in the first concert of its thirty-first annual series in this city. When Doctor Mack lifted his baton for the opening number, there was hardly a vacant seat in the big auditorium. And twice during the program—after the symphony and after a spirited performance of Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung"—the entire orchestra was compelled to acknowledge applause by rising.

The program was entirely orthodox both in construction and content. It was chosen from modern composers, and of the moderns, those commonly labeled romanticists. True, it opened with a Brahms symphony, but it was Brahms in his most romantic mood—the fourth in E minor; and offsetting the weightier elements of this work were Schuman's "Manfred" overture, the Strauss number, and the familiar "Les Preludes" of Liszt.

The first interest of the concert the major portion of the audience ...

---

not only because Doctor Muck and his organization are authoritative on Strauss, but because it was the most profound offering of the evening. This is a work which wears well. It was eloquently rendered last night—simply, without exaggeration, but in a boldly declarative manner.

The academic point of view that made Doctor Muck's reading of Brahms entirely conventional gave the Strauss interpretation its finest qualities. Doctor Muck conducted as a man who merely starts, so to speak, a well-ordered instrument. The brass choir, which had more than usual prominence in this program, did excellent work and the strings were especially adroit. Conspicuous in the organization was T. Cella, the youth...

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 2

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ACADEMY

Season Begins With Brahms' Fourth Symphony in Concert Without Soloist

PROGRAM.

Fourth Symphony........................Brahms
"Manfred" Overture..................Schumann
"Tod und Verklaesung"................Strauss
"Les Preludes"............................Liszt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, played gloriously at the Academy last evening, and held a crowded house spellbound from the first note to the last. As usual with the opening concert in the series, there was no soloist, though the orchestra itself played as one man. If there be a stricture to offer as to the composition of the program it might be said that the final number—played just as well as any of the rest—did not seem to belong in such noble company; its sentimental "sound and fury" does not ring true when tested by the standard set in the second movement of the great E minor symphony of Brahms. The Vennsberg is not Parnassus, and with the passage of time even the Liszt idolaters must begin to discover the feet of clay supporting the object of their adoration.

The playing of the symphony fairly glowed with fervent life; the first violins with their inimitable old Italian tone sang through the opening movement with a choral resonance, bowing unerringly together, and giving a vital pulsebeat of accent and nuance to every line of the score. It is a foolish habit of some persons who accept any shopworn opinion they hear, to say that the Boston players are too coldly and classically perfect; that they are polished and refined till all the life and primal fire have been expunged from their performance. Those who have fallen into that error should have been present last night to feel the enormous gusto, the vibrant drive, the elan and elasticity that went into the "Allegro Giocoso." In the Andante there was a celestial outpour of hymning voices, of oboe and horn and clarinet, in confluent pure streams of sound; and there were mighty hammer-strokes in the finale (not the best of the movements), with the basses and 'cellos grandly fundamental now and again.

The "Manfred" overture maintained the same plane of feeling and inspiration in romantic mood and variegated idiom as the reflex of Byronic passion. Doctor Muck in the latter part of his program, it is obvious, juxtaposed three different readings of the riddle of human life and destiny. Schumann, Strauss and Liszt in the works chosen depict the human soul at odds with fate, and out of fever and turbulence reaching now and then quiescent interludes, till the spirit at last inherits "the vasty hall of Death." In the Strauss tone-poem, with its opulence of clangor and color, the delicious mellowness of answering voices among oboe, flute and violin was in the similarity of timbre hardly distinguishable. Anton Wilek's violin outbreathed like a wind instrument. There was a mountainous climax with a thundercloud of brasses atop of it, and the tympanist's strength was as the strength of ten. Let it be noted that Theodore Cella, our youthful and gifted Philadelphia harpist, made his debut as a member of the Boston organization at this point in the evening's proceedings, at the second harp. F. L. W.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

FIRST CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Cordially Greeted and Presents Long Program in a Masterly Way.

PROGRAM.

Fourth Symphony	Brahms
"Manfred" Overture	Schumann
"Death and Transfiguration"	Strauss
"Les Preludes"	Liszt
Conductor	Dr. Karl Muck

Twice during last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music the enthusiasm was so great that Dr. Muck, the conductor, after repeatedly bowing acknowledgment motioned to the musicians to stand and share with him the tribute that the audience paid to their great art. It was a wonderful program that the Boston Orchestra presented here at the first concert of their present season.

The orchestra returns this year with little change in its personnel. In fact the great ensemble playing of the Boston men is due to the fact that there are very few changes from year to year, and most of the chairs are filled by men whose faces are familiar to Boston Symphony goers, covering a period almost since the introduction of the orchestra to Philadelphia. An exceptional last evening was the first appearance here of Theodore Cella, the Philadelphia harpist, who became connected with the orchestra after the last concert in Philadelphia last season.

Breadth of the Program.

As is usual at the first concert there was no soloist. Such an addition is never reckoned when Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony plays. The finished art of all the members of the orchestra, and the unification of tone that the conductor is able to draw from his instrumental body, is of such a satisfying character, that nothing further could be desired. Dr. Muck's skill at program-making was again demonstrated in presenting a Symphony with three other brilliant numbers, all of which conformed, yet with a brilliancy and breadth that called into being every part of the musicians' art.

The success of a Brahms symphony is largely dependent upon the conductor who is able to make of it what might otherwise be a mathematical problem, a fresh and vitalized outpouring of genius. Dr. Muck's reading last evening was a notable triumph. He brings out all the meaning, the grace and the charm of the big work, and the many recalls he received were the best evidence of the great delight he had afforded.

In strong contrast was the reading of the big Strauss work and the Liszt musical "Preludes." Both of these numbers Dr. Muck gave their full significance, whether it was the noisy and weird tone poem or the sweet and floating music of Liszt. It is the individuality of his work that always makes the conducting of Dr. Muck of such magnetic force, and there is evidence that the orchestra must feel this as does the audience, by the magnificent way in which they respond.

The "Manfred" overture is infrequently played, but contains much musical beauty, especially in its latter part. The Boston Orchestra's next concert will be given on November 29, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT.

Opening Programme of New York Season Splendidly Played Under Dr. Muck's Direction.

Musical solidity of the sort typical of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dominated the opening New York concert of the current season which this organization gave in Carnegie Hall last night.

This characteristic was especially apparent in the fourth E minor symphony of Brahms that Dr. Muck selected for his introductory number. To the average music patron there is little in the composition of sufficient emotional appeal to make a vivid impression. But for the musician the symphony is an intellectual treat.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony was ideal in its scholastic qualities—severe and precise to the uttermost detail, and his musicians played with a care and finish needed to create the effect sought.

Less formality was present in the performance of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which requires, and on this occasion received, a broad interpretation and instrumental flexibility for the fullest exposition of its poetic qualities.

For most of the 3,000 persons in the auditorium the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," was the most satisfying achievement of the night. Certainly it has never been given with a greater wealth of tone, color and technical skill. Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," which closed the programme, also won hearty recognition for its spontaneous performance.

One does not hear much finer orchestral playing than that the visiting organization furnished last night.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

A Great Audience at Its First Appearance in Its 30th Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck, its conductor, received a hearty greeting last evening at its first appearance in New York this season; the greeting and the size and quality of the audience left no doubt as to the place they hold in the esteem of the music-loving public of this city. It was the beginning of its thirtieth season in New York. The hall was, as it has been for so many years at these concerts, completely filled by an audience whose taste and discrimination are of the highest. Dr. Muck presented one of his best programs, one made up entirely of familiar compositions, all modern and all evidently much to the liking of the listeners, presenting them no problems and giving obvious pleasure that was unmistakably expressed. The symphony, coming at the beginning of the program, was Brahms's fourth, in E minor; it was followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's tone poem "Tod und Verklärung," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

The performance of this music was in the Boston Orchestra's finest and most eloquent style, and this was particularly true of the symphony, whose fiery and romantic spirit and grandiose power were magnificently set forth. Dr. Muck's reading was composed on the broadest lines, with a subtle adjustment of all its details and proportions in phrasing, in the balance of orchestral color, in the exposition of the climaxes. Such a reading and such a performance truly represent Brahms's mastery of instrumentation in the precise and significant expression of his musical ideas. The audience was deeply stirred and manifested great enthusiasm over the performance. Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and finally made the orchestra rise and share the applause with him.

The playing of the other numbers of the program was on the same plane. The tragic power of Schumann's overture was truly expressed, and the fullness of descriptive and illustrative detail in Strauss's tone poem was not allowed to obscure its quality as coherent and profoundly moving music. This, too, made a deep impression upon the audience; there was prolonged applause, and again Dr. Muck declined to accept it all for himself

---

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN TRIUMPHS

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Lives Up to Reputation at Season's Opening.

BRILLIANT AUDIENCE THERE

Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung" Is a Fascinating Achievement.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck at its head, made a triumphant entry into New York last night goes without saying. It seems almost superfluous, in fact, to set down at this time more than a bare report of this yearly invasion, giving the programme, which comprised Brahms's Symphony in E minor, No. 4, opus 98; Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Strauss's tone-poem, "Tod und Verklaerung," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture, and noting that orchestra and conductor lived up to their reputation at the season's first concert in Carnegie Hall.

The size and brilliancy of the audience, the reception given to Dr. Muck and his musicians, who twice rose at their leader's request to share honors with him—those were things which every one took as a matter of course. They were as traditional as the limpid tone, the euphony, the rhythmical precision and all the other qualities of the orchestra to which attention has been called so often.

Yet the playing of the visiting organization, under the scholarly baton of Dr. Muck, familiar as it is, always delights and surprises anew, particularly at the beginning of the season, and so last night the listener did not cease marveling during the course of the evening, even when there was occasion to differ with the leader's interpretative ideas, at the sheer beauty of performance. Only occasionally, when brass and wood-wind, in difficult passages, missed slightly the correct pitch, could one note any defects, and those excusable shortcomings would hardly have attracted attention had they not been thrown into contrast with so much that approached close to perfection.

From a technical point of view the performance of Strauss's tone-poem represented the most fascinating achievement of the evening. Never before, probably, had so finely balanced, so transparent, so finished a reading of this work been heard in New York. But while the quiet introduction, taken at a remarkably broad tempo, and the tremendous finale, built up with imposing effect, gave complete satisfaction, one

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The first of the five concerts wh the Boston Symphony Orchestra is give in Philadelphia the coming seas will be heard tomorrow evening in t Academy of Music. There will be soloist, but Doctor Muck has arrang a program of allurement. Since la year there have only been four chang in the personnel of the orchestra, a ne third flute, a new third trumpet, a new second violin and a new member of the battery, so that Doctor Muck has had very little new material to drill. Moreover, the orchestra has been playing continuously since September 27, with a week of rehearsals in Boston, a week's tour in the West and then the opening of the regular season in its home city. The symphony will be Brahms' in E minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the programe will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

DR. KARL MUCK

The program in its entirety is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; Schumann, overture, "Manfred"; R. Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

ORCHESTRAL SEASON OPENS.

The Boston Symphony Players and Miss Hinkle Make Initial Bow.

The opening of the season's orchestral concerts was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon before its usual large and distinguished audience, when Dr. Muck presented a program that was rarely beautiful. And the delightfully musical voice of Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano soloist, added a rich contribution to a program of the German masters.

In bringing to us the Beethoven seventh symphony, Dr. Muck also offered in this varied master work a novelty as well for concert goers here in recent seasons. Fineness, lightness, simplicity and some of the most difficult of fine phrasing because so clear and obvious, characterized the really inimitable work of these players in the first movement. And with this fineness all through and a wealth of tonal color, the variety of the dirge-like "Allegretto" in A minor, with its rich tone and masterful fugato, as against the charming, illusive "Presto," and again to the rollicking, temperamental "rondo" was vitally contrasted and masterfully played.

Miss Hinkle was heard in the "Voi, che sapete" of Mozart and the dramatic cantata "Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire" of Max Bruch. Her voice is lyric with all the finish to add grace and beauty to the Mozart aria; but while not highly dramatic, yet her truly beautiful singing, the velvet of her voice throughout its range and her artistry made the four beautiful sections of the Bruch cantata a truly lovely creation.

Dr. Muck was whimsical and also tender in the quiet of his interpretation of the Wagner "Siegfrid Idyl." It seemed to embody more truly than ever before the purpose for which it was secretly written as a serenade from the floor below to the mother and her newborn son. It was playful, and then soared, but still quietly, into all the prophetic beauty of the Siegfried of the later opera. With the "Prelude" to the "Mastersingers" to close the program, a second touch of the revelation of human nature from the great music dramatist was given with all its genial glow and wealth of harmonies brought up to a splendid climax.

J. MacB.

[34]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will begin its annual series of concerts at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Florence Hinkle, soprano.

The orchestra assembled as long ago as September 27, and has had five weeks of continuous work before coming to Washington, instead of the usual three. The changes in the personnel this year are but four in number, one in the flute section, one in the second violin section, one in the trumpet section and one in the percussion department.

Miss Florence Hinkle, the soloist, is well and favorably known in Washington. She is one of the foremost sopranos of today, and devotes herself exclusively to concert work. Her voice is of most unusual purity and beauty, and she adds to this sound musical training.

The program opens with the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "Apotheosis of the Dance," as Richard Wagner called it. It includes "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Miss Hinkle will sing twice; the Page's cavatina, "Voi che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria," from Max Bruch's "The Cross of Fire."

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 31 1

MADAME MELBA IN CONCERT

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its first series of concerts in Baltimore in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, November 3. With Mme. Melba as soloist the evening promises to be memorable. Accounts from Boston have it that the orchestra began its season there a fortnight ago in "midseason form," playing as it is usually expected to play along in November and December, rather than at the very beginning of the year. This is due to several factors. There have been only four minor changes in the personnel this year—a new third flute, a new third trumpet, a new second violinist and a new member to the percussion department. On this account Dr. Muck had small trouble whipping the orchestra into shape and drilling new members. Moreover, the orchestra has been together playing since September 27, for then began a week of rehearsals for its preliminary Western trip, which was followed by the tour itself, and as a result, when it comes to Baltimore it will have played five weeks instead of the customary three.

As for Melba, who will be the soloist, all accounts agree that her voice has never been lovelier than it is today, nor her art more convincing. Her concerts so far this season have been veritable triumphs.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged for Baltimore is one of great interest. The symphony will be Brahms' Fourth, in E minor. This has been prepared, in a sense, especially for Baltimore, in response to many requests that were sent to Dr. Muck last season by patrons of the orchestra in this city.

Mme. Melba will appear twice to sing three pieces. Her first will be the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso," and her second will be two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." An outstanding number on the program will be the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler. Inspired by the mythical play of Maeterlinck, Mr. Loeffler has written a work which stands high in value among modern compositions.

The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E minor. No 4	Brahms
Aria—Sweet Bird, from Il Penseroso	Handel
La Mort de Tintagiles	Loeffler
Two arias from The Marriage or Figaro. Porgi Amor. Voi che sapete	Mozart
Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg,	Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Theodore Cella, the Philadelphia harpist, who last Spring joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first apearance here with that organization at the concert to-morrow evening. Mr. Cella is the youngest member of the orchestra, being only past eighteen, but Dr. Muck considers him one of the most wonderful harpists in America, and predicts a great future for him, not only as a harpist, but as a composer, as Mr. Cella has already written quite a library of music, not only for his instrument, but even compositions as long as a symphony.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Established:

FIRST CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Cordially Greeted and Presents Long Program in a Masterly Way.

PROGRAM.

Fourth Symphony	Brahms
"Manfred" Overture	Schumann
"Death and Transfiguration"	Strauss
"Les Preludes"	Liszt
Conductor	Dr. Karl Muck

Twice during last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music the enthusiasm was so great that Dr. Muck, the conductor, after repeatedly bowing acknowledgment motioned to the musicians to stand and share with him the tribute that the audience paid to their great art. It was a wonderful program that the Boston Orchestra presented here at the first concert of their present season.

The orchestra returns this year with little change in its personnel. In fact the great ensemble playing of the Boston men is due to the fact that there are very few changes from year to year, and most of the chairs are filled by men whose faces are familiar to Boston Symphony goers, covering a period almost since the introduction of the orchestra to Philadelphia. An exceptional last evening was the first appearance here of Theodore Cella, the Philadelphia harpist, who became connected with the orchestra after the last concert in Philadelphia last season.

Breadth of the Program.

As is usual at the first concert there was no soloist. Such an addition is never reckoned when Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony plays. The finished art of all the members of the orchestra, and the unification of tone that the conductor is able to draw from his instrumental body, is of such a satisfying character, that nothing further could be desired. Dr. Muck's skill at program-making was again demonstrated in presenting a Symphony with three other brilliant numbers, all of which conformed, yet with a brilliancy and breadth that called into being every part of the musicians' art.

The success of a Brahms symphony is largely dependent upon the conductor who is able to make of it what might otherwise be a mathematical problem, a fresh and vitalized outpouring of genius. Dr. Muck's reading last evening was a notable triumph. He brings out all the meaning, the grace and the charm of the big work, and the many recalls he received were the best evidence of the great delight he had afforded.

In strong contrast was the reading of the big Strauss work and the Liszt musical "Preludes." Both of these numbers Dr. Muck gave their full significance, whether it was the noisy and weird tone poem or the sweet and floating music of Liszt. It is the individuality of his work that always makes the conducting of Dr. Muck of such magnetic force, and there is evidence that the orchestra must feel this as does the audience, by the magnificent way in which they respond.

The "Manfred" overture is infrequently played, but contains much musical beauty, especially in its latter part. The Boston Orchestra's next concert will be given on November 29, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date
Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT.

Opening Programme of New York Season Splendidly Played Under Dr. Muck's Direction.

Musical solidity of the sort typical of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dominated the opening New York concert of the current season which this organization gave in Carnegie Hall last night.

This characteristic was especially apparent in the fourth E minor symphony of Brahms that Dr. Muck selected for his introductory number. To the average music patron there is little in the composition of sufficient emotional appeal to make a vivid impression. But for the musician the symphony is an intellectual treat.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony was ideal in its scholastic qualities—severe and precise to the uttermost detail, and his musicians played with a care and finish needed to create the effect sought.

Less formality was present in the performance of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which requires, and on this occasion received, a broad interpretation and instrumental flexibility for the fullest exposition of its poetic qualities.

For most of the 3,000 persons in the auditorium the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," was the most satisfying achievement of the night. Certainly it has never been given with a greater wealth of tone, color and technical skill. Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," which closed the programme, also won hearty recognition for its spontaneous performance.

One does not hear much finer orchestral playing than that the visiting organization furnished last night.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915
Establi 84

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

A Great Audience at Its First Appearance in Its 30th Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck, its conductor, received a hearty greeting last evening at its first appearance in New York this season; the greeting and the size and quality of the audience left no doubt as to the place they hold in the esteem of the music-loving public of this city. It was the beginning of its thirtieth season in New York. The hall was, as it has been for so many years at these concerts, completely filled by an audience whose taste and discrimination are of the highest. Dr. Muck presented one of his best programs, one made up entirely of familiar compositions, all modern and all evidently much to the liking of the listeners, presenting them no problems and giving obvious pleasure that was unmistakably expressed. The symphony, coming at the beginning of the program, was Brahms's fourth, in E minor; it was followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's tone poem "Tod und Verklärung," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

The performance of this music was in the Boston Orchestra's finest and most eloquent style, and this was particularly true of the symphony, whose fiery and romantic spirit and grandiose power were magnificently set forth. Dr. Muck's reading was composed on the broadest lines, with a subtle adjustment of all its details and proportions in phrasing, in the balance of orchestral color, in the exposition of the climaxes. Such a reading and such a performance truly represent Brahms's mastery of instrumentation in the precise and significant expression of his musical ideas. The audience was deeply stirred and manifested great enthusiasm over the performance. Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and finally made the orchestra rise and share the applause with him.

The playing of the other numbers of the program was on the same plane. The tragic power of Schumann's overture was truly expressed, and the fullness of descriptive and illustrative detail in Strauss's tone poem was not allowed to obscure its quality as coherent and profoundly moving music. This, too, made a deep impression upon the audience; there was prolonged applause, and again Dr. Muck declined to accept it all for himself

---

York City
E k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN TRIUMPHS

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Lives Up to Reputation at Season's Opening.

BRILLIANT AUDIENCE THERE

Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung" Is a Fascinating Achievement.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck at its head, made a triumphant entry into New York last night goes without saying. It seems almost superfluous, in fact, to set down at this time more than a bare report of this yearly invasion, giving the programme, which comprised Brahms's Symphony in E minor, No. 4, opus 98; Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Strauss's tone-poem, "Tod und Verklaerung," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture, and noting that orchestra and conductor lived up to their reputation at the season's first concert in Carnegie Hall.

The size and brilliancy of the audience, the reception given to Dr. Muck and his musicians, who twice rose at their leader's request to share honors with him—those were things which every one took as a matter of course. They were as traditional as the limpid tone, the euphony, the rhythmical precision and all the other qualities of the orchestra to which attention has been called so often.

Yet the playing of the visiting organization, under the scholarly baton of Dr. Muck, familiar as it is, always delights and surprises anew, particularly at the beginning of the season, and so last night the listener did not cease marveling during the course of the evening, even when there was occasion to differ with the leader's interpretative ideas, at the sheer beauty of performance. Only occasionally, when brass and wood-wind, in difficult passages, missed slightly the correct pitch, could one note any defects, and those excusable shortcomings would hardly have attracted attention had they not been thrown into contrast with so much that approached close to perfection.

From a technical point of view the performance of Strauss's tone-poem represented the most fascinating achievement of the evening. Never before, probably, had so finely balanced, so transparent, so finished a reading of this work been heard in New York. But while the quiet introduction, taken at a remarkably broad tempo, and the tremendous finale, built up with imposing effect, gave complete satisfaction, one

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Estab

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season will be heard tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music. There will be no soloist, but Doctor Muck has arranged a program of allurement. Since last year there have only been four changes in the personnel of the orchestra, a new third flute, a new third trumpet, a new second violin and a new member of the battery, so that Doctor Muck has had very little new material to drill. Moreover, the orchestra has been playing continuously since September 27, with a week of rehearsals in Boston, a week's tour in the West and then the opening of the regular season in its home city. The symphony will be Brahms' in E minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the programe will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

DR. KARL MUCK

The program in its entirety is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; Schumann, overture, "Manfred"; R. Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
Esta 84

ORCHESTRAL SEASON OPENS.

The Boston Symphony Players and Miss Hinkle Make Initial Bow.

The opening of the season's orchestral concerts was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon before its usual large and distinguished audience, when Dr. Muck presented a program that was rarely beautiful. And the delightfully musical voice of Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano soloist, added a rich contribution to a program of the German masters.

In bringing to us the Beethoven seventh symphony, Dr. Muck also offered in this varied master work a novelty as well for concert goers here in recent seasons. Fineness, lightness, simplicity and some of the most difficult of fine phrasing because so clear and obvious, characterized the really inimitable work of these players in the first movement. And with this fineness all through and a wealth of tonal color, the variety of the dirge-like "Allegretto" in A minor, with its rich tone and masterful fugato, as against the charming, illusive "Presto," and again to the rollicking, temperamental "rondo" was vitally contrasted and masterfully played.

Miss Hinkle was heard in the "Voi, che sapete" of Mozart and the dramatic cantata "Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire," of Max Bruch. Her voice is lyric with all the finish to add grace and beauty to the Mozart aria; but while not highly dramatic, yet her truly beautiful singing, the velvet of her voice throughout its range and her artistry made the four beautiful sections of the Bruch cantata a truly lovely creation.

Dr. Muck was whimsical and also tender in the quiet of his interpretation of the Wagner "Siegfrid Idyl." It seemed to embody more truly than ever before the purpose for which it was secretly written as a serenade from the floor below to the mother and her newborn son. It was playful, and then soared, but still quietly, into all the prophetic beauty of the Siegfried of the later opera. With the "Prelude" to the "Mastersingers" to close the program, a second touch of the revelation of human nature from the great music dramatist was given with all its genial glow and wealth of harmonies brought up to a splendid climax.

J. MacB.

[34]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
884

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will begin its annual series of concerts at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Florence Hinkle, soprano.

The orchestra assembled as long ago as September 27, and has had five weeks of continuous work before coming to Washington, instead of the usual three. The changes in the personnel this year are but four in number, one in the flute section, one in the second violin section, one in the trumpet section and one in the percussion department.

Miss Florence Hinkle, the soloist, is well and favorably known in Washington. She is one of the foremost sopranos of today, and devotes herself exclusively to concert work. Her voice is of most unusual purity and beauty, and she adds to this sound musical training.

The program opens with the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "Apotheosis of the Dance," as Richard Wagner called it. It includes "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Miss Hinkle will sing twice; the Page's cavatina, "Voi che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria," from Max Bruch's "The Cross of Fire."

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 31
Establish

MADAME MELBA IN CONCERT

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its first series of concerts in Baltimore in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening, November 3. With Mme. Melba as soloist the evening promises to be memorable. Accounts from Boston have it that the orchestra began its season there a fortnight ago in "midseason form," playing as it is usually expected to play along in November and December, rather than at the very beginning of the year. This is due to several factors. There have been only four minor changes in the personnel this year—a new third flute, a new third trumpet, a new second violinist and a new member to the percussion department. On this account Dr. Muck had small trouble whipping the orchestra into shape and drilling new members. Moreover, the orchestra has been together playing since September 27, for then began a week of rehearsals for its preliminary Western trip, which was followed by the tour itself, and as a result, when it comes to Baltimore it will have played five weeks instead of the customary three.

As for Melba, who will be the soloist, all accounts agree that her voice has never been lovelier than it is today, nor her art more convincing. Her concerts so far this season have been veritable triumphs.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged for Baltimore is one of great interest. The symphony will be Brahms' Fourth, in E minor. This has been prepared, in a sense, especially for Baltimore, in response to many requests that were sent to Dr. Muck last season by patrons of the orchestra in this city.

Mme. Melba will appear twice to sing three pieces. Her first will be the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso," and her second will be two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." An outstanding number on the program will be the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler. Inspired by the mythical play of Maeterlinck, Mr. Loeffler has written a work which stands high in value among modern compositions.

The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No 4	Brahms
Aria—Sweet Bird, from Il Penseroso	Handel
La Mort de Tintagiles	Loeffler
Two arias from The Marriage or Figaro. Porgi Amor. Voi che sapete	Mozart
Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg,	Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Esta 1884

Theodore Cella, the Philadelphia harpist, who last Spring joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first apearance here with that organization at the concert to-morrow evening. Mr. Cella is the youngest member of the orchestra, being only past eighteen, but Dr. Muck considers him one of the most wonderful harpists in America, and predicts a great future for him, not only as a harpist, but as a composer, as Mr. Cella has already written quite a library of music, not only for his instrument, but even compositions as long as a symphony.

Newspape.

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season comes tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music. There will be no soloist, but Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of unusual musical interest.

In its opening concerts in Boston the orchestra showed that it was in "mid-season form." Since last year there have only been four changes in the personnel, a new third flute, a new third trumpet, a new second violin and a new member of the percussion department, so that Dr. Muck has had very little new material to drill. Moreover, the orchestra has been playing continuously since September 27; a week of rehearsals in Boston, a week's tour in the West and then its regular season in its home city.

The symphony will be Brahms' in E minor, No. 4. Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the programme will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Brahms..Symphony in E Minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Schumann.............. Overture, "Manfred"
R. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration.
Liszt.......Symphonie Poem, "Les Preludes"

Est 1884

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date [illegible]

Musical Events

THE 1915-16 series of concerts to be given at the National by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will begin Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30. The soloist will be the lyric soprano, Florence Hinkle, of surpassing interest.

Changes in the personnel of the orchestra this year are very few, four in number, so that Dr. Muck really began this fall where he stopped last spring after the San Francisco concert.

Miss Florence Hinkle is favorably known in Washington. She possesses a voice of unusual purity and beauty.

The program will begin with the immortal Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "Apotheosis of the Dance," as Richard Wagner called it. It includes the exquisite "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Miss Hinkle will sing twice, the Page's Cavatina, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria," from Max Bruch's, "The Cross of Fire."

Est 184

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

THE first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony is to give here this season comes on Monday evening, in the Academy. There will be no soloist, but Dr. Muck has arranged a program of unusual musical interest. The symphony will be Brahms in E minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the program will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Symphony in E minor, No. 4 ....Brahms
Overture, "Manfred" ....Schumann
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration,"
R. Strauss
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"..........Liszt

Es 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Dr. Muck's Orchestra, With Melba, Will Open Season.

Opening Baltimore's season of orchestral concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its annual series of five concerts at the Lyric tonight, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck and with Mme. Nellie Melba, the celebrated operatic soprano, as the soloist.

Interest in the Boston Symphony's concerts is said to be greater than ever, and it was reported at the box office this morning that the sale for tonight is the largest that has ever been recorded since the orchestra has been appearing in Baltimore.

Dr. Muck will present as the principal offering of the evening Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor. The other orchestral pieces will be Loeffler's tone poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," which was inspired by Maeterlinck's mystical play, and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

Mme. Melba, who is said to be in superb voice this season, will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso," and two arias from Mozart's "Figaro," the "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete."

E depths and

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City

Date NOV 5 - 1915

BOSTON BAND GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Esta 884

Schumann and Brahms, Dvorak and Richard Strauss were the names that Dr. Karl Muck chose to place upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first concert of the season in New York at Carnegie Hall last evening, marking the beginning of the thirtieth year that this band of musicians has been playing here. There was nothing new to the habitual concertgoers in this music, but the Boston orchestra itself always constitutes an event.

Dr. Muck's programme consisted of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, the overture from among Schumann's "Manfred" music, Strauss's so-called tone poem, "Tod und Verklaerung" and Dvorak's concert overture, "Husitska."

Dr. Muck and his men found a cordial greeting at the hands of an audience that was largely composed of the same persons, in the same places, as have greeted them in previous years and once again the house was filled, for the Boston band is a body that New Yorkers welcome as their own, wishing, indeed, that it were.

Nevertheless there have been more enlivening evenings than this of yesterday. The Brahms E minor symphony has that within it to touch the inner pulses, but there were no quickened palpitations as Dr. Muck unfolded its substance; Richard Strauss will never stir anyone into undue pulsation and Schumann's "Manfred" overture, even when as exquisitely played as the Boston Orchestra played it, is still only a Byronic transfusion—Byron grows more greyly mid-Victorian as the seasons roll by. And the Dvorak overture was an added ell that made the programme just that much too long.

The Brahms symphony is one of the most profoundly emotional utterances in modern orchestral literature and even its allegro giocoso may be made to intensify the sweep of its spirit. But Dr. Muck began the work in a smooth, unimpressive colloquial fashion, so that its first movement never achieved more than mere suavity of speech. There was in this movement and in the andante a meticulous articulation that made for a pursuasive clarity, effective merely as a coldly studied and precise analysis of the score. Only in the passacaglia did Brahms emerge and even there, there was still much unrevealed.

The Strauss piece was something for the virtuosoship of the orchestra. Here was opportunity for the display of all the beauties of technic of which these musicians are capable—a translucent string tone of the utmost finish in dynamic variation; a glorious richness and accuracy in the brass, and apparent perfection in the wood wind. This was all hugely satisfying in much the same way that it is satisfying to hear Fritz Kreisler play a Paganini caprice—and there is little difference in musical value between Strauss and Paganini, mountebanks both. Strauss originates tricks for the orchestra as Paganini did for the violin, but Strauss takes unto himself pretensions as to the potentialities of music as he makes it, and would have us believe that he can picture anything in tone, from a candle sputtering in the room of a dying man to father spanking the baby. One awaits breathlessly the depiction of the holes in Swiss cheese in the approaching "Alpine" symphony.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Da NOV 3 -

The Three Arts

Established

Much interest centres in the first symphony concert—it is to take place at the Lyric this evening under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck—not only because Mme. Melba, who is said to be in glorious voice, will make her initial appearance in Baltimore this season on this occasion, but also because the Brahms Fourth Symphony will be played.

This symphony, which has such a remarkable fourth movement—in it the composer made his boldest experiment in regard to form, reviving the passacaglia, that is to say the dance structure in triple time, and applying it to modern ideas—is being presented because many letters were received requesting it.

The actual popularity of this symphony, so far as the general public is concerned, is somewhat doubtful because it is so difficult to thread the mazes of ground bass through all the varieties to which it is subjected in the working out of the themes. However, the movement is regarded as Brahms' last word for the orchestra alone and a remarkable culmination of his work in this line.

In Miss May's biography of Br there is an interesting account of its formance at the last Philharmonic cert in Vienna which Brahms atte
It was very soon before his death.
biographer writes: "The Fourth phony had never become a favorite in Vienna. Received with reserve o first performance, it had not s gained much more from the general lic of the city than the respect su be accorded there to an important by Brahms. Today (March 7, 18 however, a storm of applause broke at the end of the first movement, no be quieted until the composer, comin the front of the artist's box in wh he was seated, showed himself to audience. The demonstration was renewed after the second and third movements, and an extraordinary scene followed the conclusion of the work. The applauding, shouting house, its gaze riveted on the figure standing in the balcony, so familiar and yet in present aspect so strange, seemed unable to let him go. Tears ran down his cheeks as he stood there, shrunken in form, with lined countenance, strained expression, white hair hanging lank; and through the audience there was a feeling as of a stifled sob, for each knew that they were saying farewell. Another outburst of applause and yet another; one more acknowledgment from the master; and Brahms and his Vienna had parted forever."

Melba will be heard in the famous scene from Handel's "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato," known as "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," which is an admirable number for the exploitation of bel canto, and also in two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart. "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che sapete."

Not the least interesting of the orchestral numbers will be Loeffler's dramatic tone poem that was suggested by Maeterlinck's "Le Mort de Tintagiles," which is scored for the full orchestra, but with a Viole d'Amour as the solo instrument. The Viole d'Amour will be played by Emile Ferir.

This instrument, which is bett known, perhaps, byt its Italian name
Viola d'Amore, is described as a ten viol having seven to fourteen symp thetic metal strings in addition to t seven strings which are run over t fingerboard for stopping. The symp thetic strings give a beautiful effect.
cannot really be regarded as an obs lete instrument, although it is ofte called so, for there have always bee players who perform upon it, eve though they are not numerous. It fi ures in the score of Meyerbeer's "H guenots."

The concert this evening will clos with the Vorspiel to Wagner's "D Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCORES

Miss Florence Hinkle Pleases as Soloist—Dr. Karl Muck is Conductor.

Establ

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave it's first matinee of the season yesterday afternoon, at the New National Theater to a crowded and enthusiastic house. Dr. Karl Muck conducted the orchestra while the soloist of the occasion was Miss Florence Hinkle.

The first number was Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, which was played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play it. The first and second movements never lose their charm and the fourth continues to be the least thing tedious. After a brief interval Miss Hinkle sang Mozart Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figard." Her beautiful soprano was shown off well by the leisurely and melodious if not very interesting number but the effect was a little spoilt by her restless manner.

The second number by the orchestra was Richard Wagner's beautiful "Siegfried Idyl." Written at the brightest period of the composer's life—a gift to his wife at the time of their son's birth—the Idyle, which is based upon certain of the themes of Siegfried," glows with happiness. It was weel received and Dr. Muck's admirable interpretation of the beautiful music was properly recognized.

Miss Hinkle followed it with Bruch's "Ave Maria" (from the "Feuerkreuz"), a highly dramatic but not very tuneful composition, considering the subject. It was superbly sung, however, and Miss Hinkle more than deserved the enthusiastic applause that recalled her to the stage again and again. The concluding number was the well known Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The next performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on November 30. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will be the soloist and the orchestra will again be under the able leadership of Dr. Karl Muck.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City

Da

In the Music World

AS soon as November arrives the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in New York. And as soon as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season commences the "house full" sign appears regularly in Carnegie Hall. That was the condition last evening, when Dr. Muck and his orchestra gave their first concert for the current season.

The achievements of the Boston Orchestra are so admirable and so remarkable that one is not surprised at so liberal a patronage on the part of the public. But that an orchestra should announce preliminary to its opening event "all seats for the entire series have been solr," is unique even in the records of so distinguished a company of musicians.

There was neither a novelty nor a soloist last evening. The programme contained four numbers. There were Brahms' symphony, No. 4; Schumann's overture, "Manfred"; Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska."

The symphony was played with warmth and color, with splendid homogeneity of tone and inspiration. The poetry and imagination of the Schumann number were clearly and dramatically illustrated.

Strauss's complicated and characteristically complex tone-poem was read with sincere and earnest endeavor. His many and curious "effects" were presented lucidly, and the efforts of the musicians were deservedly appreciated.

Es k, 1884

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date NOV 5 - 191

Dr. Muck and Men Open with 'High Brow' Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives the First Concert of Its New York Season.

Esta 84

Following closely New York's Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestras, both of which have played their first programme this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its inspiring conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, opened its New York season last night, giving the first of two concerts of the week in Carnegie Hall. As usual, the great auditorium was filled. The conductor received an enthusiastic welcome of applause when he took his place, and after the big numbers of the programme he was called to the stage repeatedly, and the members of the orchestra had to rise and bow their acknowledgment of the applause several times.

The character of the music played by the men from Boston was of the severest type. Dr. Muck's programmes often have been puzzles. They never seem made by any set rule. He evidently wants during the season to play something for every class represented in the audience, laying special stress on German music always.

Last night there was no doubt he was making his appeal to the highest of "high-brows"—to the seasoned listener. The deepest and most scholarly symphony of the most severely classical composers of recent years, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and the most powerful of the tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration) were the works designed to satisfy the longing for good music of the three thousand or more listeners.

Of course, there was a little Schumann and Dvorak thrown in to round off the programme and to relieve the tension caused by the more serious numbers. No soloist was present to share the applause with Dr. Muck and his men, which, after the symphony, was tremendous. Few conductors seem to get so much out of the music of Brahms as he. The climaxes were played with extraordinary force. The work of the orchestra was well worth the applause it received.

Not less moving was the interpretation of the Strauss tone poem. Performances by the Philharmonic Society of the same work have been, perhaps, more polished, but not so forceful. The loud crashes of the brass, which were not always absolutely in tune, were not of the kind to make the hearer want to hold his ears, as are many such climaxes in smaller halls, but they had a striking fulness.

"Tod und Verkl Arung," composed when Strauss was only twenty-five years old, seems to have marked his highest achievement. Probably there is no more perfect piece of programme music in existence. Its pictures of a man fighting against Death are among the most striking in all the field of descriptive music, and to many Strauss at twenty-five was a greater composer than the Strauss of to-day. No other modern orchestra work holds its own so well with the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner.

The "Manfred" overture of Schumann and, at the close of the concert, Dvorak's "Husitska" were played. The Boston Orchestra will appear again to-morrow afternoon with a different programme.

[35]

Newspap… …

From INQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Est … 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season comes tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music. There will be no soloist, but Dr. Muck has arranged a programme of unusual musical interest.

In its opening concerts in Boston the orchestra showed that it was in "mid-season form." Since last year there have only been four changes in the personnel, a new third flute, a new third trumpet, a new second violin and a new member of the percussion department, so that Dr. Muck has had very little new material to drill. Moreover, the orchestra has been playing continuously since September 27; a week of rehearsals in Boston, a week's tour in the West and then its regular season in its home city.

The symphony will be Brahms' in E minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the programme will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Brahms..Symphony in E Minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Schumann.............. Overture, "Manfred"
R. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration.
Liszt.......Symphonie Poem, "Les Preludes"

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Est … 184

Musical Events

THE 1915-16 series of concerts to be given at the National by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will begin Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30. The soloist will be the lyric soprano, Florence Hinkle, of surpassing interest.

Changes in the personnel of the orchestra this year are very few, four in number, so that Dr. Muck really began this fall where he stopped last spring after the San Francisco concert.

Miss Florence Hinkle is favorably known in Washington. She possesses a voice of unusual purity and beauty.

The program will begin with the immortal Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, "Apotheosis of the Dance," as Richard Wagner called it. It includes the exquisite "A Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Miss Hinkle will sing twice, the Page's Cavatina, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the "Ave Maria," from Max Bruch's, "The Cross of Fire."

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Es … 1884

THE first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony is to give here this season comes on Monday evening, in the Academy. There will be no soloist, but Dr. Muck has arranged a program of unusual musical interest. The symphony will be Brahms in E minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the program will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Symphony in E minor, No. 4 ....Brahms
Overture, "Manfred" ....Schumann
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," R. Strauss
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"..........Liszt

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

E … , 1884

SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Dr. Muck's Orchestra, With Melba, Will Open Season.

Opening Baltimore's season of orchestral concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its annual series of five concerts at the Lyric tonight, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck and with Mme. Nellie Melba, the celebrated operatic soprano, as the soloist.

Interest in the Boston Symphony's concerts is said to be greater than ever, and it was reported at the box office this morning that the sale for tonight is the largest that has ever been recorded since the orchestra has been appearing in Baltimore.

Dr. Muck will present as the principal offering of the evening Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E minor. The other orchestral pieces will be Loeffler's tone poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," which was inspired by Maeterlinck's mystical play, and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

Mme. Melba, who is said to be in superb voice this season, will sing the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso," and two arias from Mozart's "Figaro," the "Porgi Amor" and "Voi che Sapete."

…derful depths and

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City

Date NOV 5 - 1915

Esta … 84

BOSTON BAND GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Schumann and Brahms, Dvorak and Richard Strauss were the names that Dr. Karl Muck chose to place upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first concert of the season in New York at Carnegie Hall last evening, marking the beginning of the thirtieth year that this band of musicians has been playing here. There was nothing new to the habitual concertgoers in this music, but the Boston orchestra itself always constitutes an event.

Dr. Muck's programme consisted of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, the overture from among Schumann's "Manfred" music, Strauss's so-called tone poem, "Tod und Verklaerung" and Dvorak's concert overture, "Husitska."

Dr. Muck and his men found a cordial greeting at the hands of an audience that was largely composed of the same persons, in the same places, as have greeted them in previous years and once again the house was filled, for the Boston band is a body that New Yorkers welcome as their own, wishing, indeed, that it were.

Nevertheless there have been more enlivening evenings than this of yesterday. The Brahms E minor symphony has that within it to touch the inner pulses, but there were no quickened palpitations as Dr. Muck unfolded its substance; Richard Strauss will never stir anyone into undue pulsation and Schumann's "Manfred" overture, even when as exquisitely played as the Boston Orchestra played it, is still only a Byronic transfusion—Byron grows more greyly mid-Victorian as the seasons roll by. And the Dvorak overture was an added ell that made the programme just that much too long.

The Brahms symphony is one of the most profoundly emotional utterances in modern orchestral literature and even its allegro giocoso may be made to intensify the sweep of its spirit. But Dr. Muck began the work in a smooth, unimpressive colloquial fashion, so that its first movement never achieved more than mere suavity of speech. There was in this movement and in the andante a meticulous articulation that made for a pursuasive clarity, effective merely as a coldly studied and precise analysis of the score. Only in the passacaglia did Brahms emerge and even there, there was still much unrevealed.

The Strauss piece was something for the virtuosoship of the orchestra. Here was opportunity for the display of all the beauties of technic of which these musicians are capable—a translucent string tone of the utmost finish in dynamic variation; a glorious richness and accuracy in the brass, and apparent perfection in the wood wind. This was all hugely satisfying in much the same way that it is satisfying to hear Fritz Kreisler play a Paganini caprice—and there is little difference in musical value between Strauss and Paganini, mountebanks both. Strauss originates tricks for the orchestra as Paganini did for the violin, but Strauss takes unto himself pretensions as to the potentialities of music as he makes it, and would have us believe that he can picture anything in tone, from a candle sputtering in the room of a dying man to father spanking the baby. One awaits breathlessly the depiction of the holes in Swiss cheese in the approaching "Alpine" symphony.

SUN
ore, Md.

NOV 3 -

Three Arts

…st centres in the first …cert—it is to take place …is evening under the di… Karl Muck—not only because Mme. Melba, who is said to be in glorious voice, will make her initial appearance in Baltimore this season on this occasion, but also because the Brahms Fourth Symphony will be played.

This symphony, which has such a remarkable fourth movement—in it the composer made his boldest experiment in regard to form, reviving the passacaglia, that is to say the dance structure in triple time, and applying it to modern ideas—is being presented because many letters were received requesting it.

The actual popularity of this symphony, so far as the general public is concerned, is somewhat doubtful because it is so difficult to thread the mazes of ground bass through all the varieties to which it is subjected in the working out of the themes. However, the movement is regarded as Brahms' last word for the orchestra alone and a remarkable culmination of his work in this line.

In Miss May's biography of Brahms there is an interesting account of its performance at the last Philharmonic concert in Vienna which Brahms attended. It was very soon before his death. The biographer writes: "The Fourth Symphony had never become a favorite work in Vienna. Received with reserve on its first performance, it had not since gained much more from the general public of the city than the respect sure to be accorded there to an important work by Brahms. Today (March 7, 1897), however, a storm of applause broke out at the end of the first movement, not to be quieted until the composer, coming to the front of the artist's box in which he was seated, showed himself to the audience. The demonstration was renewed after the second and third movements, and an extraordinary scene followed the conclusion of the work. The applauding, shouting house, its gaze riveted on the figure standing in the balcony, so familiar and yet in present aspect so strange, seemed unable to let him go. Tears ran down his cheeks as he stood there, shrunken in form, with lined countenance, strained expression, white hair hanging lank; and through the audience there was a feeling as of a stifled sob, for each knew that they were saying farewell. Another outburst of applause and yet another; one more acknowledgment from the master; and Brahms and his Vienna had parted forever."

Melba will be heard in the famous scene from Handel's "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato," known as "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," which is an admirable number for the exploitation of bel canto, and also in two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart, "Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che sapete."

Not the least interesting of the orchestral numbers will be Loeffler's dramatic tone poem that was suggested by Maeterlinck's "Le Mort de Tintagiles," which is scored for the full orchestra, but with a Viole d'Amour as the solo instrument. The Viole d'Amour will be played by Emile Ferir.

This instrument, which is better known, perhaps, byt its Italian name of Viola d'Amore, is described as a tenor viol having seven to fourteen sympathetic metal strings in addition to the seven strings which are run over the fingerboard for stopping. The sympathetic strings give a beautiful effect. It cannot really be regarded as an obsolete instrument, although it is often called so, for there have always been players who perform upon it, even though they are not numerous. It figures in the score of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

The concert this evening will close with the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Establ…

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCORES

Miss Florence Hinkle Pleases as Soloist—Dr. Karl Muck is Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave it's first matinee of the season yesterday afternoon, at the New National Theater to a crowded and enthusiastic house. Dr. Karl Muck conducted the orchestra while the soloist of the occasion was Miss Florence Hinkle.

The first number was Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, which was played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play it. The first and second movements never lose their charm and the fourth continues to be the least thing tedious. After a brief interval Miss Hinkle sang Mozart Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figard." Her beautiful soprano was shown off well by the leisurely and melodious if not very interesting number but the effect was a little spoilt by her restless manner.

The second number by the orchestra was Richard Wagner's beautiful "Siegfried Idyl." Written at the brightest period of the composer's life—a gift to his wife at the time of their son's birth—the Idyle, which is based upon certain of the themes of Siegfried," glows with happiness. It was weel received and Dr. Muck's admirable interpretation of the beautiful music was properly recognized.

Miss Hinkle followed it with Bruch's "Ave Maria" (from the "Feuerkreuz"), a highly dramatic but not very tuneful composition, considering the subject. It was superbly sung, however, and Miss Hinkle more than deserved the enthusiastic applause that recalled her to the stage again and again. The concluding number was the well known Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The next performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on November 30. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will be the soloist and the orchestra will again be under the able leadership of Dr. Karl Muck.

[35]

AMERICAN
: New York City

…k, 1884

…the Music World

…on as November arrives the …ston Symphony Orchestra ap… in New York. And as soon as …Boston Symphony Orchestra's …n commences the "house full" sign appears regularly in Carnegie Hall. That was the condition last evening, when Dr. Muck and his orchestra gave their first concert for the current season.

The achievements of the Boston Orchestra are so admirable and so remarkable that one is not surprised at so liberal a patronage on the part of the public. But that an orchestra should announce preliminary to its opening event "all seats for the entire series have been solr," is unique even in the records of so distinguished a company of musicians.

There was neither a novelty nor a soloist last evening. The programme contained four numbers. There were Brahms' symphony, No. 4; Schumann's overture, "Manfred"; Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska."

The symphony was played with warmth and color, with splendid homogeneity of tone and inspiration. The poetry and imagination of the Schumann number were clearly and dramatically illustrated.

Strauss's complicated and characteristically complex tone-poem was read with sincere and earnest endeavor. His many and curious "effects" were presented lucidly, and the efforts of the musicians were deservedly appreciated.

HERALD
: New York City

NOV 5 - 191…

…r. Muck and …Men Open with …igh Brow' Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives the First Concert of Its New York Season.

Following closely New York's Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestras, both of which have played their first programme this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its inspiring conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, opened its New York season last night, giving the first of two concerts of the week in Carnegie Hall. As usual, the great auditorium was filled. The conductor received an enthusiastic welcome of applause when he took his place, and after the big numbers of the programme he was called to the stage repeatedly, and the members of the orchestra had to rise and bow their acknowledgment of the applause several times.

The character of the music played by the men from Boston was of the severest type. Dr. Muck's programmes often have been puzzles. They never seem made by any set rule. He evidently wants during the season to play something for every class represented in the audience, laying special stress on German music always.

Last night there was no doubt he was making his appeal to the highest of "high-brows"—to the seasoned listener. The deepest and most scholarly symphony of the most severely classical composers of recent years, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and the most powerful of the tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration) were the works designed to satisfy the longing for good music of the three thousand or more listeners.

Of course, there was a little Schumann and Dvorak thrown in to round off the programme and to relieve the tension caused by the more serious numbers. No soloist was present to share the applause with Dr. Muck and his men, which, after the symphony, was tremendous. Few conductors seem to get so much out of the music of Brahms as he. The climaxes were played with extraordinary force. The work of the orchestra was well worth the applause it received.

Not less moving was the interpretation of the Strauss tone poem. Performances by the Philharmonic Society of the same work have been, perhaps, more polished, but not so forceful. The loud crashes of the brass, which were not always absolutely in tune, were not of the kind to make the hearer want to hold his ears, as are many such climaxes in smaller halls, but they had a striking fulness.

"Tod und Verkl Arung," composed when Strauss was only twenty-five years old, seems to have marked his highest achievement. Probably there is no more perfect piece of programme music in existence. Its pictures of a man fighting against Death are among the most striking in all the field of descriptive music, and to many Strauss at twenty-five was a greater composer than the Strauss of to-day. No other modern orchestra work holds its own so well with the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner.

The "Manfred" overture of Schumann and, at the close of the concert, Dvorak's "Husitska" were played. The Boston Orchestra will appear again to-morrow afternoon with a different programme.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date V 5 - 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD ONCE MORE

Es k, 1884

Brilliant Performance of Masterpieces by Brahms and Strauss.

DR. MUCK WELCOMED

The local orchestras having opened their seasons, it remained for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to come to town and give its first concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The auditorium was filled and there were the familiar expressions of pleasure at the reappearance of Dr. Karl Muck and his admirable body of musicians and of satisfaction at the beauty of the performance. The programme consisted of the E minor symphony of Brahms, the "Manfred" overture of Schumann, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." The list was too long by just this last number, for sufficient time had already been occupied, and, what was more important, a symmetrical and complete artistic scheme had been made.

But when interpretation rises to such a high plane as that of last evening minor sins should be condoned. Possibly those to whom the most chaste art is the most precious regretted that the playing of the orchestra rose to its supreme level in the tone poem of Strauss. The Brahms symphony was beautifully performed, but the orchestral virtuosity of Strauss opened the flood gates of the Bostonians' technic. Such a flow of gorgeously deep and exquisitely smooth orchestral tone must have refreshed and uplifted every soul.

Dr. Muck's skill in searching out the melodic idea in each page and bringing it to the hearer's attention without ever a touch of exaggeration or a distortion of the harmonic scheme is one of the most admirable of his qualities. In doing this he preserves to perfection the balance of tone, so that the instrumental song never acquires a rude exterior or an inner opacity. All is clear, transparent and nobly sonorous. His treatment of the great crescendo near the close of the Strauss work was a model of artistic discretion. It published all the splendors of the music and kept far away every suspicion of blatancy.

In this composition, as also in the symphony, the beautiful playing of the wind instruments, both wood and brass, was a continued joy. In phrasing, in shading, in balance and quality of tone the musicians left practically nothing to be desired. The Strauss work has never been presented here with more lucidity. The symphony was read as Dr. Muck always reads Brahms with the profoundest understanding and affection.

The Boston orchestra has lately sung its way from coast to coast and some of the Boston newspapers have rejoiced in that it has been accepted as a national institution. New York, gathering unto itself national significance in that calm assumption which sometimes irritates and often amuses the mighty West, long ago proclaimed the national importance of its accustomed visitor from Massachusetts.

Now at any rate New Yorkers may be pleased with the knowledge that the West and the gold coast have heard the lyric eloquence of the orchestra from the Back Bay. Let us hope that some day, when the swords of Europe have been sheathed again, this national orchestra may be heard in the concert halls on the other side of the Atlantic. With it may be carried the message that this body of musicians of all nations has throughout the dark days kept alive here the best traditions of the musical art of lands where art is silenced by the shrieking of the songs of battle.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AGLE
Address Brooklyn, N Y.
Date

INTERESTS CLASH IN MUSICAL FIELD

Est 84

Last Week of Boston Opera Company at the Manhattan Opera House.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

Nellie Melba the Soloist at the Academy—McCormack, Kreisler and Elman to Appear Soon.

The series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening next, November 5. With the largest subscription the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn, and with the incomparable Melba as soloist, and with a programme of unusual beauty, the concert should be one of the memorable events of the season. This will be [illegible]'s only appearance in Brook-

[illegible] sung more beautifully than she has in the various concerts she has given this fall. Melba, even at her worst, is worth going miles to hear. At her best, the beauty of her voice is indescribable. The symphony will be the lovely Eighth, by Beethoven ("the little Symphony in F," as the composer called it). An outstanding number will be the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, one of the greatest of the modern orchestral repertoires. Madame Melba will sing twice. Her first number will be the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso." Her second

MME. NELLIE MELBA

Operatic Prima Donna Who is to be the Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday Evening Next.

number will be two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro." The programme in full follows:

Symphony No. 8, in F major, Beethoven; aria, "Sweet Bird," from "Il Penseroso," Handel; La Mort de Tintagiles, Loeffler; two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor," "Voi che sapete," Mozart; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt, soloist Madame Melba.

Newspaper Cutting Bur

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
NOV 5 - 1915
Date

DR. MUCK LEADS BRAHMS SYMPHONY

884

Boston Musicians Heard in Superb Rendering of Work of Celebrated "Classicist."

STRANGE REMARKS ABOUT KEY

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Schumann's Manfred Are Also Heard.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Society gave the first concert of its annual New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. There was a large house, which, for all its well-guided enthusiasm, has not cured itself of its suburban habit of chattering loudly during the pauses between the movements of the symphony.

I had the honor of discovering, between the allegro giocoso and the allegro energico and passionato, that Bill's socks were red, silk and too small, and that the baby had the eczema. Then, reader, I did looke uponne the booke of Phyl de Hale, which every Boston symphoniac reads diligently and quotes next morning at breakfast, astonishing largely with his piquant musical erudition.

The symphony played was Brahms's Fourth. I am told that Brahms is coming into his own. Those who have loved Brahms since they first heard him, are like Hippoclides, in the quaint old tale. Hippoclides, shortly before his marriage indulged in a dance that savored of errotic extremism. His prospective father said to him: "Hippoclides, thou hast danced thy wife away." The young man replied nonchalantly: "Hippoclides does not care." Nor do we Brahmsites care. If persons are beginning to like the Fourth Symphony thirty years after it was written, it is they who are coming into their own, not Brahms. Had he been living I do not think he would have cared either. He lived in a world of his own.

Tonality of Symphony.

There has been some talk as to whether Brahms used the key of E Minor as the [illegible] of this symphony to organize mood of bleak [illegible]. There are those who attach to the various keys certain definite impressions and qualities. G Minor is melancholy, shy; C Sharp Minor is brutal and sinister; C Major must be very burgeois because it is described by the tono-maniacs as simple, naive, flat and commonplace. It is the Har'em among keys.

36

As for the idea that Brahms used the key of E Minor to diffuse a spirit of melancholy, Mr. Philip Hale tells us that Hugo Reimann held that E Minor is the tonality of the Fall of the year. Another tonal metaphysician from Nephelococcygia, or Cloud Cuckoo Town, held that the key of E Minor suggests Summer and hot days and harvest wreaths. I propose that such cloud cuckoos as discuss these fantastical and Aquinatian questions should make quite a devoted study of Jonathan Swift's description of Gulliver's voyage to Laputa and his sojourn there.

Splendid Playing.

As for the second movement andante moderato I venture to feel that it contains the finer breath and spirit of music and that, according to Tolstoi's definition of an art work as that which, proceeding direct from the heart of the artist, goes right to the heart of the hearer, it achieves perfection. Brahms has written new things in the old forms. This is all that is meant by calling him a classic. He has been complained of in terms reminiscent of Elia as lacking in a certain condescension. Do we ask the Alps to condescend? Do we look for a wink from the Acropolis?

As for the meaning of symphony, I do not know what it means. What does a sunset mean, or the storms gathering over the sea of peaks at the head of Windermere? Just beauty and themselves. The symphony was superbly played, as by masters. I can say no more. Other numbers on the programme were the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann's and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Marshall Kernochan says that Strauss is getting hackneyed. That may be. But I fancy that the composer of "Salome" is not quite within the somewhat Virgilian sympathies of Dr. Muck.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
NOV 5 - 1915
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie = Konzert.

Dr. Muck, geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall anläßlich des erſten diesjährigen Konzerts unſerer gefeierten Boſtoner Gäſte, mit freundlichſtem Beifall begrüßt, bot uns ein in drei Viertheilen deutſches Programm, das nur in ſeiner Schlußnummer einen Böhmen, den Oeſterreicher Dvorak, zu Worte kommen ließ. Vorwiegend elegiſcher Stimmung, bildete gerade Dvorak's „Huſſitska"-Ouverture in ihrem lebendig und dramatiſch pulſirenden muſikaliſchen Blut eine willkommene Abwechslung, eine kräftige Antitheſe zu den zuvor gehörten pathetiſchen Tönen.

Brahms Vierte Symphonie, in dem ſonſt von den Symphonikern ſorgſam gemiedenen falben E-Moll, iſt mir ein unendlich ſympathiſches Werk, wenn es auch unleugbar iſt, daß darin ein Nachlaſſen der ſchöpferiſchen Kraft vorwaltet. Die Elemente der Popularität hat dieſe Symphonie wohl nicht in ſich, demjenigen jedoch, der genau zuzuhören verſteht, iſt ſie in ihrer ſchlanken Gothik und edlen Durchbrochenheit eine Fundgrube von Feinheiten und Intimitäten köſtlicher Art. Dr. Muck bot mit dieſer Ausdeutung eine ſeiner wirkungsvollſten Leiſtungen, wenn ich auch das Scherzo etwas weniger trotzig und widerſpänſtig, mit liebevollerer Betonung ſeiner graziöſen und gemüthlichen Züge im Intereſſe des Kontraſts zu dem vorangegangenen zarten Orcheſterfiligram (vom Orcheſter unſagbar fein ausgeführt) und der einunddreißigfach variirten Chaconne mit ihrem harmoniſchen und rhythmiſchen Farbenreichthum, gleichfalls einer Prachtleiſtung des Orcheſters, für taktiſch logiſcher halte. Der Beifall war nach dieſer Leiſtung warm und überzeugungstreu, ſo daß die Meiſterſpieler ihren Dank durch Erheben von den Sitzen abſtatten konnten.

Nach Schumann's „Manfred"-Ouverture mit ihren wechſelnden Stimmungen, die dem Dirigenten Gelegenheit zu einer weiteren Glanzleiſtung bot, folgte eine zwingend logiſche, virtuoſe und klare Ausdeutung von Richard Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung". Ich kann dies menſchlich ſo anmuthende und reine Werk mit ſeinen aus dem Beſonderen in das Allgemeine reichenden Bildern von menſchlicher Qual und menſchlichem Kampf und der nachfolgenden Erlöſung und Apotheoſe nie ohne Rührung anhören. Es folgt darin Liſzt's „Taſſo", dieſem urſprünglichen „Lament und Triumph". Dirigent und Spieler ſtrahlten darin in hellſtem Licht. Nichts Ergreifenderes als die ſchwüle Todesſtimmung zu Beginn, die Fieberträume, die Halluzinationen, Agonie und Tod im Gegenſatz zu den friedlichen Epiſoden, den Kindheitserinnerungen, dem Idylliſchen, dem muthigen Wagen und Streben des Jünglings, bis zuletzt in lichtem C-Dur in vollſtem Glanz des Orcheſters das Ideal-Thema aufſteigt, bis zur Gloriole des mächtigſten Fortiſſimo und dem friedlichen Niederſtieg zu erdenentrückendenienſchtz e derſtieg zu erdenentrücktem Pianiſſimo. So führte Muck ſeine Schaaren durch Phantaſtik und grauſigſte Realiſtik zum Siege.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date V 5 - 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FIRST CONCERT

Establ 384

Dr. Muck Makes Atonement for Last Year.

At the first concert of the Boston Orchestra last season Dr. Muck's programme made the listeners look at each other aghast and wonder what they had done to merit such an assault upon their patience and good nature. Last night the men from Boston came again and Dr. Muck made ample atonement for his singular conduct of a twelvemonth before. He brought no solo attraction; but the subscribers to the Boston concerts feel no hankering for singers, or pianists, or violinists. Of them they have more than a sufficiency in all the weeks not distinguished by a visit from the men of the East. He played only well known music; but it was noble music, all of it, and it was nobly played. That sufficed to hold their attention for two hours and to prompt them to round after round of grateful applause after each number, including the last.

The programme contained Brahm's fourth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture. Familiar as household words, all these works. Familiar, too, for old patrons of the Boston concerts the manner in which they were played. Beautifully, faultlessly, convincingly, and with that marvellous euphony, that resilience, that balance of chordal harmony and symmetry of phrase which are always expected in concerts of this character, but which, nevertheless, because of the perverseness of local conditions, always come as a revelation when the men from Boston play for us. A concert like that of last night ought not to vex but soothe the soul; it becomes vexatious when one thinks of what might be but is not in New York.

H. E. K.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

MISS MARGARET WILSON Entertains Box Party at Boston Symphony Concert — German Envoy and Distinguished Audience Present—Miss Isabella Hagner Bride of Mr. Norman James.

Esta 84

THE first Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted a large and distinguished audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Miss Margaret Wilson entertained guests in one of the stage boxes, having with her Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies, Mrs. George E. Pickett, Mrs. William Hitz and Mr. Fabrizio. The German Ambassador, in the adjoining box, had guests among whom were Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Rollins Morse and Mr. Haniel von Haimhausen. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend were among the guests in Mrs. Marshall Field's box. Mrs. Preston Gibson had a box party, including Mrs. Stephen Slocum and Mrs. John Merriam, Miss Laura Harlan, Miss Sheridan and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle were guests of Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe in another box. Mrs. Isaac T. Mann's guests were Mrs. Walter Wells, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Miss Farnsworth and Miss Hickey. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner and Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier also had box parties. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mme. Pezet, Mrs. Henry B. Brown, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Representative and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer, Miss Wilmer, Mrs. Bradley Fiske, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Charles C. McChord, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. Joseph Bailey, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. Hiram Irwin, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Miss Caroline Ogden Jones, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Miss Lita Montgomery, Mrs. Charles G. Matthews, Miss Porcher, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Irene Sheridan, Miss Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Nathan Sargent, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Samuel Pilson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Blagdon, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Samuel Spencer and Mrs. Peyton Russell.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date V 5 - 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD ONCE MORE

Brilliant Performance of Masterpieces by Brahms and Strauss.

DR. MUCK WELCOMED

The local orchestras having opened their seasons, it remained for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to come to town and give its first concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The auditorium was filled and there were the familiar expressions of pleasure at the reappearance of Dr. Karl Muck and his admirable body of musicians and of satisfaction at the beauty of the performance. The programme consisted of the E minor symphony of Brahms, the "Manfred" overture of Schumann, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." The list was too long by just this last number, for sufficient time had already been occupied, and, what was more important, a symmetrical and complete artistic scheme had been made.

But when interpretation rises to such a high plane as that of last evening minor sins should be condoned. Possibly those to whom the most chaste art is the most precious regretted that the playing of the orchestra rose to its supreme level in the tone poem of Strauss. The Brahms symphony was beautifully performed, but the orchestral virtuosity of Strauss opened the flood gates of the Bostonians' technic. Such a flow of gorgeously deep and exquisitely smooth orchestral tone must have refreshed and uplifted every soul.

Dr. Muck's skill in searching out the melodic idea in each page and bringing it to the hearer's attention without ever a touch of exaggeration or a distortion of the harmonic scheme is one of the most admirable of his qualities. In doing this he preserves to perfection the balance of tone, so that the instrumental song never acquires a rude exterior or an inner opacity. All is clear, transparent and nobly sonorous. His treatment of the great crescendo near the close of the Strauss work was a model of artistic discretion. It published all the splendors of the music and kept far away every suspicion of blatancy.

In this composition, as also in the symphony, the beautiful playing of the wind instruments, both wood and brass, was a continued joy. In phrasing, in shading, in balance and quality of tone the musicians left practically nothing to be desired. The Strauss work has never been presented here with more lucidity. The symphony was read as Dr. Muck always reads Brahms with the profoundest understanding and affection.

The Boston orchestra has lately sung its way from coast to coast and some of the Boston newspapers have rejoiced in that it has been accepted as a national institution. New York, gathering unto itself national significance in that calm assumption which sometimes irritates and often amuses the mighty West, long ago proclaimed the national importance of its accustomed visitor from Massachusetts.

Now at any rate New Yorkers may be pleased with the knowledge that the West and the gold coast have heard the lyric eloquence of the orchestra from the Back Bay. Let us hope that some day, when the swords of Europe have been sheathed again, this national orchestra may be heard in the concert halls on the other side of the Atlantic. With it may be carried the message that this body of musicians of all nations has throughout the dark days kept alive here the best traditions of the musical art of lands where art is silenced by the shrieking of the songs of battle.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From AGLE
Address Brooklyn, N Y.
Date

INTERESTS CLASH IN MUSICAL FIELD

Est 184

Last Week of Boston Opera Company at the Manhattan Opera House.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

Nellie Melba the Soloist at the Academy—McCormack, Kreisler and Elman to Appear Soon.

The series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening next, November 5. With the largest subscription the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn and with the incomparable Melba as soloist, and with a programme of unusual beauty, the concert should be one of the memorable events of the season. This will be Melba's only appearance in Brook-

[illegible] never sung more beautifully than she has in the various concerts she has given this fall. Melba, even at her worst, is worth going miles to hear. At her best, the beauty of her voice is indescribable. The symphony will be the lovely Eighth, by Beethoven ("the little Symphony in F," as the composer called it). An outstanding number will be the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, one of the greatest of the modern orchestral repertoires. Madame Melba will sing twice. Her first number will be the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso." Her second number will be two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro." The programme in full follows:

MME. NELLIE MELBA

Operatic Prima Donna Who is to be the Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday Evening Next.

Symphony No. 8, in F major, Beethoven; aria, "Sweet Bird," from "Il Penseroso," Handel; La Mort de Tintagiles, Loeffler; two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro," "Porgi Amor," "Voi che sapete," Mozart; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt, soloist Madame Melba.

Newspaper Cutting Bure

From MORNING TELEGR
Address: New York City
NOV 5 - 1
Date

DR. MUCK LEAD BRAHMS SYMPHO

Boston Musicians Heard in Superb Rendering of Work of Celebrated "Classicist."

STRANGE REMARKS ABOUT KEY

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Schumann's Manfred Are Also Heard.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Society gave the first concert of its annual New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. There was a large house, which, for all its well-guided enthusiasm, has not cured itself of its suburban habit of chattering loudly during the pauses between the movements of the symphony.

I had the honor of discovering, between the allegro giocoso and the allegro energico and passionato, that Bill's socks were red, silk and too small, and that the baby had the eczema. Then, reader, I did looke uponne the booke of Phyl de Hale, which every Boston symphoniac reads diligently and quotes next morning at breakfast, astonishing largely with his piquant musical erudition.

The symphony played was Brahms's Fourth. I am told that Brahms is coming into his own. Those who have loved Brahms since they first heard him, are like Hippoclides, in the quaint old tale. Hippoclides, shortly before his marriage indulged in a dance that savored of errotic extremism. His prospective father said to him: "Hippoclides, thou hast danced thy wife away." The young man replied nonchalantly: "Hippoclides does not care." Nor do we Brahmsites care. If persons are beginning to like the Fourth Symphony thirty years after it was written, it is they who are coming into their own, not Brahms. Had he been living I do not think he would have cared either. He lived in a world of his own.

Tonality of Symphony.

There has been some talk as to whether Brahms used the key of E Minor as the tonality of this symphony to organize a mood of bleak [illegible]. There are those who attach to the various keys certain definite impressions and qualities. G Minor is melancholy, shy; C Sharp Minor is brutal and sinister; C Major must be very burgeois because it is described by the tono-maniacs as simple, naive, flat and commonplace. It is the Har'em among keys.

As for the idea that Brahms used the key of E Minor to diffuse a spirit of melancholy, Mr. Philip Hale tells us that Hugo Reimann held that E Minor is the tonality of the Fall of the year. Another tonal metaphysician from Nephelococcygia, or Cloud Cuckoo Town, held that the key of E Minor suggests Summer and hot days and harvest wreaths. I propose that such cloud cuckoos as discuss these fantastical and Aquinatian questions should make quite a devoted study of Jonathan Swift's description of Gulliver's voyage to Laputa and his sojourn there.

Splendid Playing.

As for the second movement andante moderato I venture to feel that it contains the finer breath and spirit of music and that, according to Tolstoi's definition of an art work as that which, proceeding direct from the heart of the artist, goes right to the heart of the hearer, it achieves perfection. Brahms has written new things in the old forms. This is all that is meant by calling him a classic. He has been complained of in terms reminiscent of Elia as lacking in a certain condescension. Do we ask the Alps to condescend? Do we look for a wink from the Acropolis?

As for the meaning of symphony, I do not know what it means. What does a sunset mean, or the storms gathering over the sea of peaks at the head of Windermere? Just beauty and themselves. The symphony was superbly played, as by masters. I can say no more. Other numbers on the programme were the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann's and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Marshall Kernochan says that Strauss is getting hackneyed. That may be. But I fancy that the composer of "Salome" is not quite within the somewhat Virgilian sympathies of Dr. Muck.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
NOV 5 - 1915
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck, geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall anläßlich des erſten diesjährigen Konzerts unſerer gefeierten Boſtoner Gäſte, mit freundlichſtem Beifall begrüßt, bot uns ein in drei Viertheilen deutſches Programm, das nur in ſeiner Schlußnummer einen Böhmen, den Oeſterreicher Dvorak, zu Worte kommen ließ. Vorwiegend elegiſcher Stimmung, bildete gerade Dvorak's „Huſſitska"-Ouverture in ihrem lebendig und dramatiſch pulſirenden muſikaliſchen Blut eine willkommene Abwechslung, eine kräftige Antitheſe zu den zuvor gehörten pathetiſchen Tönen.

Brahms Vierte Symphonie, in dem ſonſt von den Symphonikern ſorgſam gemiedenen falben E-Moll, iſt mir ein unendlich ſympathiſches Werk, wenn es auch unleugbar iſt, daß darin ein Nachlaſſen der ſchöpferiſchen Kraft vorwaltet. Die Elemente der Popularität hat dieſe Symphonie wohl nicht in ſich, demjenigen jedoch, der genau zuzuhören verſteht, iſt ſie in ihrer ſchlanken Gothik und edlen Durchbrochenheit eine Fundgrube von Feinheiten und Intimitäten köſtlicher Art. Dr. Muck bot mit dieſer Ausdeutung eine ſeiner wirkungsvollſten Leiſtungen, wenn ich auch das Scherzo etwas weniger trotzig und widerſpänſtig, mit liebevollerer Betonung ſeiner graziöſen und gemüthlichen Züge im Intereſſe des Kontraſts zu dem vorangegangenen zarten Orcheſterfiligram (vom Orcheſter unſagbar fein ausgeführt) und der einunddreißigfach variirten Chaconne mit ihrem harmoniſchen und rhythmiſchen Farbenreichthum, gleichfalls einer Prachtleiſtung des Orcheſters, für taktiſch logiſcher halte. Der Beifall war nach dieſer Leiſtung warm und überzeugungstreu, ſo daß die Meiſterſpieler ihren Dank durch Erheben von den Sitzen abſtatten konnten.

Nach Schumann's „Manfred"-Ouverture mit ihren wechſelnden Stimmungen, die dem Dirigenten Gelegenheit zu einer weiteren Glanzleiſtung bot, folgte eine zwingend logiſche, virtuoſe und klare Ausdeutung von Richard Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung". Ich kann dies menſchlich ſo anmuthende und reine Werk mit ſeinen aus dem Beſonderen in das Allgemeine reichenden Bildern von menſchlicher Qual und menſchlichem Kampf und der nachfolgenden Erlöſung und Apotheoſe nie ohne Rührung anhören. Es folgt darin Liſzt's „Taſſo", dieſem urſprünglichen „Lament und Triumph". Dirigent und Spieler ſtrahlten darin in hellſtem Licht. Nichts Ergreifenderes als die ſchwüle Todesſtimmung zu Beginn, die Fieberträume, die Halluzinationen, Agonie und Tod im Gegenſatz zu den friedlichen Epiſoden, den Kindheitserinnerungen, dem Idylliſchen, dem muthigen Wagen und Streben des Jünglings, bis zuletzt in lichtem C-Dur in vollſtem Glanz des Orcheſters das Ideal-Thema aufſteigt, bis zur Gloriole des mächtigſten Fortiſſimo und dem friedlichen Nieberſtieg zu erdenentrückendenienſchtz e berſtieg zu erdenentrücktem Pianiſſimo. So führte Muck ſeine Schaaren durch Phantaſtik und grauſigſte Realiſtik zum Siege.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date OV 5 - 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FIRST CONCERT

Establ 384

Dr. Muck Makes Atonement for Last Year.

At the first concert of the Boston Orchestra last season Dr. Muck's programme made the listeners look at each other aghast and wonder what they had done to merit such an assault upon their patience and good nature. Last night the men from Boston came again and Dr. Muck made ample atonement for his singular conduct of a twelvemonth before. He brought no solo attraction; but the subscribers to the Boston concerts feel no hankering for singers, or pianists, or violinists. Of them they have more than a sufficiency in all the weeks not distinguished by a visit from the men of the East. He played only well known music; but it was noble music, all of it, and it was nobly played. That sufficed to hold their attention for two hours and to prompt them to round after round of grateful applause after each number, including the last.

The programme contained Brahm's fourth symphony, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture. Familiar as household words, all these works. Familiar, too, for old patrons of the Boston concerts the manner in which they were played. Beautifully, faultlessly, convincingly, and with that marvellous euphony, that resilience, that balance of chordal harmony and symmetry of phrase which are always expected in concerts of this character, but which, nevertheless, because of the perverseness of local conditions, always come as a revelation when the men from Boston play for us. A concert like that of last night ought not to vex but soothe the soul; it becomes vexatious when one thinks of what might be but is not in New York.

H. E. K.

POST
: Washington, D. C.

MISS MARGARET WILSON Entertains Box Party at Boston Symphony Concert — German Envoy and Distinguished Audience Present—Miss Isabella Hagner Bride of Mr. Norman James.

THE first Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted a large and distinguished audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Miss Margaret Wilson entertained guests in one of the stage boxes, having with her Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies, Mrs. George E. Pickett, Mrs. William Hitz and Mr. Fabrizio. The German Ambassador, in the adjoining box, had guests among whom were Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Rollins Morse and Mr. Haniel von Haimhausen. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend were among the guests in Mrs. Marshall Field's box. Mrs. Preston Gibson had a box party, including Mrs. Stephen Slocum and Mrs. John Merriam, Miss Laura Harlan, Miss Sheridan and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle were guests of Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe in another box. Mrs. Isaac T. Mann's guests were Mrs. Walter Wells, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Miss Farnsworth and Miss Hickey. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner and Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier also had box parties. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mme. Pezet, Mrs. Henry B. Brown, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Representative and Mrs. Horace Towner, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer, Miss Wilmer, Mrs. Bradley Fiske, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Charles C. McChord, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. Joseph Bailey, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. Hiram Irwin, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Miss Caroline Ogden Jones, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Miss Lita Montgomery, Mrs. Charles G. Matthews, Miss Porcher, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Irene Sheridan, Miss Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Nathan Sargent, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Samuel Pilson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Blagdon, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Samuel Spencer and Mrs. Peyton Russell.

the World

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 1 - 1915
Established:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its five concerts in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, November 3, and with it will come as soloist the incomparable Melba. The Orchestra has been at work now for five weeks, for its regular season in Boston, which began October 15, was preceded by a week of rehearsals and a week's tour in the West. Moreover, as there have been only four unimportant changes in the personnel, it may truly be said that the great Orchestra is playing in "mid-season form."

Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Boston this will be, is from all accounts in better voice than she has been in years. In its poorest condition it was beautiful. As it is now, its beauty surpasses description.

The program is one of great musical interest. Starting with the fourth symphony of Brahms, which Dr. Muck has prepared especially for Baltimore in response to many requests received by him last season, Madame Melba will sing twice, her first being the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's "Il Penseroso," and her second number being two arias from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." An outstanding number on the program is the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler. Inspired by Maeterlinck's play of the same name; it is one of the most remarkable works in modern orchestral repertoire.

The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4....Brahm
Aria "Sweet Bird" from "Il Penseroso" ....Handl
"LaMort de Tintagiles"..........Loeffler
Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" ....Mozart
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Soloist, Madame Melba.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Beethoven Number, Which Opens Program, Is Keynote of Performance.

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, which opened the concert, was delivered, with a remarkable display of technique by the orchestra and a rare harmony of sympathetic interpretation was revealed between leader and musicians.

Indeed, the sheer beauty of this composition seemed the keynote of the afternoon's program, although weight and great dignity were added by the last number, Wagner's prelude of "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." The other orchestral number, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," was a tender and delicate interpretation of the piece which was written by the great composer as a tribute to his wife and new-born son.

Miss Hinkle gave first "Voi, che sapete," an aria by Mozart from his "Marriage of Figaro," and second, the cantata "Ave, Maria," from Bruch's "Cross of Fire." Both numbers were admirably fitted tonally to the high and very pure soprano of Miss Hinkle, although a voice of heavier caliber might have been more pleasing dramatically.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on November 30 with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date
E k, 1884

Miss Margaret Wilson was among the box holders at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which attracted a large and distinguished audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon, and had several guests with her among them Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies, Mrs. George E. Hackett, Mrs. William Hitz, and Carmine Fabrizio. The German ambassador in the adjoining box entertained Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Rollins Morse and Haniel von Haimhausen. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend were among the guests in Mrs. Marshall Field's box. Mrs. Preston Gibson had a box party, including Mrs. Stephen Slocum and Mrs. John [illegible], Miss Laura Harlan, Miss [illegible] and Mrs. J. Mandeville Car- [illegible]

[illegible] Isaac T. Mann's guests were Mrs. Walter Wells Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Miss Farnsworth, and Miss Hickey. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner and Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier also had box parties. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mme. Pezet Mrs. Henry B. Brown, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Congressman and Mrs. Towner, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer, Miss Wilmer Mrs. Bradley Fiske, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Charles C. McChord, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. Joseph Bailey, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. Hiram Irwin, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Miss Caroline Ogden Jones, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Miss Leita Montgomery Mrs. Charles G. Matthews, Miss Porcher, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Irene Sheridan, Miss Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Nathan Sargent, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Samuel Pilson Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Blagdon, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, and Mrs. Peyton Russell.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 19
Est 1884

There were sounds of limousines by night, and it's only luck there were no casualties, in a record jam when the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening began its thirty-fifth season in America and its thirtieth in New York. Two hours of music fortissimo had less to do with an early rush from the hall than did the spectacular vehicular blockade, made worse by subway digging. It was as much as your life was worth to cross Fifty-seventh street for copies of the programme books supplied these fifteen years from the Athens of America by Philip Hale.

If anybody feared the Greeks bearing a despot of din like Richard Strauss, there was ground for alarm in the death march pace at which Dr. Muck took the "Tod und Verkleerung." It was pretty, but it wasn't Strauss. An irreverent wag was reminded of Irving Cobb's yarn of the delayed Southern lynching, where Cobb said the spectators cried, "Git hung, man, git hung." The hero in the tone poem was an unconscionable time a-dying. Four people left before Strauss, and more before the long programme ended.

But the instrument under the conductor's hand was an orchestra such as no capital in war worn Europe can boast to-day. At the baton's lightest tremor the band of ninety-eight explored the sonorities, the resonances, the transparent harmonies, till all hands had to rise and bow after the "Transfiguration," just as they did after the Fourth symphony of Brahms. After Brahms came Schumann's "Manfred," too much in the same mood, and after Strauss the deluge of Dvorak's "Hussite" battle hymn.

To-night in Brooklyn Nelly Melba sings Handel's "Sweet Bird" and airs from Mozart's "Figaro," while Muck has Beethoven's Eighth symphony, Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Preludes." To-morrow in Carnegit Hall, preceding "Tintagiles" and "Preludes," there are Beethoven's Seventh symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose."

NEW YORK HERALD,
NOVEMBER 5,

Dr. Muck and Men Open with 'High Brow' Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives the First Concert of Its New York Season.

Following closely New York's Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestra, both of which have played their first programme this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its inspiring conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, opened its New York season last night, giving the first of two concerts of the week in Carnegie Hall. As usual, the great auditorium was filled.

The character of the music played by the men from Boston was of the severest type. Dr. Muck's programmes often have been puzzles. They never seem made by any set rule. He evidently wants during the season to play something for every class represented in the audience, laying special stress on German music always.

Last night there was no doubt he was making his appeal to the highest of "highbrows"—to the seasoned listener. The deepest and most scholarly symphony of the most severely classical composers of recent years, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and the most powerful of the tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration) were the works designed to satisfy [illegible] good music of the [illegible]

[37]

[illegible] Schumann and Dvorak thrown in to round off the programme and to relieve the tension caused by the more serious numbers. No soloist was present to share the applause with Dr. Muck and his men, which, after the symphony, was tremendous. Few conductors seem to get so much out of the music of Brahms as he. The climaxes were played with extraordinary force. The work of the orchestra was well worth the applause it received.

Not less moving was the interpretation of the Strauss tone poem. Performances by the Philharmonic Society of the same work have been, perhaps, more polished, but not so forceful. The loud crashes of the brass, which were not always absolutely in tune, were not of the kind to make the hearer want to hold his ears, as are many such climaxes in smaller halls, but they had a striking fulness.

"Tod und Verkl Arung," composed when Strauss was only twenty-five years old, seems to have marked his highest achievement. Probably there is no more perfect piece of programme music in existence. Its pictures of a man fighting against Death are among the most striking in all the field of descriptive music, and to many Strauss at twenty-five was a greater composer than the Strauss of to-day. No other modern orchestra work holds its own so well with the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner.

The "Manfred" overture of Schumann and, at the close of the concert, Dvorak's "Husitska" were played. The Boston Orchestra will appear again to-morrow afternoon with a different programme.

TELEGRAPH,
NOVEMBER 5,

DR. MUCK LEADS BRAHMS SYMPHONY

Boston Musicians Heard in Superb Rendering of Work of Celebrated "Classicist."

STRANGE REMARKS ABOUT KEY

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Schumann's Manfred Are Also Heard.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Society gave the first concert of its annual New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. There was a large house, which, for all its well-guided enthusiasm, has not cured itself of its suburban habit of chattering loudly during the pauses between the movements of the symphony.

I had the honor of discovering, between the allegro giocoso and the allegro energico and passionato, that Bill's socks were red, silk and too small, and that the baby had the eczema. Then, reader, I did looke uponne the booke of Phyl de Hale, which every Boston symphoniac reads diligently and quotes next morning at breakfast, astonishing largely with his piquant musical erudition.

The symphony played was Brahms's Fourth. I am told that Brahms is coming into his own. Those who have loved Brahms since they first heard him, are like Hippoclides, in the quaint old tale. Hippoclides, shortly before his marriage indulged in a dance that savored of errotic extremism. His prospective father said to him: "Hippoclides, thou hast danced thy wife away." The young man replied nonchalantly: "Hippoclides does not care." Nor do we Brahmsites care. If persons are beginning to like the Fourth Symphony thirty years after it was written, it is they who are coming into their own, not Brahms. Had he been living I do not think he would have cared either. He lived in a world of his own.

Tonality of Symphony.

There has been some talk as to whether Brahms used the key of E Minor as the tonality of this symphony to organize a mood of bleak Autumnal sadness. There are those who attach to the various keys certain definite impressions and qualities; G. Minor is melancholy, shy; C Sharp Minor is brutal and sinister; C Major must be very burgeois because it is described by the tono-maniacs as simple, naive, flat and commonplace. It is the Harlem among keys.

As for the idea that Brahms used the key of E Minor to diffuse a spirit of melancholy, Mr. Philip Hale tells us that Hugo Reimann held that E Minor is the tonality of the Fall of the year. Another tonal metaphysician from Nephelococcygia, or Cloud Cuckoo Town, held that the key of E Minor suggests Summer and hot days and harvest wreaths. I propose that such cloud cuckoos as discuss these fantastical and Aquinatian questions should make quite a devoted study of Jonathan Swift's description of Gulliver's voyage to Laputa and his sojourn there.

Splendid Playing.

As for the second movement andante moderato I venture to feel that it contains the finer breath and spirit of music and that, according to Tolstoi's definition of an art work as that which, proceeding direct from the heart of the artist, goes right to the heart of the hearer, it achieves perfection. Brahms has written new things in the old forms. This is all that is meant by calling him a classic. He has been complained of in terms reminiscent of Elia as lacking in a certain condescension. Do we ask the Alps to condescend? Do we look for a wink from the Acropolis?

As for the meaning of symphony, I do not know what it means. What does a sunset mean, or the storms gathering over the sea of peaks at the [illegible] of [illegible] selves. The symphony was superbly played, as by masters. I can say no more. Other numbers on the programme were the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann's and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Marshall Kernochan says that Strauss is getting hackneyed. That may be. But I fancy that the composer of "Salome" is not quite within the somewhat Virgilian sympathies of Dr. Muck.

NEW YORK TIMES.
NOVEMBER 5.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

A Great Audience at Its First Appearance in Thirtieth Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck, its conductor, received a hearty greeting last evening at its first appearance in New York this season; the greeting and the size and quality of the audience left no doubt as to the place they hold in the esteem of the music-loving public of this city. It was the beginning of its thirtieth season in New York. The hall was, as it has been for so many years at these concerts, completely filled by an audience whose taste and discrimination are of the highest. Dr. Muck presented one of his best programs, one made up entirely of familiar compositions, all modern and all evidently much to the liking of the listeners, presenting them no problems and giving obvious pleasure that was unmistakably expressed. The symphony, coming at the beginning of the program, was Brahms's fourth, in E minor; it was followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's tone poem "Tod und Verklärung," and Dvorak's overture, "Hustiska."

The performance of this music was in the Boston Orchestra's finest and most eloquent style, and this was particularly true of the symphony, whose fiery and romantic spirit and grandiose power were magnificently set forth. Dr. Muck's reading was composed on the broadest lines, with a subtle adjustment of all its details and proportions in, in phrasing, in the balance of orchestral color, in the exposition of the dimaxes. Such a reading and such a performance truly represent Brahms's mastery of instrumentation in the precise and significant expression of his musical ideas. The audience was deeply stirred and manifested great enthusiasm over the performance. Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and finally made the orchestra rise and share the applause with him.

The playing of the other numbers of the program was on the same plane. The tragic power of Schumann's overture was truly expressed, and the fullness of descriptive and illustrative detail in Strauss' tone poem was not allowed to obscure its quality as coherent and profoundly moving music. This, too, made a deep impression upon the audience; there was prolonged applause, and again Dr. Muck declined to accept it all for himself.

BOSTON HERALD,
NOVEMBER 5, 1915.

GIVES CONCERT IN NEW YORK

Boston Symphony, Opening Season, Scores Big Success.

[Special Dispatch to The Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 4—The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck, its conductor, received a hearty greeting this evening at its first appearance in New York this season. The greeting and the size and quality of the audience left no doubt as to the place they hold in the esteem of the music-loving public of this city. It was the beginning of its 30th season in New York. The hall was, as it has been for so many years at these concerts, completely filled by an audience whose taste and discrimination are of the highest.

Dr. Muck presented one of his best programs, one made up entirely of familiar composition, all modern and all evidently much to the liking of the listeners, presenting them no problems and giving obvious pleasure that was unmistakably expressed. The symphony, coming at the beginning of the program, was Brahms's fourth, in E minor. It was followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's tone poem, "Tod und Verklarung," and Dvorak's overture, "Hustiska."

The performance of this music was in the Boston orchestra's finest and most eloquent style, and this was particularly true of the symphony, whose fiery and romantic spirit and grandiose power were magnificently set forth. Dr. Muck's reading was composed on the broadest lines, with a subtle adjustment of all its details and proportions, in phrasing, in the balance of orchestral color, in the exposition of the climaxes. Such a reading and such a performance truly represent Brahms's mastery of instrumentation in the precise and significant expression of his musical ideas. The audience was deeply stirred and manifested great enthusiasm over the performance. Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and finally made the orchestra rise and share the applause with him.

The playing of the other numbers of the program was on the same plane. The tragic power of Schumann's overture was truly expressed, and the fulness of descriptive and illustrative detail in Strauss's tone poem was not allowed to obscure its quality as coherent and profoundly moving music. This, too, made a deep impression upon the audience; there was prolonged applause, and again Dr. Muck declined to accept it all for himself.

the World

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 1 - 1915

Established:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its five concerts in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, November 3, and with it will come as soloist the incomparable Melba. The Orchestra has been at work now for five weeks for its regular season in Boston, which began October 15, was preceded by a week of rehearsals and a week's tour in the West. Moreover, as there have been only four unimportant changes in the personnel, it may truly be said that the great Orchestra is playing in "mid-season form."

Madame Melba, whose only appearance in Boston this will be, is from all accounts in better voice than she has been in years. In its poorest condition it was beautiful. As it is now, its beauty surpasses description.

The program is one of great musical interest. Starting with the fourth symphony of Brahms, which Dr.
Muck has prepared especially for Baltimore in response to many requests received by him last season, Madame Melba will sing twice, her first being the "Sweet Bird" aria from Handel's

"Il Penseroso," and her second number being two arias from Mozart's
"The Marriage of Figaro." An outstanding number on the program is the dramatic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler. Inspired by Maeterlinck's play of the same name; it is one of the most remarkable works in modern orchestral repertoire.

The program in full is as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4....Brahms
Aria "Sweet Bird" from "Il Penseroso" ....Handl
"LaMort de Tintagiles"..........Loeffler
Two Arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" ....Mozart
(a) Porgi Amor.
(b) Voi che sapete.
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Soloist, Madame Melba

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Beethoven Number, Which Opens Program, Is Keynote of Performance.

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, with Miss Florence Hinkle as soloist, was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, which opened the concert, was delivered with a remarkable display of technique by the orchestra and a rare harmony of sympathetic interpretation was revealed between leader and musicians.

Indeed, the sheer beauty of this composition seemed the keynote of the afternoon's program, although weight and great dignity were added by the last number, Wagner's prelude of "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." The other orchestral number, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," was a tender and delicate interpretation of the piece which was written by the great composer as a tribute to his wife and new-born son.

Miss Hinkle gave first "Voi, che sapete," an aria by Mozart from his "Marriage of Figaro," and second, the cantata "Ave, Maria," from Bruch's "Cross of Fire." Both numbers were admirably fitted tonally to the high and very pure soprano of Miss Hinkle, although a voice of heavier caliber might have been more pleasing dramatically.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on November 30 with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Date

Miss Margaret Wilson was among the box holders at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which attracted a large and distinguished audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon, and had several guests with her among them Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies, Mrs. George E. Jackett, Mrs. William Hitz, and Car[illegible]line Fabrizio. The German ambassador in the adjoining box entertained Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Rollins Morse and Haniel von Haimhausen. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend were among the guests in Mrs. Marshall Field's box. Mrs. Preston [illegible]bson had a box party, including [illegible] Stephen Slocum and Mrs. John [illegible]n, Miss Laura Harlan, Miss [illegible]n and Mrs. J. Mandeville Car- [illegible] Walter

k, 1884

[illegible] were Mrs.
Isaac T. Mann's guests were Mrs.
Walter Wells, Mrs. William Barrett,
Ridgely, Miss Farnsworth, and Miss
Hickey. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner and Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier also had box parties. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mme.
Pezet Mrs. Henry B. Brown, Mrs.
Jones R. Mann, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs.
Reynolds Hitt, Congressman and Mrs.
Towner, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs.
William Holland Wilmer, Miss Wilmer Mrs. Bradley Fiske, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss
Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Charles C. Mc-
Chord, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs.
Joseph Bailey, the Rev. and Mrs.
Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. George P.
Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard.
Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. Hiram Irwin, Mrs. Paul
Bartlett, Miss Caroline Ogden Jones.
Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fen-dall, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Miss Leita Montgomery Mrs. Charles G.
Matthews, Miss Porcher, Mrs. John
Blair, Miss Irene Sheridan, Miss
Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Nathan Sargent, Miss
Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Samuel Pilson
Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Frank B.
Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Blagdon, Mrs.
George Howard, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, and Mrs. Peyton Russell.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City

Date NOV 5 - 19

1884

There were sounds of limousines by night, and it's only luck there were no casualties, in a record jam when the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening began its thirty-fifth season in America and its thirtieth in New York. Two hours of music fortissimo had less to do with an early rush from the hall than did the spectacular vehicular blockade, made worse by subway digging. It was as much as your life was worth to cross Fifty-seventh street for copies of the programme books supplied these fifteen years from the Athens of America by Philip Hale.

If anybody feared the Greeks bearing a despot of din like Richard Strauss, there was ground for alarm in the death march pace at which Dr. Muck took the "Tod und Verkleerung." It was pretty, but it wasn't Strauss. An irreverent wag was reminded of Irving Cobb's yarn of the delayed Southern lynching, where Cobb said the spectators cried, "Git hung, man, git hung." The hero in the tone poem was an unconscionable time a-dying. Four people left before Strauss, and more before the long programme ended.

But the instrument under the conductor's hand was an orchestra such as no capital in war worn Europe can boast to-day. At the baton's lightest tremor the band of ninety-eight explored the sonorities, the resonances, the transparent harmonies, till all hands had to rise and bow after the "Transfiguration," just as they did after the Fourth symphony of Brahms. After Brahms came Schumann's "Manfred," too much in the same mood, and after Strauss the deluge of Dvorak's "Hussite" battle hymn.

To-night in Brooklyn Nelly Melba sings Handel's "Sweet Bird" and airs from Mozart's "Figaro," while Muck has Beethoven's Eighth symphony, Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and Liszt's "Preludes." To-morrow in Carnegit Hall, preceding "Tintagiles" and "Preludes," there are Beethoven's Seventh symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose."

NEW YORK HERALD,

NOVEMBER 5,

Dr. Muck and Men Open with 'High Brow' Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives the First Concert of Its New York Season.

Following closely New York's Philharmonic and Symphony Orchestra, both of which have played their first programme this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its inspiring conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, opened its New York season last night, giving the first of two concerts of the week in Carnegie Hall. As usual, the great auditorium was filled.

The character of the music played by the men from Boston was of the severest type. Dr. Muck's programmes often have been puzzles. They never seem made by any set rule. He evidently wants during the season to play something for every class represented in the audience, laying special stress on German music always.

Last night there was no doubt he was making his appeal to the highest of "high-brows"—to the seasoned listener. The deepest and most scholarly symphony of the most severely classical composers of recent years, the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, and the most powerful of the tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration) were the works designed to satisfy [illegible]

Of course, there was a little Schumann and Dvorak thrown in to round off the programme and to relieve the tension caused by the more serious numbers. No soloist was present to share the applause with Dr. Muck and his men, which, after the symphony, was tremendous. Few conductors seem to get so much out of the music of Brahms as he. The climaxes were played with extraordinary force. The work of the orchestra was well worth the applause it received.

Not less moving was the interpretation of the Strauss tone poem. Performances by the Philharmonic Society of the same work have been, perhaps, more polished, but not so forceful. The loud crashes of the brass, which were not always absolutely in tune, were not of the kind to make the hearer want to hold his ears, as are many such climaxes in smaller halls, but they had a striking fulness.

"Tod und Verkl Arung," composed when Strauss was only twenty-five years old, seems to have marked his highest achievement. Probably there is no more perfect piece of programme music in existence. Its pictures of a man fighting against Death are among the most striking in all the field of descriptive music, and to many Strauss at twenty-five was a greater composer than the Strauss of to-day. No other modern orchestra work holds its own so well with the music of Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner.

The "Manfred" overture of Schumann and, at the close of the concert, Dvorak's "Husitska" were played. The Boston Orchestra will appear again to-morrow afternoon with a different programme.

TELEGRAPH,

NOVEMBER 5,

1884

DR. MUCK LEADS BRAHMS SYMPHONY

Boston Musicians Heard in Superb Rendering of Work of Celebrated "Classicist."

STRANGE REMARKS ABOUT KEY

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Schumann's Manfred Are Also Heard.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Society gave the first concert of its annual New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. There was a large house, which, for all its well-guided enthusiasm, has not cured itself of its suburban habit of chattering loudly during the pauses between the movements of the symphony.

I had the honor of discovering, between the allegro giocoso and the allegro energico and passionato, that Bill's socks were red, silk and too small, and that the baby had the eczema. Then, reader, I did looke uponne the booke of Phyl de Hale, which every Boston symphoniac reads diligently and quotes next morning at breakfast, astonishing largely with his piquant musical erudition.

The symphony played was Brahms's Fourth. I am told that Brahms is coming into his own. Those who have loved Brahms since they first heard him, are like Hippoclides, in the quaint old tale. Hippoclides, shortly before his marriage indulged in a dance that savored of errotic extremism. His prospective father said to him: "Hippoclides, thou hast danced thy wife away." The young man replied nonchalantly: "Hippoclides does not care." Nor do we Brahmsites care. If persons are beginning to like the Fourth Symphony thirty years after it was written, it is they who are coming into their own, not Brahms. Had he been living I do not think he would have cared either. He lived in a world of his own.

Tonality of Symphony.

There has been some talk as to whether Brahms used the key of E Minor as the tonality of this symphony to organize a mood of bleak Autumnal sadness. There are those who attach to the various keys certain definite impressions and qualities; G. Minor is melancholy, shy; C Sharp Minor is brutal and sinister; C Major must be very burgeois because it is described by the tono-maniacs as simple, naive, flat and commonplace. It is the Harlem among keys.

As for the idea that Brahms used the key of E Minor to diffuse a spirit of melancholy, Mr. Philip Hale tells us that Hugo Reimann held that E Minor is the tonality of the Fall of the year. Another tonal metaphysician from Nephelococcygia, or Cloud Cuckoo Town, held that the key of E Minor suggests Summer and hot days and harvest wreaths. I propose that such cloud cuckoos as discuss these fantastical and Aquinatian questions should make quite a devoted study of Jonathan Swift's description of Gulliver's voyage to Laputa and his sojourn there.

Splendid Playing.

As for the second movement andante moderato I venture to feel that it contains the finer breath and spirit of music and that, according to Tolstoi's definition of an art work as that which, proceeding direct from the heart of the artist, goes right to the heart of the hearer, it achieves perfection. Brahms has written new things in the old forms. This is all that is meant by calling him a classic. He has been complained of in terms reminiscent of Elia as lacking in a certain condescension. Do we ask the Alps to condescend? Do we look for a wink from the Acropolis?

As for the meaning of symphony, I do not know what it means. What does a sunset mean, or the storms gathering over the sea of peaks at the head of [illegible]

[illegible] selves. The symphony was superbly played, as by masters. I can say no more. Other numbers on the programme were the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann's and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Marshall Kernochan says that Strauss is getting hackneyed. That may be. But I fancy that the composer of "Salome" is not quite within the somewhat Virgilian sympathies of Dr. Muck.

NEW YORK TIMES.

NOVEMBER 5.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

A Great Audience at Its First Appearance in Thirtieth Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck, its conductor, received a hearty greeting last evening at its first appearance in New York this season; the greeting and the size and quality of the audience left no doubt as to the place they hold in the esteem of the music-loving public of this city. It was the beginning of its thirtieth season in New York. The hall was, as it has been for so many years at these concerts, completely filled by an audience whose taste and discrimination are of the highest. Dr. Muck presented one of his best programs, one made up entirely of familiar compositions, all modern and all evidently much to the liking of the listeners, presenting them no problems and giving obvious pleasure that was unmistakably expressed. The symphony, coming at the beginning of the program, was Brahms's fourth, in E minor; it was followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's tone poem "Tod und Verklärung," and Dvorak's overture, "Hustiska."

The performance of this music was in the Boston Orchestra's finest and most eloquent style, and this was particularly true of the symphony, whose fiery and romantic spirit and grandiose power were magnificently set forth. Dr. Muck's reading was composed on the broadest lines, with a subtle adjustment of all its details and proportions in, in phrasing, in the balance of orchestral color, in the exposition of the dimaxes. Such a reading and such a performance truly represent Brahms's mastery of instrumentation in the precise and significant expression of his musical ideas. The audience was deeply stirred and manifested great enthusiasm over the performance. Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and finally made the orchestra rise and share the applause with him.

The playing of the other numbers of the program was on the same plane. The tragic power of Schumann's overture was truly expressed, and the fullness of descriptive and illustrative detail in Strauss' tone poem was not allowed to obscure its quality as coherent and profoundly moving music. This, too, made a deep impression upon the audience; there was prolonged applause, and again Dr. Muck declined to accept it all for himself.

BOSTON HERALD,

NOVEMBER 5, 1915.

GIVES CONCERT IN NEW YORK

Boston Symphony, Opening Season, Scores Big Success.

[Special Dispatch to The Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 4—The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck, its conductor, received a hearty greeting this evening at its first appearance in New York this season. The greeting and the size and quality of the audience left no doubt as to the place they hold in the esteem of the music-loving public of this city. It was the beginning of its 30th season in New York. The hall was, as it has been for so many years at these concerts, completely filled by an audience whose taste and discrimination are of the highest.

Dr. Muck presented one of his best programs, one made up entirely of familiar composition, all modern and all evidently much to the liking of the listeners, presenting them no problems and giving obvious pleasure that was unmistakably expressed. The symphony, coming at the beginning of the program, was Brahms's fourth, in E minor. It was followed by Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Strauss's tone poem, "Tod und Verklarung," and Dvorak's overture, "Hustiska."

The performance of this music was in the Boston orchestra's finest and most eloquent style, and this was particularly true of the symphony, whose fiery and romantic spirit and grandiose power were magnificently set forth. Dr. Muck's reading was composed on the broadest lines, with a subtle adjustment of all its details and proportions, in phrasing, in the balance of orchestral color, in the exposition of the climaxes. Such a reading and such a performance truly represent Brahms's mastery of instrumentation in the precise and significant expression of his musical ideas. The audience was deeply stirred and manifested great enthusiasm over the performance. Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and finally made the orchestra rise and share the applause with him.

The playing of the other numbers of the program was on the same plane. The tragic power of Schumann's overture was truly expressed, and the fulness of descriptive and illustrative detail in Strauss's tone poem was not allowed to obscure its quality as coherent and profoundly moving music. This, too, made a deep impression upon the audience; there was prolonged applause, and again Dr. Muck declined to accept it all for himself.

THE SUN, FRIDAY,
NOVEMBER 5, 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD ONCE MORE

Brilliant Performance of Masterpieces by Brahms and Strauss.

The local orchestras having opened their seasons, it remained for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to come to town and give its first concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The auditorium was filled and there were the familiar expressions of pleasure at the reappearance of Dr. Karl Muck and his admirable body of musicians and of satisfaction at the beauty of the performance. The programme consisted of the E minor symphony of Brahms, the "Manfred" overture of Schumann, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." The list was too long by just this last number, for sufficient time had already been occupied, and, what was more important, a symmetrical and complete artistic scheme had been made.

But when interpretation rises to such a high plane as that of last evening minor sins should be condoned. Possibly those to whom the most chaste art is the most precious regretted that the playing of the orchestra rose to its supreme level in the tone poem of Strauss. The Brahms symphony was beautifully performed, but the orchestral virtuosity of Strauss opened the flood gates of the Bostonians' technic. Such a flow of gorgeously deep and exquisitely smooth orchestral tone must have refreshed and uplifted every soul.

Dr. Muck's skill in searching out the melodic idea in each page and bringing it to the hearer's attention without ever a touch of exaggeration or a distortion of the harmonic scheme is one of the most admirable of his qualities. In doing this he preserves to perfection the balance of tone, so that the instrumental song never acquires a rude exterior or an inner opacity. All is clear, transparent and nobly sonorous. His treatment of the great crescendo near the close of the Strauss work was a model of artistic discretion. It published all the splendors of the music and kept far away every suspicion of blatancy.

In this composition, as also in the symphony, the beautiful playing of the wind instruments, both wood and brass, was a continued joy. In phrasing, in shading, in balance and quality of tone the musicians left practically nothing to be desired. The Strauss work has never been presented here with more lucidity. The symphony was read as Dr. Muck always reads Brahms with the profoundest understanding and affection.

The Boston orchestra has lately sung its way from coast to coast and some of the Boston newspapers have rejoiced in that it has been accepted as a national institution. New York, gathering unto itself national significance in that calm assumption which sometimes irritates and often amuses the mighty West, long ago proclaimed the national importance of its accustomed visitor from Massachusetts.

Now at any rate New Yorkers may be pleased with the knowledge that the West and the gold coast have heard the lyric eloquence of the orchestra from the Back Bay. Let us hope that some day, when the swords of Europe have been sheathed again, this national orchestra may be heard in the concert halls on the other side of the Atlantic. With it may be carried the message that this body of musicians of all nations has throughout the dark days kept alive here the best traditions of the musical art of lands where art is silenced by the shrieking of the songs of battle.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 30,

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF RARE WORTH

Gabrilowitsch's Playing of Remarkable Beauty

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, the first soloist of the season to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, was soloist at the public rehearsal of this orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the E minor concerto of Chopin, and his performance was unforgettable. It was one of those rare occasions when a work of art finds in its interpreter one whose equipment is without a flaw. Mr. Gab[illegible] rivals, and still fewer rivals, among the pianists of today. He is phenomenal in nearly all respects, and in none more so than his modesty in the presence of a work of art. As he played Chopin's concerto yesterday, so he plays everything that he touches, with the most remarkable insight into the meaning and the character of the music,—and with the utmost reverence toward the composer.

PURE TONE AND RHYTHM

It would be difficult to imagine, even from de Pachmann, a more truly Chopinesque performance. This was especially true as regarded the tone qualities and the beautiful nuances of rhythm which characterized the entire performance. How subtle and how natural was Mr. Gabrilowitsch's rubato! There are pianists who think that rhythm means beating time. Happily Mr. Gabrilowitsch is not of these. His rhythm was always there, and always felt—the inner life of the music. But this rhythm fluctuated like waves, like tides that obey unseen and ever-present laws. The right hand sang the tender and fragile melodies as freely and as spontaneously as any singer, and yet the melody floated securely, as one might say, on the fundamental pulse of the music.

Technically, tonally, this performance was fit for a volume in itself. There were no ugly notes. How combine such technical accuracy and such atmospheric beauty? Nor was there any effort to make a lovely and now old-style concerto anything which it was not. True, as regards technical details the pianist adopted on occasion the modern editing of certain passages, for the sake of the greater fullness and sonority which present conditions demand, but so far as essentials went, not a note was changed. Chopin, the early Chopin, was heard. Somehow he was enough and more than sufficient. as himself, without an apology or makeshift. The simplicity, the youthful and romantic character of the music, with its childlike and aristocratic grace were conveyed with magical understanding and resourcefulness. The pianist was recalled again and again and the concert thus lengthened by some minutes.

Berlioz's Great Overture

The orchestral compositions were Brahms' 4th symphony; Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," and Berlioz's Overture, "La Carnaval Romain." The latter remains one of Berlioz's finest orchestral works, and the performance was of surpassing vividness and brilliancy. Berlioz's orchestra sparkles and explodes with Italian color and spirits. The melody of the introduction is one of the most beautiful in all of the composer's works. Schumann's "Manfred," introspective, passionate music, even if not the voice we might easily associate with the hero of Byron's poem, was interpreted with exceptional sympathy.

Brahms' Symphony may be acknowledged by posterity as the greatest of the four. If it is less epic than the first, it is also less grandiose, less personal, and of finer musical substance and finer proportions. Nor is it open to the charge of stupid plagiarism, as the first might be at the hands of the wits. Beethoven expressed the struggle between the individual and fate in the 5th symphony with a force of genius which obliterated, not only what came before, but most of what followed after. But the 4th symphony is wholly Brahms, whose immense virility is here tempered by a fine and contemplative attitude toward life which makes one think, perhaps, of autumn sunsets, and clear vigorous air, and nature who turns her eyes inwards for a season. The workmanship is past compare for its clearness as well as its strength. Thus there was heard one of the very great symphonies, which was heartily enjoyed by the audience, so that it called the orchestra as well as the conductor to its feet.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
OCTOBER 30,

SOLO STAR VIES WITH SYMPHONY

Gabrilowitsch and Orchestra Play Chopin Work Brilliantly.

Fortunate is the Symphony Orchestra this week to be able to present as the first soloist of the season Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, whose talent has now reached full bloom and who is in every respect an artist worthy of association with the orchestra.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch, since his return from Europe, has shown himself to be a pianist whose technical and intellectual development has reached the point that qualifies him for admission to the always small number of musical artists of the first rank. His performance yesterday of the Chopin concerto in E minor possessed brilliant technical qualities and a depth of sympathy that raised it well-nigh to perfection on its interpretative side. It dazzled and charmed, as Chopin intended it should; and Gabrilowitsch proved himself virtuoso and poet. Now and then it happened [illegible] the efforts of soloist and or[illegible] exquisitely attuned. So it

But the orchestra, [illegible] by Dr. Muck, showed its own rare virtuosity in every number on this third program, which includes the fourth Brahms symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. One of the overtures might well have been omitted, if the intention of the powers that be is to keep the concerts within reasonable limits. The impression was renewed that the Brahms symphony is kept alive by its second and third movements, which have beauty and vivacity; but yesterday the work of the orchestra glorified the uninspired but sonorous finale.

After tonight's concert, the orchestra will not be heard again until Friday, Nov. 12. The soloist at the fourth pair of concerts will be Mme. Melba. The orchestral program is to comprise Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar Symphony," Handel's concerto for wind and string orchestra, and a novelty in the form of a carnival overture, called "Princess Brambilla," by Walter Braunfels.

BOSTON GLOBE—
OCTOBER 30,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms' Fourth Played Dramatically.

Gabrilowitsch Recreates Chopin's Concerto.

The two concertos for piano and orchestra by Chopin have been said to show his shortness of breath in a large form, his unfamiliarity with the orchestra, the difficulty with which he developed ideas and sustained inspiration. Mr Gabrilowitsch played the one in E minor at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. His performance recreated this music in its tenderness, its exquisite melancholy, its buoyant vivacity, its pervading sensitiveness and poetry of spirit.

A great pianist and a great conductor inspired each other and reasonably were inspired by what they played. In other hands there would have been warrantable apprehension at such a choice. This is music of delicate pattern. In it is woven the grace of women, if also the nobility and fire of the man's soul. The orchestration, not pretentious sympathetically, not threatening to engulf the pianist or spurring him to prodigality of tone, was an appropriate accompaniment, a frame suitable to the picture.

Mr Gabrilowitsch treated the piano as an instrument built for the fragile and exquisite beauty of this music, not to propound problems of the mind nor tragic conflicts of soul, but the lively and graceful visions of a sweet and rare spirit. Dynamically, his performance was a sermon to all students of the instrument. There was a wide scale in shading, but the momentary flashes of tone were never excessive or incongruous, nor were the lighest whispers of the piano—as in the romance—too vaporous for the size of the room. It was piano playing of the deepest poetic perceptions, employing to their purpose a sovereign mastery of the instrument. The reception given Mr Gabrilowitsch was sweeping in its warmth.

The performance by Dr Muck of Brahms' fourth symphony was one of incomparable clearness, of discreet suppression of turgid inner voices, of admirable proportion, of stirring realization of the dramatic character to be found, particularly in the last movement.

Schumann's "Manfred," radiating the glow of the impassioned romanticist, and Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture, always of seizing brilliance, concluded the program. The orchestra will make its first Southern trip next week.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 30,

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF NO NOVELTIES

Brilliant Soloist Gabrilowitsch Wins Veritable Triumph

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT NEEDS NO REVIEW

Brahms' E Minor Symphony Full of Interest and Even Exaltation

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Brahms—Fourth Symphony.
Schumann—"Manfred" Overture.
Chopin—E minor Piano Concerto.
Pianist—Ossip Gabrilowitsch.
Berlioz—"Carnaval Romaine" overture.

The third concert brought forth no novelties, but a brilliant soloist. After all, the old compositions wear well in "these most brisk and giddy-paced times," and the earnest lover of orchestral music may have felt refreshed to drink in the quieter tone-colors (if one can drink colors) of Brahms or Schumann after the more vivid tints of Strauss, Liszt, Enesco and Loeffler. In spite of the rapid changes which take place in musical fashions we feel safe in saying that Brahms is as secure as Bach or Beethoven of permanency in the repertoire. There is so much t[illegible] each of his symphonies, that they never fade with repetition, and whether it be the wonderfully intellectual first, the pastoral second, the heroic third, or the freely-treated fourth, each one has its peculiar charm, although the fourth is the least important of the series.

"Happy are those nations which have no histories," and delightful are those concerts which need no explanatory reviews. There is nothing new to say about Brahms' E minor symphony. The slow movement, with its quaint mingling of major and minor, the finale with its great variations, are full of interest and even of exaltation for ever yauditor. To hear such a work played as our orchestra performs it is a lofty enjoyment. Was there ever a simpler theme used for variation than the Passacaglia of the finale? It is almost a mere scale. But it is treated in a manner which goes even beyond Beethoven's symphonic variation finales. One begins to feel that Von Bulow did not exaggerate when he included Brahms in the "three great Bs" that summed up all that was very great in music. If Brahms had only been able to balance a little more of emotion against his great intellect there would be no question as to his place among the very first. The reading by Dr. Muck was sensible and straightforward, although, with the exception of the noble andante, the symphony appeals more to the head than to the heart. It was very greatly applauded.

During the Schumann overture we were still in a world from which awful dissonances, complex cross rhythms, and lurid, blinding tone-colors were absent. Yet none of our modern musical St. Vitus dancers, with all their spasms, can go beyond the impressive character of this overture. Nor is there in the repertoire a finer contrast than that between the brooding, heaven-defying Manfred, and the sweet and gentle Astarte, the first and second themes of this work. The themes were given as splendid foils to each other, Dr. Muck making the most of the fierce syncopations of the first, and violins and woodwind playing most eloquently in the second. The call of the trumpets also deserves praise for its effective shading. If there is anything that may be compared with the intensity of Wagner's Fate-motive it is these trumpet chords. Nor is this overture all emotion, since it has a great amount of figure treatment—the intellectual side of music,—and the Coda, with its return of the syncopated Manfred theme, but weakened and stricken, combined with the Astarte figure, ending with one of the pianissimo effects which Dr. Muck always makes the most of, carried out the Byronic lines—

> He's gone. His soul hath ta'en his earthless flight
> Whither? I dread to think; but he is gone.

This is probably Schumann's greatest overture, even though the "Genoveva" be the more popular.

Now came the pianist, and the audience gave him a most hearty welcome. There had been a waiting line of "rush" auditors, two blocks long, on his account. After all a concerto should be but a three-movement symphony with a thread of solo interwoven, and the concerto-player fits into the orchestral scheme far better than the opera singer who pulls us from the concert to the foot-light favor. But Chopin's two concertos are far less symphonic or orchestral than they ought to be. They are piano solos with an orchestral accompaniment. It is comical to think that this concerto was dedicated to the dry-as-dust Kalkbrenner, who wanted to teach Chopin piano, which is about as good as if Bryan aspired to teach Plato philosophy.

We, nevertheless, could have wished the poetic Gabrilowitsch a better work than the E minor concerto. The first movement is good, the finale better, the Larghetto honey poured over sugar,—rather cloying. The pianist made the most of the finale, but we could have wished for something greater, the Schumann concerto, or Beethoven's fourth, for example.

Nevertheless, the elastic, free vein in which he took the work was sure to carry it to success. He played with a surety that bred a sense of security in the audience and made the performance triumphant. The ensemble was throughout perfect. The Rondo (the Finale) was bright and joyous and seemed bubbling over with happiness, so that the final climax was succeeded by an outburst of spontaneous enthusiasm that proved that the audience had been most closely "en rapport" with the artist. The recalls were too numerous to count.

At the end we came to the modern school at last. Not the awful school of Stravinsky, Schoenberg, or Holbrooke, but the work of the founder of modern programme music, the pioneer of the modern many-tinted orchestra. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture is the best of his eight works in this form. It is also probably his most tuneful one, since the Salterello, fully explained by Mr. Hale in the programme book, is about as rhythmic as a two-step or a tango. The English horn was excellently played, and we ought not to forget that it was Berlioz who first revealed the brooding melancholy of this instrument and first gave it its true place in the orchestra. The violas, too, whose tone-color is to the strings what the English horn is to the wood-wind (a pe[illegible] choly), did excellent work in the [illegible] part of this overture.

The wild, chromatic rushes of the wood-wind instruments, which introduce the carnival, the fierce crashes which interrupt the merriment, the tamborines, cymbals, and all the saturnalia of gaiety at the close worked up a fine climax to the most beautiful, the most melodic concert that we have had in a long while.

the World

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 30, 1915

THIRD PUBLIC REHEARSAL BY THE SYMPHONY

Brahms, Schumann, Chopin and Berlioz Figure in Program of Afternoon.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4	Brahms
Overture to "Manfred"	Schumann
Pianoforte Concerto in E minor	Chopin
Roman Carnival Overture	Berlioz

Brahms had grave doubts about his fourth symphony. Writing from a village in Styria to Elisabet von Herzogenberg, who was for some years his Egeria and by no means given to unstinted praise, he said: "I rather fear it has been influenced by this climate, where the cherries never ripen." Later he doubted whether she would have the patience to sit through the finale. He mentioned the "acerbity" of the music to Buelow. When the symphony was played in a version for piano (four hands), he was discouraged, because those invited apparently did not like it. Kalbeck, who fondly believed in the plenary inspiration of Brahms's music, thinks the symphony pictures the tragedy of human life

The music is for the most part depressing. Brahms was more than once given to whining in tones. He could be nobly tragic—witness the overture performed at the first concert this season. But this symphony is written in the spirit of Ecclesiastes—vanity, vanity, all is vanity. There is one end for man and beast. This end is the grave. A live dog is better than a dead hero. We shall all be "damnably mouldy a hundred years hence." Nor is there the reassuring Finale of the symphony in C minor.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a memorable performance of this work. While they brought out the inexorable spirit of the first movement and the Finale, the Andante was sung tenderly and the scherzo played with such spirit that there was a human touch, not merely the "noise" of which Brahms himself spoke in a letter. Nevertheless, with the best will in the world we cannot, unlike Mr. Kalbeck, see in the scherzo a picture of the carnival at Milan or any other Italian city.

Does any one read "Manfred" today? The play, although Byron never intended it for the theatre, is read on the stage occasionally with Schumann's music. Early in 1912 the tragedy in a French version was acted at the Monte Carlo Theatre with the music. Perhaps it is hard for us now to understand the influence of Byron throughout Europe, or the important part he played in the romantic movement. To the members of Browning clubs Manfred no doubt seems, as Hazlitt said, merely Byron himself "with a fancy drapery on." Yet it might have been better for England if Byron had remained her favorite poet.

To some Shumann's overture is as old fashioned in its remanticism as the tragedy. They ask you to note how Tschaikowsky treated "Manfred." Yet we find all of Schumann and much of Byron in this overture, and we shudder to think what an ultra-modern German would do with the subject. There is a wildness in Schumann's music, a passion, a beauty of expression in the portraiture of Astarte, that are missing in Tschaikowsky's symphony with all its thunder and guns. Your ultra modern composer would have all his little labels ready. How he would dwell on the Incest motive!

Chopin's concerto in E minor had not been performed at a Symphony Concert since November, 1906, when Mme. Szumowska was the pianist. It is not for a huge hall. Some pianists endeavor to turn it into a heroic piece and use a later orchestration than Chopin's. Heroic, while the music does not allow the adjective, although there has been much chatter of late about the "greater," the "heroic" Chopin, and pianists therefore storm and pound, whereas the composer himself was a delicate player whose fortissimo was only the forte of the average pianist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was faithful to tradition. Consequently his performance in Symphony Hall put the concerto in miniatures. Admirable as it would have been in a smaller room, the performance was often necessarily ineffective. The excellent qualities of Mr. Gabrilowitsch were gladly recognized; his charming fluency, his irreproachable technic, his nice appreciation of nuances, his unfailing sense of proportion; but the performance was not emotional. It could not be; the pianist was too remote, the music was heard as at a great distance; the musical fluid could not enwrap the hearer.

There will not be any concerts next week. The program of Nov. 12-13 is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar"; Braunfels, overture "Princess Brambilla" (first time here); Handel, "Sweet Bird" (Mme. Melba); Handel, Concerto for two wind choirs and strings; Mozart, "Porgi amor" and "Voi che sapete" (Mme. Melba).

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915
Es , 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Lesson in the Interpretation of Beethoven Music.

TWO CONTRASTED SYMPHONIC POEMS

Loeffler's Illumination of a Dramatic Poem by Maeterlinck.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

The emotional high-light at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shone in the performance of Loeffler's "Le Mort de Tintagiles"; the large educational lesson, so far as the present orchestral situation in New York is concerned, was conveyed by the performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The time ought to have been passed long ago when a performance of this familiar classic would call for comment, because it was read in the direct, straightforward, unaffected manner which not only proclaims its dignified and noble beauty, but also publishes its poetical contents. But it is not. No conductor so small of comprehension and large of pretension (the attributes are generally consorted) but he thinks it his privilege to distort its tempos, disfigure its phrases and maltreat its nuances in order, as he thinks, to heighten its significance. As if Beethoven, the most consummate poet in music that ever lived, had not written down his purposes in symbols unmistakable to every sincere musician capable of reading them and of feeling the sentiment which in the composer's opinion they were able to express! Beethoven's page offers no bar to the imagination; it is an open field on which fancy may roam, a limitless expanse in which it may take its flight. But it sets bounds to the foolish conceits of pedants and puts to naught the efforts of those who would alter it for their own vainglory. And so it was a refreshment to the honest soul yesterday when Dr. Muck permitted Beethoven to be Beethoven instead of presenting him as Beethoven plus Muck. The conductor from Boston and his men left nothing as food for the cavilers. They poured out the glorious music gloriously, as if believing the word they were glad to speak it with all the eloquence that was within them. And they had their reward, for their hearers bore testimony with them to its beauty.

There was other music in the programme besides the symphony and Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem; but it need not detain us. Ravel's "Ma Mëre l'Oye" thrown in as a tidbit between them and Liszt's "Preludes" was a superabundant offering at the close, like Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture on Thursday evening. Ravel's infantine pieces have been made familiar to us since Walter Damrosch introduced them two or three seasons ago. They are astonishingly clever but would probably appeal more to the average fancy if a more suggestive title could be found for them. Mother Goose belongs to English children whether of small or large growth, and has nothing to tell us of the things which occupy the attention of Mére l'Oye. Hop o' my Thumb does not belong to her family, nor the Sleeping Beauty, nor the Princess who fell in love with the Beast; and the children brought upon the English fairy tales and Grimm's never heard of the Chinese porcelain princess whose head rocked so prettily in obedience to a touch. Hop o' my Thumb's adveture in losing his way in the forest because the birds ate the crumbs which he had ropped in the hope that they would do the service of Ariadne's Thread, belongs to the story of Hansel and Gretel, not to the Jack the Giant Killer series as one might think. The doings of the delightful creatures of the French nursery are exquisitely told in Ravil's music, but it does not sing to us of Mother Goose, who is nothing if not English.

But as to the piece with the bright lights. If there were not a curb upon our enthusiasm (a purely artistic, not at all patriotic, enthusiasm), we should almost say that "Le Mort de Tintagiles" is one of the finest pieces of programmatic music with which we are ecquainted, a fit companion in its poetical expressiveness of Debussy's "L' Aprés-midi d'un Faune" and of much greater depth and loveliness in its mood and feeling. It had its first performance in Boston in January, 1898, when The Tribune's reviewer heard it. The composition was something a litle different then from what it is now. Through it there ran obbligato parts for two viole d'amore, which on its production were played by the composer and Mr. Franz Kneisel. When Mr. Loeffler revised it for publication he yielded to practical considerations and eliminated one of the obbligato instruments. We are sorry for that. The help which their peculiarly sympathetic timbre gave to the music designed to give voice to the ill-starred children of Maeterlinck's marionette play cannot well be described; it must be left to the imagination. It was felt in an insufficient measure by Mr. Farrir's playing of the single instrument yesterday; for he kept the part too [illegible]

It is truly a [illegible] composition, this tone poem, and only to be und tood fully and felt after a reading Maeterlinck's poem. Those who, ind by the title, turn to the Arthu legends for an explanation will their research unavailing. The po which employs symbols much be than "Pelléas et Mélisande," has n ing to do with the castle Tintagil which Arthur was born, nor w Ygraine, his mother. All that Maet linck borrowed from the old legend these two names, and to these he gi a wholly new significance. In his sy bolical play Tintagiles is a prince is brought across the water to a rui castle on an island around which sea waters roar, where an old que his grandmother, lives, and also two sisters. Nobody ever sees the of the old queen, who has been cra by the desire to rule, except her two maids, who are as wicked as she. At night Tintagiles is torn from the arms of his sister Ygraine, who loves him wildly, and done to death while she is madly attempting to tear down an iron door which separates him from her. The last desperately hurried dialogue of the little ones and their kisses on the cruel barrier between them form the climax of the musical composition, which begins with a delineation of the gloomy place to which Tintagiles has been brought, so that he might be put out of the way of the wicked queen's ambition, the stormy sea dashing against the rocks below, and the cries of the little ones. It needed not the rhythmic rhetoric of Maeterlinck to make the subject pathetic and to lift it into a province fit for music; but the literary investiture of the story played its part in inspiring Mr. Loeffler to music of singular poignancy and beauty, as did, also, the death of a younger brother which occurred at the time when the poem came into his hands. It is a composition with which few latter day works can measure themselves.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915
Esta 84

LOEFFLER MUSIC AROUSES PLEASURE

"La Mort de Tintagiles" Given Once More by the Boston Orchestra.

RAVEL'S "MOTHER GOOSE

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegi Hall yesterday afternoon was attende by an audience which filled the house The programme was one of variety an value. It comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Ravel's suite, "Ma Mer l'Oye"; Loeffler's dramatic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Dr. Muck's reading of the familiar A major symphony of Beethoven had features which might stir a musical Puritan to questionings, but there was no sound reason for discomfort.

Dr. Muck is a German, and in recent years German musicians have shown a fondness for slow tempi. The first movement of the symphony, the first publication of the chief melodic material of the second and the opening of the scherzo were all taken deliberately. Doubtless some felt the want of a certain incisiveness, especially in the scherzo, and there was no doubt that the allegretto began heavily. But since the distinguished doctor indulged in some changes of pace in his delivery it may be said that his tempi were interesting; and that since they did not thwart the artistic purposes of Beethoven they were justified. In finish the orchestral performance of the symphony was most admirable.

Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" is a pretty scheme of orchestral color, and it is not without fancy. But it is very tenuous in musical texture. A much better composition in the same musical province was played by the New York Symphony Society on Friday and will be repeated to-day. This is John Alden Carpenter's suite "Adventures in a Perambulator," and the only reason for dragging it into this story is the fact that it was written by an American.

Charles Martin Loeffler's composition "The Death of Tintagiles" wears very well. It has its dull moments, and the voice of the viole d'amour, which sings the sorrows of "the little, ill starred boy," is sometimes ineffective in the midst of the orchestral chorus. But the composition as a whole has musical beauty and eloquence and it gives a brilliant utterance to the tragic moods of Maeterlinck's drama. In workmanship too it is a most excellent example of form. The substructure of the work is built of two principal themes and one secondary, against which are projected themes representing the deadly queen, the child and other forces in the drama.

"La Mort de Tintagiles" is, in its composer's opinion, "a youthful work"—it is his opus 6—but it holds its place close to his later creations, which have perhaps a deeper intellectuality and a profounder mastery of materials, but little more imagination and directness of utterance. Mr. Loeffler, born an Alsatian, has lived many years in the United States. He is a naturalized American and has brought distinction to the musical art of his adopted country. Dr. Muck has long been a fervent admirer of the productions of Mr. Loeffler and he interpreted the one on yesterday's programme with enthusiasm and knowled

---

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915
Established:

Dr. Muck's Men, Without Soloist, Charm Hearers

Enthusiasm Particularly Marked After Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—Ensemble Work Faultless.

No soloist graced yesterday afternoon's first matinee programme of the Boston Symphony's present season at Carnegie Hall, but the audience suffered no shrinkage in numbers on this account. The listeners' enthusiasm was particularly marked after the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, when the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, bowed his own acknowledgements and then asked the orchestra to rise and express its gratitude.

Small wonder, the outburst, for the symphony was wonderfully played. The ensemble work of the players was almost faultless in balance of choirs, the playing of the solo instruments again convincing the hearers that this truly is an orchestra of virtuosi.

Then came Joseph Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, which has been played here by the New York Symphony Society. The music originally was written to amuse some children; then it was piano music; now it is a skilfully scored, fantastic orchestral suite, but it still amuses, particularly the movement called "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast." After this piece there was heard, after years of neglect, Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic poem "La Mort de Tintagiles," written eighteen years ago, at which time it seemed to out-Debussy Debussy. Yesterday it proved that the ravages of time had made small inroads upon the effectively scored and poetically conceived writing, although its Maeterlinckian sense of mystery seemed to have evaporated. Finally there came Liszt's jubilant "Les Preludes," brilliantly played.

It was a programme of right length, representative of many schools and most admirably played.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 6 - 1915
Estab 4

MELBA GREETED WITH BOSTONIANS

Famous Prima Donna Sings Handel and Mozart Arias at the Academy.

OLD MEMORIES AWAKENED.

Incomparable Orchestra Plays Programme Curiously Built.

Memories of a bygone golden age of sopranos were awakened at the Academy of Music last night when Nellie Melba sang to the accompaniment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Opera House was filled with a flood of florid song such as perhaps never before has it known. Melba occasioned the only moments of genuine enthusiasm for a big and smart audience, for though the entire programme in its execution was one of rare artistry, the delights were more intellectual than emotional, with the restraining, calcuating baton of Karl Muck ever repressing fanciful flights.

Melba's first appearance came after the orchestra, opening its season here with a house again sold out long in advance, had played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and had revealed tonal purity and clarity of a sort to thrill even a community so accustomed to instrumental excellence as this. The symphony is Beethoven's shortest, and last night it took just a half hour to play. The playful "allegretto scherzando" that forms the second movement and the minuet of the third demonstrated Beethoven's lighter mood at its best. The symphony was played with precision and harmonies of appealing beauty, but never with any sustained flow of eloquence.

Melba Sings "Sweet Bird."

Then on came Melba, a figure pleasantly ample in robe of vivid sunset hue, with tiers of glittering diamonds at her throat and in her hair. Nothing more modern than Handel and Mozart were the songs that she sang. The first was a quaint "sweet bird that shun'st the sounds of folly; so musical, so melancholy," in which the obligato of a flute served as background for her trills and arpeggios. After she had yielded to the orchestra for a half hour she favored [illegible], this time with two Mozartian [illegible] from "The [illegible]

[39]

in the World

BOSTON HERALD,
OCTOBER 30, 1915

THIRD PUBLIC REHEARSAL BY THE SYMPHONY

Brahms, Schumann, Chopin and Berlioz Figure in Program of Afternoon.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4	Brahms
Overture to "Manfred"	Schumann
Pianoforte Concerto in E minor	Chopin
Roman Carnival Overture	Berlioz

Brahms had grave doubts about his fourth symphony. Writing from a village in Styria to Elisabet von Herzogenberg, who was for some years his Egeria and by no means given to unstinted praise, he said: "I rather fear it has been influenced by this climate, where the cherries never ripen." Later he doubted whether she would have the patience to sit through the finale. He mentioned the "acerbity" of the music to Buelow. When the symphony was played in a version for piano (four hands), he was discouraged, because those invited apparently did not like it. Kalbeck, who fondly believed in the plenary inspiration of Brahms's music, thinks the symphony pictures the tragedy of human life

The music is for the most part depressing. Brahms was more than once given to whining in tones. He could be nobly tragic—witness the overture performed at the first concert this season. But this symphony is written in the spirit of Ecclesiastes—vanity, vanity, all is vanity. There is one end for man and beast. This end is the grave. A live dog is better than a dead hero. We shall all be "damnably mouldy a hundred years hence." Nor is there the reassuring Finale of the symphony in C minor.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a memorable performance of this work. While they brought out the inexorable spirit of the first movement and the Finale, the Andante was sung tenderly and the scherzo played with such spirit that there was a human touch, not merely the "noise" of which Brahms himself spoke in a letter. Nevertheless, with the best will in the world we cannot, unlike Mr. Kalbeck, see in the scherzo a picture of the carnival at Milan or any other Italian city.

Does any one read "Manfred" today? The play, although Byron never intended it for the theatre, is read on the stage occasionally with Schumann's music. Early in 1912 the tragedy in a French version was acted at the Monte Carlo Theatre with the music. Perhaps it is hard for us now to understand the influence of Byron throughout Europe, or the important part he played in the romantic movement. To the members of Browning clubs Manfred no doubt seems, as Hazlitt said, merely Byron himself "with a fancy drapery on." Yet it might have been better for England if Byron had remained her favorite poet.

To some Shumann's overture is as old fashioned in its remanticism as the tragedy. They ask you to note how Tschaikowsky treated "Manfred." Yet we find all of Schumann and much of Byron in this overture, and we shudder to think what an ultra-modern German would do with the subject. There is a wildness in Schumann's music, a passion, a beauty of expression in the portraiture of Astarte, that are missing in Tschaikowsky's symphony with all its thunder and guns. Your ultra modern composer would have all his little labels ready. How he would dwell on the Incest motive!

Chopin's concerto in E minor had not been performed at a Symphony Concert since November, 1906, when Mme. Szumowska was the pianist. It is not for a huge hall. Some pianists endeavor to turn it into a heroic piece and use a later orchestration than Chopin's. Heroic, while the music does not allow the adjective, although there has been much chatter of late about the "greater," the "heroic" Chopin, and pianists therefore storm and pound, whereas the composer himself was a delicate player whose fortissimo was only the forte of the average pianist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was faithful to tradition. Consequently his performance in Symphony Hall put the concerto in miniatures. Admirable as it would have been in a smaller room, the performance was often necessarily ineffective. The excellent qualities of Mr. Gabrilowitsch were gladly recognized; his charming fluency, his irreproachable technic, his nice appreciation of nuances, his unfailing sense of proportion; but the performance was not emotional. It could not be; the pianist was too remote, the music was heard as at a great distance; the musical fluid could not enwrap the hearer.

There will not be any concerts next week. The program of Nov. 12-13 is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar"; Braunfels, overture "Princess Brambilla" (first time here); Handel, "Sweet Bird" (Mme. Melba); Handel, Concerto for two wind choirs and strings; Mozart, "Porgi amor" and "Voi che sapete" (Mme. Melba).

411

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 1915
, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Lesson in the Interpretation of Beethoven Music.

TWO CONTRASTED SYMPHONIC POEMS

Loeffler's Illumination of a Dramatic Poem by Maeterlinck.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

The emotional high-light at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shone in the performance of Loeffler's "Le Mort de Tintagiles"; the large educational lesson, so far as the present orchestral situation in New York is concerned, was conveyed by the performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The time ought to have been passed long ago when a performance of this familiar classic would call for comment, because it was read in the direct, straightforward, unaffected manner which not only proclaims its dignified and noble beauty, but also publishes its poetical contents. But it is not. No conductor so small of comprehension and large of pretension (the attributes are generally consorted) but he thinks it his privilege to distort its tempos, disfigure its phrases and maltreat its nuances in order, as he thinks, to heighten its significance. As if Beethoven, the most consummate poet in music that ever lived, had not written down his purposes in symbols unmistakable to every sincere musician capable of reading them and of feeling the sentiment which in the composer's opinion they were able to express! Beethoven's page offers no bar to the imagination; it is an open field on which fancy may roam, a limitless expanse in which it may take its flight. But it sets bounds to the foolish conceits of pedants and puts to aught the efforts of those who would lter it for their own vainglory. And o it was a refreshment to the honest oul yesterday when Dr. Muck permit-ed Beethoven to be Beethoven instead f presenting him as Beethoven plus Muck. The conductor from Boston and is men left nothing as food for the avilers. They poured out the glorious nusic gloriously, as if believing the vord they were glad to speak it with ll the eloquence that was within them. And they had their reward, for their earers bore testimony with them to ts beauty.

There was other music in the programme besides the symphony and Mr. oeffler's symphonic poem; but it need ot detain us. Ravel's "Ma Mère 'Oye" thrown in as a tidbit between hem and Liszt's "Preludes" was a uperabundant offering at the close, ike Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture on 'hursday evening. Ravel's infantine ieces have been made familiar to us ince Walter Damrosch introduced hem two or three seasons ago. They re astonishingly clever but would robably appeal more to the average ancy if a more suggestive title could e found for them. Mother Goose belongs to English children whether of mall or large growth, and has nothing o tell us of the things which occupy he attention of Mére l'Oye. Hop o' ny Thumb does not belong to her amily, nor the Sleeping Beauty, nor he Princess who fell in love with the Beast; and the children brought upon he English fairy tales and Grimm's never heard of the Chinese porcelain princess whose head rocked so prettily n obedience to a touch. Hop o' my Thumb's adveture in losing his way in he forest because the birds ate the rumbs which he had ropped in the ope that they would do the service of Ariadne's Thread, belongs to the story of Hansel and Gretel, not to the Jack he Giant Killer series as one might hink. The doings of the delightful reatures of the French nursery are xquisitely told in Ravil's music, but it oes not sing to us of Mother Goose, who is nothing if not English.

But as to the piece with the bright lights. If there were not a curb upon our enthusiasm (a purely artistic, not at all patriotic, enthusiasm), we should almost say that "Le Mort de Tintagiles" is one of the finest pieces of programmatic music with which we are ecquainted, a fit companion in its poetical expressiveness of Debussy's "L' Aprés-midi d'un Faune" and of much greater depth and loveliness in its mood and feeling. It had its first performance in Boston in January, 1898, when The Tribune's reviewer heard it. The composition was something a litle different then from what it is now. Through it there ran obbligato parts for two viole d'amore, which on its production were played by the composer and Mr. Franz Kneisel. When Mr. Loeffler revised it for publication he yielded to practical considerations and eliminated one of the obbligato instruments. We are sorry for that. The help which their peculiarly sympathetic timbre gave to the music designed to give voice to the ill-starred children of Maeterlinck's marionette play cannot well be described; it must be left to the imagination. It was felt in an insufficient measure by Mr. Farrir's playing of the single instrument yesterday; for he kept the part too background.

It is truly a remarkable composition, this tone poem, and only to be und stood fully and felt after a reading Maeterlinck's poem. Those who, inc by the title, turn to the Arthur legends for an explanation will their research unavailing. The po which employs symbols much be than "Pelléas et Mélisande," has n ing to do with the castle Tintagil, which Arthur was born, nor w Ygraine, his mother. All that Maet linck borrowed from the old legend these two names, and to these he gi a wholly new significance. In his sy bolical play Tintagiles is a prince is brought across the water to a rui castle on an island around which sea waters roar, where an old que his grandmother, lives, and also two sisters. Nobody ever sees the of the old queen, who has been cra by the desire to rule, except her two maids, who are as wicked as she. At night Tintagiles is torn from the arms of his sister Ygraine, who loves him wildly, and done to death while she is madly attempting to tear down an iron door which separates him from her. The last desperately hurried dialogue of the little ones and their kisses on the cruel barrier between them form the climax of the musical composition, which begins with a delineation of the gloomy place to which Tintagiles has been brought, so that he might be put out of the way of the wicked queen's ambition, the stormy sea dashing against the rocks below, and the cries of the little ones. It needed not the rhythmic rhetoric of Maeterlinck to make the subject pathetic and to lift it into a province fit for music; but the literary investiture of the story played its part in inspiring Mr. Loeffler to music of singular poignancy and beauty, as did, also, the death of a younger brother which occurred at the time when the poem came into his hands. It is a composition with which few latter day works can measure themselves.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date OV 7 - 1915
Esta 84

LOEFFLER MUSIC AROUSES PLEASURE

"La Mort de Tintagiles" Given Once More by the Boston Orchestra.

RAVEL'S "MOTHER GOOSE"

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was attende by an audience which filled the house The programme was one of variety and value. It comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Loeffler's dramatic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Dr. Muck's reading of the familiar A major symphony of Beethoven had features which might stir a musical Puritan to questionings, but there was no sound reason for discomfort.

Dr. Muck is a German, and in recent years German musicians have shown a fondness for slow tempi. The first movement of the symphony, the first publication of the chief melodic material of the second and the opening of the scherzo were all taken deliberately. Doubtless some felt the want of a certain incisiveness, especially in the scherzo, and there was no doubt that the allegretto began heavily. But since the distinguished doctor indulged in some changes of pace in his delivery it may be said that his tempi were interesting; and that since they did not thwart the artistic purposes of Beethoven they were justified. In finish the orchestral performance of the symphony was most admirable.

Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" is a pretty scheme of orchestral color, and it is not without fancy. But it is very tenuous in musical texture. A much better composition in the same musical province was played by the New York Symphony Society on Friday and will be repeated to-day. This is John Alden Carpenter's suite "Adventures in a Perambulator," and the only reason for dragging it into this story is the fact that it was written by an American.

Charles Martin Loeffler's composition "The Death of Tintagiles" wears very well. It has its dull moments, and the voice of the viole d'amour, which sings the sorrows of "the little, ill starred boy," is sometimes ineffective in the midst of the orchestral chorus. But the composition as a whole has musical beauty and eloquence and it gives a brilliant utterance to the tragic moods of Maeterlinck's drama. In workmanship too it is a most excellent example of form. The substructure of the work is built of two principal themes and one secondary, against which are projected themes representing the deadly queen, the child and other forces in the drama.

"La Mort de Tintagiles" is, in its composer's opinion, "a youthful work"—it is his opus 6—but it holds its place close to his later creations, which have perhaps a deeper intellectuality and a profounder mastery of materials, but little more imagination and directness of utterance. Mr. Loeffler, born an Alsatian, has lived many years in the United States. He is a naturalized American and has brought distinction to the musical art of his adopted country. Dr. Muck has long been a fervent admirer of the productions of Mr. Loeffler and he interpreted the one on yesterday's programme with enthusiasm and knowledge.

[39]

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915
Established:

Dr. Muck's Men, Without Soloist, Charm Hearers

Enthusiasm Particularly Marked Afte Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—Ensemble Work Faultless.

No soloist graced yesterday afternoon's first matinee programme of the Boston Symphony's present season at Carnegie Hall, but the audience suffered no shrinkage in numbers on this account. The listeners' enthusiasm was particularly marked after the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, when the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, bowed his own acknowledgements and then asked the orchestra to rise and express its gratitude.

Small wonder, the outburst, for the symphony was wonderfully played. The ensemble work of the players was almost faultless in balance of choirs. the playing of the solo instruments again convincing the hearers that this truly is an orchestra of virtuosi.

Then came Joseph Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, which has been played here by the New York Symphony Society. The music originally was written to amuse some children; then it was piano music; now it is a skilfully scored, fantastic orchestral suite, but it still amuses, particularly the movement called "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast." After this piece there was heard, after years of neglect, Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic poem "La Mort de Tintagiles," written eighteen years ago, at which time it seemed to out-Debussy Debussy. Yesterday it proved that the ravages of time had made small inroads upon the effectively scored and poetically conceived writing, although its Maeterlinckian sense of mystery seemed to have evaporated. Finally there came Liszt's jubilant "Les Preludes," brilliantly played.

It was a programme of right length, representative of many schools and most admirably played.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 6 -
Estab

MELBA GREETED WITH BOSTONIANS

Famous Prima Donna Sings Handel and Mozart Arias at the Academy.

OLD MEMORIES AWAKENED.

Incomparable Orchestra Plays Programme Curiously Built.

Memories of a bygone golden age of sopranos were awakened at the Academy of Music last night when Nellie Melba sang to the accompaniment of the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra. The Opera House was filled with a flood of florid song such as perhaps never before has it known. Melba occasioned the only moments of genuine enthusiasm for a big and smart audience, for though the entire programme in its execution was one of rare artistry, the delights were more intellectual than emotional, with the restraining, calcuating baton of Karl Muck ever repressing fanciful flights.

Melba's first appearance came after the orchestra, opening its season here with a house again sold out long in advance, had played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and had revealed tonal purity and clarity of a sort to thrill even a community so accustomed to instrumental excellence as this. The symphony is Beethoven's shortest, and last night it took just a half hour to play. The playful "allegretto scherzando" that forms the second movement and the minuet of the third demonstrated Beethoven's lighter mood at its best. The symphony was played with precision and harmonies of appealing beauty, but never with any sustained flow of eloquence.

Melba Sings "Sweet Bird."

Then on came Melba, a figure pleasantly ample in robe of vivid sunset hue, with tiers of glittering diamonds at her throat and in her hair. Nothing more modern than Handel and Mozart were the songs that she sang. The first was a quaint "sweet bird that shun'st the sounds of folly; so musical, so melancholy," in which the obligato of a flute served as background for her trills and arpeggios. After she had yielded to the orchestra for a half hour she favored again, this time with two Mozartian arias from "The Marriage of Figaro." Again her tones were silver clear, her

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ne World

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 30, 1915

THIRD PUBLIC REHEARSAL BY THE SYMPHONY

Brahms, Schumann, Chopin and Berlioz Figure in Program of Afternoon.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4	Brahms
Overture to "Manfred"	Schumann
Pianoforte Concerto in E minor	Chopin
Roman Carnival Overture	Berlioz

Brahms had grave doubts about his fourth symphony. Writing from a village in Styria to Elisabet von Herzogenberg, who was for some years his Egeria and by no means given to unstinted praise, he said: "I rather fear it has been influenced by this climate, where the cherries never ripen." Later he doubted whether she would have the patience to sit through the finale. He mentioned the "acerbity" of the music to Buelow. When the symphony was played in a version for piano (four hands), he was discouraged, because those invited apparently did not like it. Kalbeck, who fondly believed in the plenary inspiration of Brahms's music, thinks the symphony pictures the tragedy of human life

The music is for the most part depressing. Brahms was more than once given to whining in tones. He could be nobly tragic—witness the overture performed at the first concert this season. But this symphony is written in the spirit of Ecclesiastes—vanity, vanity, all is vanity. There is one end for man and beast. This end is the grave. A live dog is better than a dead hero. We shall all be "damnably mouldy a hundred years hence." Nor is there the reassuring Finale of the symphony in C minor.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a memorable performance of this work. While they brought out the inexorable spirit of the first movement and the Finale, the Andante was sung tenderly and the scherzo played with such spirit that there was a human touch, not merely the "noise" of which Brahms himself spoke in a letter. Nevertheless, with the best will in the world we cannot, unlike Mr. Kalbeck, see in the scherzo a picture of the carnival at Milan or any other Italian city.

Does any one read "Manfred" today? The play, although Byron never intended it for the theatre, is read on the stage occasionally with Schumann's music. Early in 1912 the tragedy in a French version was acted at the Monte Carlo Theatre with the music. Perhaps it is hard for us now to understand the influence of Byron throughout Europe, or the important part he played in the romantic movement. To the members of Browning clubs Manfred no doubt seems, as Hazlitt said, merely Byron himself "with a fancy drapery on." Yet it might have been better for England if Byron had remained her favorite poet.

To some Shumann's overture is as old fashioned in its remanticism as the tragedy. They ask you to note how Tschaikowsky treated "Manfred." Yet we find all of Schumann and much of Byron in this overture, and we shudder to think what an ultra-modern German would do with the subject. There is a wildness in Schumann's music, a passion, a beauty of expression in the portraiture of Astarte, that are missing in Tschaikowsky's symphony with all its thunder and guns. Your ultra modern composer would have all his little labels ready. How he would dwell on the Incest motive!

Chopin's concerto in E minor had not been performed at a Symphony Concert since November, 1906, when Mme. Szumowska was the pianist. It is not for a huge hall. Some pianists endeavor to turn it into a heroic piece and use a later orchestration than Chopin's. Heroic, while the music does not allow the adjective, although there has been much chatter of late about the "greater," the "heroic" Chopin, and pianists therefore storm and pound, whereas the composer himself was a delicate player whose fortissimo was only the forte of the average pianist. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was faithful to tradition. Consequently his performance in Symphony Hall put the concerto in miniatures. Admirable as it would have been in a smaller room, the performance was often necessarily ineffective. The excellent qualities of Mr. Gabrilowitsch were gladly recognized; his charming fluency, his irreproachable technic, his nice appreciation of nuances, his unfailing sense of proportion; but the performance was not emotional. It could not be; the pianist was too remote, the music was heard as at a great distance; the musical fluid could not enwrap the hearer.

There will not be any concerts next week. The program of Nov. 12-13 is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar"; Braunfels, overture "Princess Brambilla" (first time here); Handel, "Sweet Bird" (Mme. Melba); Handel, Concerto for two wind choirs and strings; Mozart, "Porgi amor" and "Voi che sapete" (Mme. Melba).

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

Date NOV 7 - 1915

, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Lesson in the Interpretation of Beethoven Music.

TWO CONTRASTED SYMPHONIC POEMS

Loeffler's Illumination of a Dramatic Poem by Maeterlinck.

By H. E. KREHBIEL.

The emotional high-light at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shone in the performance of Loeffler's "Le Mort de Tintagiles"; the large educational lesson, so far as the present orchestral situation in New York is concerned, was conveyed by the performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The time ought to have been passed long ago when a performance of this familiar classic would call for comment, because it was read in the direct, straightforward, unaffected manner which not only proclaims its dignified and noble beauty, but also publishes its poetical contents. But it is not. No conductor so small of comprehension and large of pretension (the attributes are generally consorted) but he thinks it his privilege to distort its tempos, disfigure its phrases and maltreat its nuances in order, as he thinks, to heighten its significance. As if Beethoven, the most consummate poet in music that ever lived, had not written down his purposes in symbols unmistakable to every sincere musician capable of reading them and of feeling the sentiment which in the composer's opinion they were able to express! Beethoven's page offers no bar to the imagination; it is an open field on which fancy may roam, a limitless expanse in which it may take its flight. But it sets bounds to the foolish conceits of pedants and puts to naught the efforts of those who would alter it for their own vainglory. And so it was a refreshment to the honest soul yesterday when Dr. Muck permitted Beethoven to be Beethoven instead of presenting him as Beethoven plus Muck. The conductor from Boston and his men left nothing as food for the cavilers. They poured out the glorious music gloriously, as if believing the word they were glad to speak it with all the eloquence that was within them. And they had their reward, for their hearers bore testimony with them to its beauty.

There was other music in the programme besides the symphony and Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem; but it need not detain us. Ravel's "Ma Mëre l'Oye" thrown in as a tidbit between them and Liszt's "Preludes" was a superabundant offering at the close, like Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture on Thursday evening. Ravel's infantine pieces have been made familiar to us since Walter Damrosch introduced them two or three seasons ago. They are astonishingly clever but would probably appeal more to the average fancy if a more suggestive title could be found for them. Mother Goose belongs to English children whether of small or large growth, and has nothing to tell us of the things which occupy the attention of Mére l'Oye. Hop o' my Thumb does not belong to her family, nor the Sleeping Beauty, nor the Princess who fell in love with the Beast; and the children brought upon the English fairy tales and Grimm's never heard of the Chinese porcelain princess whose head rocked so prettily in obedience to a touch. Hop o' my Thumb's adveture in losing his way in the forest because the birds ate the crumbs which he had ropped in the hope that they would do the service of Ariadne's Thread, belongs to the story of Hansel and Gretel, not to the Jack the Giant Killer series as one might think. The doings of the delightful creatures of the French nursery are exquisitely told in Ravil's music, but it does not sing to us of Mother Goose, who is nothing if not English.

But as to the piece with the bright lights. If there were not a curb upon our enthusiasm (a purely artistic, not at all patriotic, enthusiasm), we should almost say that "Le Mort de Tintagiles" is one of the finest pieces of programmatic music with which we are ecquainted, a fit companion in its poetical expressiveness of Debussy's "L' Aprés-midi d'un Faune" and of much greater depth and loveliness in its mood and feeling. It had its first performance in Boston in January, 1898, when The Tribune's reviewer heard it. The composition was something a litle different then from what it is now. Through it there ran obbligato parts for two viole d'amore, which on its production were played by the composer and Mr. Franz Kneisel. When Mr. Loeffler revised it for publication he yielded to practical considerations and eliminated one of the obbligato instruments. We are sorry for that. The help which their peculiarly sympathetic timbre gave to the music designed to give voice to the ill-starred children of Maeterlinck's marionette play cannot well be described; it must be left to the imagination. It was felt in an insufficient measure by Mr. Farrir's playing of the single instrument yesterday; for he kept the part too [illegible] background.

It is truly a remarkable composition, this tone poem, and only to be understood fully and felt after a reading of Maeterlinck's poem. Those who, incited by the title, turn to the Arthurian legends for an explanation will find their research unavailing. The poem, which employs symbols much better than "Pelléas et Mélisande," has nothing to do with the castle Tintagil, in which Arthur was born, nor with Ygraine, his mother. All that Maeterlinck borrowed from the old legend was these two names, and to these he give a wholly new significance. In his symbolical play Tintagiles is a prince who is brought across the water to a ruined castle on an island around which the sea waters roar, where an old queen, his grandmother, lives, and also his two sisters. Nobody ever sees the face of the old queen, who has been crazed by the desire to rule, except her two maids, who are as wicked as she. At night Tintagiles is torn from the arms of his sister Ygraine, who loves him wildly, and done to death while she is madly attempting to tear down an iron door which separates him from her. The last desperately hurried dialogue of the little ones and their kisses on the cruel barrier between them form the climax of the musical composition, which begins with a delineation of the gloomy place to which Tintagiles has been brought, so that he might be put out of the way of the wicked queen's ambition, the stormy sea dashing against the rocks below, and the cries of the little ones. It needed not the rhythmic rhetoric of Maeterlinck to make the subject pathetic and to lift it into a province fit for music; but the literary investiture of the story played its part in inspiring Mr. Loeffler to music of singular poignancy and beauty, as did, also, the death of a younger brother which occurred at the time when the poem came into his hands. It is a composition with which few latter day works can measure themselves.

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date NOV 7 - 1915

Esta 84

LOEFFLER MUSIC AROUSES PLEASURE

"La Mort de Tintagiles" Given Once More by the Boston Orchestra.

RAVEL'S "MOTHER GOOSE"

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was attended by an audience which filled the house. The programme was one of variety and value. It comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Loeffler's dramatic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Dr. Muck's reading of the familiar A major symphony of Beethoven had features which might stir a musical Puritan to questionings, but there was no sound reason for discomfort.

Dr. Muck is a German, and in recent years German musicians have shown a fondness for slow tempi. The first movement of the symphony, the first publication of the chief melodic material of the second and the opening of the scherzo were all taken deliberately. Doubtless some felt the want of a certain incisiveness, especially in the scherzo, and there was no doubt that the allegretto began heavily. But since the distinguished doctor indulged in some changes of pace in his delivery it may be said that his tempi were interesting; and that since they did not thwart the artistic purposes of Beethoven they were justified. In finish the orchestral performance of the symphony was most admirable.

Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" is a pretty scheme of orchestral color, and it is not without fancy. But it is very tenuous in musical texture. A much better composition in the same musical province was played by the New York Symphony Society on Friday and will be repeated to-day. This is John Alden Carpenter's suite "Adventures in a Perambulator," and the only reason for dragging it into this story is the fact that it was written by an American.

Charles Martin Loeffler's composition "The Death of Tintagiles" wears very well. It has its dull moments, and the voice of the viole d'amour, which sings the sorrows of "the little, ill starred boy," is sometimes ineffective in the midst of the orchestral chorus. But the composition as a whole has musical beauty and eloquence and it gives a brilliant utterance to the tragic moods of Maeterlinck's drama. In workmanship too it is a most excellent example of form. The substructure of the work is built of two principal themes and one secondary, against which are projected themes representing the deadly queen, the child and other forces in the drama.

"La Mort de Tintagiles" is, in its composer's opinion, "a youthful work"—it is his opus 6—but it holds its place close to his later creations, which have perhaps a deeper intellectuality and a profounder mastery of materials, but little more imagination and directness of utterance. Mr. Loeffler, born an Alsatian, has lived many years in the United States. He is a naturalized American and has brought distinction to the musical art of his adopted country. Dr. Muck has long been a fervent admirer of the productions of Mr. Loeffler and he interpreted the one on yesterday's programme with enthusiasm and knowledge.

HERALD
ess: New York City

NOV 7 - 1915

shed:

Dr. Muck's Men, Without Soloist, Charm Hearers

Enthusiasm Particularly Marked After Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—Ensemble Work Faultless.

No soloist graced yesterday afternoon's first matinee programme of the Boston Symphony's present season at Carnegie Hall, but the audience suffered no shrinkage in numbers on this account. The listeners' enthusiasm was particularly marked after the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, when the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, bowed his own acknowledgements and then asked the orchestra to rise and express its gratitude.

Small wonder, the outburst, for the symphony was wonderfully played. The ensemble work of the players was almost faultless in balance of choirs. The playing of the solo instruments again convincing the hearers that this truly is an orchestra of virtuosi.

Then came Joseph Maurice Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, which has been played here by the New York Symphony Society. The music originally was written to amuse some children; then it was piano music; now it is a skilfully scored, fantastic orchestral suite, but it still amuses, particularly the movement called "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast." After this piece there was heard, after years of neglect, Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic poem "La Mort de Tintagiles," written eighteen years ago, at which time it seemed to out-Debussy Debussy. Yesterday it proved that the ravages of time had made small inroads upon the effectively scored and poetically conceived writing, although its Maeterlinckian sense of mystery seemed to have evaporated. Finally there came Liszt's jubilant "Les Preludes," brilliantly played.

It was a programme of right length, representative of many schools and most admirably played.

STANDARD UNION
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 6

MELBA GREETED WITH BOSTONIA

Famous Prima Donna Sings Handel and Mozart Arias at the Academy.

OLD MEMORIES AWAKENED.

Incomparable Orchestra Plays Programme Curiously Built.

Memories of a bygone golden age of sopranos were awakened at the Academy of Music last night when Nellie Melba sang to the accompaniment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Opera House was filled with a flood of florid song such as perhaps never before has it known. Melba occasioned the only moments of genuine enthusiasm for a big and smart audience, for though the entire programme in its execution was one of rare artistry, the delights were more intellectual than emotional, with the restraining, calcuating baton of Karl Muck ever repressing fanciful flights.

Melba's first appearance came after the orchestra, opening its season here with a house again sold out long in advance, had played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and had revealed tonal purity and clarity of a sort to thrill even a community so accustomed to instrumental excellence as this. The symphony is Beethoven's shortest, and last night it took just a half hour to play. The playful "allegretto scherzando" that forms the second movement and the minuet of the third demonstrated Beethoven's lighter mood at its best. The symphony was played with precision and harmonies of appealing beauty, but never with any sustained flow of eloquence.

Melba Sings "Sweet Bird."

Then on came Melba, a figure pleasantly ample in robe of vivid sunset hue, with tiers of glittering diamonds at her throat and in her hair. Nothing more modern than Handel and Mozart were the songs that she sang. The first was a quaint "sweet bird that shun'st the sounds of folly, so musical, so melancholy," in which the obligato of a flute served as background for her trills and arpeggios. After she had yielded to the orchestra for a half hour she favored again, this time with two Mozartian arias from "The Marriage of Figaro." Again her tones were silver clear, her [illegible]

[39]

[illegible] Melba, the orchestra [illegible] Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles," a modernized tone-poem in the spirit of Maeterlinck. It was rather an agile mental leap the auditors were asked to accomplish—from the atmosphere of Handel to that of Loeffler and back again without blinking to Mozart. Yet it has become recognized as a characteristic of Dr. Muck's programmes, this sandwiching together of incongruities, and last night it had its usual effect of bewildering rather than inspiring its hearers.

A Performance to Be Remembered.

The performance of the up-to-date work by the Bostonians will not easily be forgotten. Again there was gorgeous tone and a mighty climax was effected. Surely never was such perfection of brasses and woodwind, always in perfect accord. The spirit of tragedy as conceived by Maeterlinck could ask for no better interpreter than this incomparable orchestra.

Brasses were again eloquent and triumphant in the orchestra's finale, the familiar and beloved "Les Preludes" of Liszt. This after-piece served adequately as dessert for the indigestible combinations that had preceded it and sent the audience home in an amiable mood. As in other years the first appearance of the Boston orchestra was the occasion for a notable audience and the added attraction caused the presence of several rows of standees.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 6 - 1915

B'KLYN CHARMED BY MME. MELBA

Appears with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SINGS BRILLIANTLY AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Combination a Rich Treat for the Lovers of Music—An Excellent Programme, Well Rendered Throughout.

Madame Nellie Melba was the star last evening at the first of a series of five Philharmonic concerts which are being held this season at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, like all the beautiful stars, she varied considerably in both tone and strength of her coloring. Whatever slight measure of regret might have been felt by the great audience that filled the opera house to its capacity, that the beloved diva did not exercise more discrimination in the selection of her first number, was swept away by the finesse and exquisite sympathy with which she rendered the two remaining numbers.

Hers is too great a soul to be won to the surface with the cajolry of one number, be it as enticing as it may. The zenith of beauty of her voice is reached only through a programme of ascendancy. And it was little more than a glimpse of this perfection that last night's audience won. But what a glimpse it was! Her first number, Handel's "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," was beautiful, but with a beauty as lifeless as granite, as white as alabaster and as cold as marble. It was strikingly reminiscent of Keats. The "bard of beauty" sounded the same note.

Perhaps it was the influence of a singularly splendid orchestral number that intervened. At any rate, on her return Mme. Melba was distinctly more responsive, more spontaneous. Two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" concluded her programme. The first, "Porgi Amor," just hinted to the music lovers thronging the hall to what heights she could rise. It was lit in passages with flashes of warmth and throbbed with a sweet, subdued tenderness. Then the prediction was fulfilled. In her third number, "Voi Che Sapete," the great soprano was once more herself. It was the old Melba, the Melba who set the world afire with the music of her voice. No depths and no heights characterized the number. Not the most ignorant could term it intricate. Yet, sung by Melba, it became a miracle of melody. It charmed the ear with its vivacity, the heart with its natural freshness. The mould was as flawless as a piece of Dresden china, the shading as subtle as the petal of a blown rose. She was generously, though not tumultuously, applauded at the close of her programme, and bowed to encore appeals five times.

Easily the best orchestra number was Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles." This dramatic poem, after Maeterlinck's drama, showed up the gifted musicians at their very best. Its structure is erratic, impulsive and punctuated with surprises. From the burst like a thunderbolt in opening to the last crash of chords some fifteen minutes later, the orchestra maintained a wonderful and noble height.

This thunderbolt referred to was followed by a sonorous rolling passage which was interpreted with alert sympathy and rhythm. It visualized a brilliant, royal procession. Leaping into a captivating tilt, the melody shot up and burst, like a shooting star, into a veritable rain of surprises. Chord upon chord rang with superb resonance throughout. Under the fervent influence of the musicians the melody flashed and scintillated with [illegible] for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Especially memorable was the ending. A magnificent cluster of chords was followed by a sudden drop. The melody became as demure as a kitten, dying away at last, like a thinning trail of smoke, into the air.

It was a happy thought that moved Dr. Karl Muck, who conducted with a fine vigor and sentiment, to close his concert with Liszt's "Les Preludes." This tone poem, running as it does the gamut of human emotions, was an ideal vehicle. And so it proves. From the first wistful, yearning bars, through the whisper of the violins, denoting love, the sob of the 'cello expressing sorrow, and the light, running frolic that bespoke refined abandon, to the hope, ascendancy and triumphant realization which blazed through the finale, the number was strikingly rich in color, true in its ideal and consistent in structure.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 1915

LOEFFLER MUSIC BY SYMPHONISTS

Boston Orchestra Offers Perfect Rendering of Beethoven and Ravel and Then Play—Loeffler.

WROTE "DEATH OF TINTAGILES"

John Alden Carpenters New Suite, "In a Perambulator," Conducted by Walter Damrosch.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Yes, I knew it. I knew it. We were bound to have him and we got him Saturday. Whom? Where? Charles Martin Loeffler, the Medfield, Mass., meloplasterer, at Carnegie Hall, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conducting. First there came an hour of delightful music, the Eighth of Beethoven and a delicate and delicious suite by the modernist Ravel, and then, crash, thunder, the 'Ercles vein, torn cats, all split, mingled with the pathetico-slobber, the pomposo-magnificent, and the mystico-plangent. This was "The Death of Tintagiles," a symphonic poem by the composer I have just mentioned. It is a peculiarity of modern writers of music who have nothing to say that they require a long time and a lot of new or far-fetched instruments in which to say it.

There was a time when Mr. Loeffler called for two violes d'amour and a double bass clarinet as among the weapons wherewith he accomplished the death of Tintagiles. He has since modified these plethoric demands. When one notices the fantastic and affected instrumentation of many of the latter-day composers, one thinks of what Beethoven did with an old-fashioned orchestra, and one shrugs one's shoulders. Indeed I feel that Beethoven could make an appeal to us greater than most of the "new" writers, with a concerto written for two jewsharps and a fireplug. Do not think I am scurrilous.

Justifiable Anger.

I am only angry. Like Figaro in Beaumarchais's comedy, I am only laughing so that I should not cry. Here is the most beautiful orchestra in all the world, led by a master, devoting a substantial fraction of the twenty short but long-awaited hours that they vouchsafe to New York to musical moonshine like "The Death of Tintagiles." What are we to Tintagiles, or Tintagiles to us, that we should weep for him? Flat-chested women from Natick and lonely matrons from Jamaica Plains may work themselves into mediaeval brain jags over Bellangere, and Ygraine, and Volauvent and other such Maeterlinckian characters, as interpreted by Mr. Loeffler.

We are made of sterner stuff. And as I struggled through Mr. Loeffler's endless ploddings and ineffectual pluckings at the fleeing skirts of a sullen and disdainful Muse yesterday I ventured to conclude that he had been successful in at least one thing. He had added another character to the poetic list of Maeterlinck's mellifluously named heroines. Mr. Loeffler's contribution is Mygraine. Again I am laughing, jeering, so that I should not cry.

Boston Cunning.

I have no doubt that half Boston pester Dr. Muck to play Loeffler—he is an acclimatized exotic there—while the other half dexterously and maliciously suggest that he should play Loeffler in New York, so that they should have the double pleasure of avoiding him themselves and inflicting him on us.

To speak plainly, this composition depressed the audience from the mood of exaltation and pleasurable excitement to which Beethoven and Ravel had roused them. We fidgeted, imprecated, studied the etymology of the word Pavane, and hoped that Mr. Loeffler had finally perorated. Some slept. But not I. Why not? Sleep also is a criticism.

[40]

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 6 - 1915

MELBA NIGHT AT SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra and Prima Donna Divide Honors.

SINGER IN FINE VOICE

Dr. Karl Muck Leads His Musicians Ably as Ever.

When the curtain went up every seat was occupied and there were three tiers of standees at the back. Dr. Karl Muck was in his accustomed place and responded cordially to the enthusiastic greeting of the large audience. Madame Melba, the soloist of the evening, was in fine voice and most gracious mood, and returned half a dozen times after each number to thank her admirers for their appreciation.

The first number on the program was Beethoven's Symphony in F Major, No. 8, in four movements, for which the orchestra received long continued applause. Then Melba made her appearance, looking incredibly young and handsome in a gown of rose satin and silver. She sang "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from Handel's "L'Allegro, il Pensero ed il Moderato," with flute obligato by Andre Maquarre. The selection was an admirable one for the exposition of the peculiarly bird-like tones of her voice and she seemed, in truth, the bird of which she sang. She quite brought down the house at the close, but refused to take the calls alone and smilingly thrust Mr. Maquarre to the front of the stage.

The most charming number on the program was Loeffler's "Le Mort de Tintagiles," the dramatic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck. It is a fairy tale full of danger and adventure which the music, exquisite in its softness and magnificent in volume, epxressed faithfully. One could feel keenly the despair of poor little Tintagiles and the anxiety of his helpless sister and finally his death and her hopeless despair.

The second time Melba appeared she gave two arias from "The Marriage of Figaro—"Porgi Amor" and "Voi, Che sapete"—by Mozart. The latter had that peculiarly soft, yet inspiring quality of church music and was a delightful contrast to the rest of the program. The last orchestral number was the symphonic poem by Liszt, "Les Preludes," after Lamartine.

The orchestra has lost none of its old-time eloquence and perfection and Dr. Muck's masterly handling of his players still stands supreme. The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be given Friday evening, December 5, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn N. Y.
Date NOV 6 - 19

and "Policeman."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck and Melba Warmly Welcomed at Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music last evening, with a gorgeous programme and a glorious house, every seat in the Academy having been sold for the concert. Last night, the standees at the back were unusually numerous and the house was extremely demonstrative. The programme opened with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, op. 93, which, of its composer's least impressive works has yet a charm and buoyancy about its second movement and a grace in its minuet which makes it worth more frequent hearings than conductors are wont to accord to it. Its beauty last night was enhanced by the lovely tone of the wood winds, which are prominent in the second movement and by the exquisite precision which marks all the work of this orchestra.

The novelty of the programme was an orchestral setting or interpretation of Maeterlinck's "The Death of Tin-long a member of the [illegible] recognized in America as a leader of the modern French school of music. He has not attempted to follow the scenes of the play, but has created in tone a mood picture similar to the one which the poet astablished by his drama. The work opens with a passage representing the storm in which the drama is set, but it passes soon to the sorrow, fear and mystery which are the dominating qualities of the drama. These moods it publishes with a power lacking in the words upon the printed page and with an appeal of which the text of the drama has little. That may be due to the fact that the musician works in beautiful tone while some of the images of the poet, like the description of the fat Queen, are repulsive as well as terrible. In imagination the musician rises eagerly to meet the spirit of the most imaginative poet of our time and he proclaims his visions with authority through the use of the full resources of the modern orchestra. And Mr. Loeffler does not find it necessary to be tuneless on order to be impressive. His work seems, indeed, on a single hearing, to be one of the masterpieces of contemporary music, and it is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will give it to us again without too long an interval.

[illegible] highly imaginative

Perhaps the warmest welcome of the evening was accorded to Mme. Melba, who has found the fountain of perpetual youth and has come back to sing to us the music of Handel and Mozart, not merely with exquisite art but with a voice as fresh and sweet as when she first came among us. Handel's duets with the flute have grown to sound archaic, but the perfect ease and the exquisite purity of tone with which Melba sang the "Sweet Bird" roused the audience to enthusiasm. Even more lovely were the two songs from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," in which the Mozart legato was as perfectly sung as the Handelian trills had been. This opera is associated with some of the best singing of recent years in the opera house, but it is many a day since the "Voi che Sapete" has been sung there as it was sung last night. The tights of Cherubino are seldom combined with a vocal skill which can do full justice to this lovely lyric.

The programme closed with the always welcome symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, to which the orchestra brought a glorious fullness of noble tone at the climax.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date OV 7 1915

Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a notably beautiful reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Ravel's "Ma Mère L'Oye," Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," founded on the Maeterlinck play and Liszt's familiar symphonic poem "Preludes," completed a programme to which the greatest orchestra in the world gave full exppression.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

LECTURES ON MUSIC.

W. J. Henderson Talks at Academy on Concert's Programme.

W. J. Henderson lectured yesterday afternoon before the Brooklyn Institute on the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening at the first philharmonic concert of the season at the Academy of Music. Mr. Henderson devoted the major part of his lecture to a consideration of the dramatic poem "Le Mort de Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, after the drama by Maeterlinck.

He gave a resume of the symphonic poem, relating the quaint, fanciful little story of the legendary boy, his sisters and the hideous Queen, and said that it was a picture of the striving soul of the boy. How the themes typified this was pointed out by Mr. Henderson, and parts of the symphonic poem were played by two young women, Miss Clara Rabinowitz and Miss Marion Kahn, who presented four-handed arrangement of the music, which had been prepared under the personal direction of the composer, Mr. Loeffler. Mr. Henderson said that Loeffler is an aristocrat in his composition, and though considered by many to be a disciple of the French school, has in reality a distinct individuality of his own.

The latter part of the lecture touched upon the eighth or "little" symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Henderson told an interesting story of the tempos in which the movements were first played till Hans von Bulow, the conductor, played the symphony with a striking contrast in rythm. He became personally acquainted with Von Bulow and from him learned that he had received his knowledge of the right tempo from some one who played with Spohr, who had it direct from Beethoven.

Mr. Henderson did not discuss Liszt's "Les Preludes," which will be the last number on to-night's programme, saying that this composition was too familiar to need explanation.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat uns im geſtrigen Nachmittagskonzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters eine Beethoven'ſche Siebente geſchenkt, die wie ein feuriger Hymnus durch den vollen Saal rauſchte. Mit gebührender Betonung der wechſelnden Lichter, die ſelbſt in dieſer friedlichen Symphonie nicht ſelten dem Düſteren zuneigen, führte er uns den feſtlichen Grundcharakter dieſes Werkes mit überzeugender Kraft und Feinheit vor. Das Finale überbot ſich förmlich an Steigerungen, um in unbeſchreiblich heller Pracht zu enden. Beifallsſtürme, wie man ſie bei Konzerten nicht allzuhäufig hört, brauſten durch den Saal, und Muck mußte viermal für den Beifall danken. Das wundervolle Orcheſter hat ſich wieder einmal mit Ruhm bedeckt.

Den Liszt'ſchen „Préludes" möchte ich ein beſonderes Plätzchen einräumen. Seit vielen Jahren ſchon iſt es ſozuſagen Mode geworden, über dieſes Werk des großen Weimaraners achſelzuckend hinwegzugehen oder etwas von „Gartenkonzertmuſik" und dergleichen in den Bart zu murmeln. Ich habe jederzeit an meiner hohen Meinung von dieſem anmuthenden, ſo berückend romantiſchen Werke feſtgehalten. Den Gegnern aber möchte ich wünſchen, daß ſie eine Wiedergabe der „Préludes" zu hören bekommen, wie ſie geſtern die Boſtoner unter Muck oder ſonſt die Philharmoniker unter Stransky zu bieten vermögen; die Herren würden dann zugeben, daß ſogar ein edles Werk von minder gelungenen minderwerthigen Wiedergaben verunglimpft werden könne, daß Ausarbeitungen, die mit künſtleriſchen Mitteln, Schwung und Liebe arbeiten, wie die erwähnten aber Schönheiten und Feinheiten darthun, die wie unerwartet zu Tage treten und den wahren Geiſt der Schöpfung offenbaren. Es war eine Leiſtung, für die man Muck und ſeinen Meiſterſpielern wirklich dankbar ſein mußte.

Löffler's „Der Tod des Tintagiles" iſt ein mit hohem Streben und prächtigem Rüſtzeug arbeitendes Werk, das ich den beſten Schöpfungen unſerer amerikaniſchen Komponiſten zuzählen möchte. Ich finde in dieſer Muſik eine Ehrlichkeit, eine Hoheit des Wollens und Strebens und eine kräftige und ſtellenweiſe inſpirirte Mache, die nur ein wirklich hochbegabter Muſiker zu erreichen vermag. So geſpielt wie geſtern iſt das Werk ſeiner Wirkung jederzeit ſicher.

Ravel's Suite „Ma Mère l'Oye", urſprünglich als Kinderſpiel für Piano geſchrieben, 1912 zu einem Ballet umgearbeitet, iſt kleine Muſik. Es fehlt mir darin die mitſchwingende Note des Kindlichen und Märchenhaften. Es iſt ein ſtellenweiſe effektvolles Tonſpiel mit hübſchen Orcheſtereffekten und kleinen Ueberraſchungen, nicht viel mehr als eine pikante Sauce für einen etwas mageren Braten. Das Publikum ſchien an der herrlichen Wiedergabe durch unſere Gäſte viel Gefallen zu finden, daß es dieſe Muſik ſchön befunden habe, das erlaube ich mir aber zu bezweifeln.

H.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 2 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

As in former years the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, its leader, will appear three times at Parsons's theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15th, December 13th and March 27th.

The wonderful success of this organization is not by accident or ~~much advertising~~ but is the result of constant effort to attain perfection regardless of expense. Thirty-five years of constant work have developed an ensemble probably never before realized and with Dr. Muck's genius for interpretation the performances of the great master works is well nigh perfect.

The demand for these concerts from every quarter of the country makes a continuance of the Hartford concerts more and more uncertain and the public should take advantage of every opportunity to hear these musicians. The sale of reserved seats for the series of three concerts continues until Saturday when seats for the first concert will be sold at Gallup & Alfred's store.

k, 1884

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 191

Established:

Boston Orchestra Gives First Con

By Sylvester Rawlin

DR. KARL MUCK and the Symphony Orchestra m first appearance for the season at Carnegie Hall last night before a crowded house that paid well deserved tribute to the conductor and to the unexcelled band that he directs. There was no soloist. The programme consisted of Brahms's fourth symphony, unloved by many, but played so superbly that even the most indifferent of hearers of Brahms was enthralled; Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." It was too long by at least fifteen minutes and might well have ended with the Strauss work, a stunning exposition of virtuosity by the players and of masterful direction by the conductor, and of genius by the composer. The orchestra was made to share with Dr. Muck the tribute of the most select and discriminating audience of music lovers that New York possesses.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915

Established:

Music.

Boston Symphony Orch
New Singer in "Carm

Not for years has there more delightful programme given at Carnegie Hall last night by the organization that is now probably the premier orchestra of the world. With Dr. Muck's interpretations there is seldom occasion to find fault. But there have been times when the combinations of works he saw fit for us to hear have been accepted with a wry face. It never made any difference in the size of the audience, of course. To procure a seat for these concerts is an achievement rather than a purchase.

This time, however, the austere Dr. Muck relented and gave us a perfectly balanced programme that was a joy to be remembered. And how that magnificent orchestra did play! It was not the first time by any means that it has done Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Dr. Muck shows that a scholarly reverence for the classics is quite compatible with a love for this work, as it seems to have a particular attraction for him. The way it was played last night was an inspiration, a revelation of overwhelming tonal beauty. The exquisite, limpid quality of sound that issued from the brass and wood wind choirs was a thing to cherish. Never has this tremendous work been so magnificently delivered.

It is impossible to say anything new of Dr. Muck's readings of Brahms. The playing of the E minor symphony was vivified perfection. It was such as to cause the listener to wonder what could be the aural ailments of those who proclaim Brahms's music academic or dry. Academic—fudge! Simply because a composer has a perfect sense of form and shows himself the master, according to Goethe's definition, by respecting its bounds, to call him academic is absurd with the sounds of any of his symphonies still ringing in the ears. As rendered last night it was a well of ravishing melody. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the "Husitska" overture of Dvorak completed the programme.

Twice did the men from Boston have to rise from their chairs and acknowledge the audience's well-timed enthusiasm. Throughout the entire evening not a single phrase, not a passage, but was uttered with eloquence and perfection of balance.

From OURANT
Address tford, Conn
Date OCT 31 191

Establis

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Monday evenings, November 1 December 13 and March 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conduct by Dr. Karl Muck, will give concer in Parsons Theater. It is doubtful any other musical organization h ever attained the popularity or arti tic excellence of the world famo Boston Orchestra and its manageme has but to choose the cities where the season's quota of 110 concerts shall be given, for the demand comes from all the larger cities, East and West. The fact that the Hartford public have for many years supported and enjoyed these entertainments is the chief reason for the continuance of the series. The advantages of larger auditoriums in other communities would mean much to the management. The limited number of reserved seats in Parsons Theater should be entirely taken before the end of the present

---

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Est

contrary.

* * *

The first of the five concerts whic Boston Symphony Orchestra is to in Philadelphia the coming se comes to-morrow (Monday eve November 1, in the Academy of There will be no soloist, but Dr. has arranged a program of u interest.

The Symphony will be Brahms' minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Brahms..Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98.
Schumann...............Overture, "Manfred"
R. Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Liszt......Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra, at its concerts this week, will present the first novelty, playing, probably for the first time in America, Schoenberg's "Kammer-Symphonie." As to the merits of Schoenberg's music in general, the musical world is much divided. Having developed an almost absolutely new harmonic scheme, Schoenberg has produced some works which have been readily accepted, and other works which have been condemned with vitriolic intensity.

The other orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, of which no comment need be made, as it was played here last year. The soloist will be Mischa Elma, who is very popular here, and the composition which he will play will be the Goldmark concerto in A Minor, one of the most grateful and pleasing works written for the violin.

* * *

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

Estab

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven, Ravel, Loeffler, and Liszt Heard at Its Concert.

The afternoon subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts heard an interesting recital yesterday in Carnegie Hall in which the matters of greatest significance were Beethoven's Seventh Sympho and Charles Martin Loeffler's drama tone poem, "Le Mort de Tintagile There were also Maurice Ravel's sui "Ma Mère l'Oye," five "childre pieces," as the composer had ca them, based on fairy stories, for French Mother Goose differs from o in that she tells of the "Sleep Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "E press of the Pagodes," and "Bea and the Beast."

These pieces are a rearrangement orchestra of a set of duets for c dren, and were first played here by Damrosch three years ago. They w thought then to be moderately amus with some delicately charming effec orchestration, and some others that laboriously sought out and elaborately artificial.

The musical ideas on which they are based seemed then thin, and on a rehearing they seem even thinner; they are made plausible only through the ingenuities of the instrumental color in which they are presented. Indeed, it was a work of supererogation for Mr. Ravel, who has done so much that is of substantial originality, to spend his time making over these little pieces.

Mr. Loeffler's noble and tragically conceived tone poem has been heard here several times. It makes a profounder impression on repeated hearing, though its sustained imagination, its eloquent expression, the strong fibre of its musical substance and the remarkable finish and complete mastery of its workmanship, both as regards the form and the orchestration. Mr. Loeffler has intended his music to suggest to his listeners the grewsome story set forth in Maeterlinck's play; but he has not attempted to follow closely its incidents or its successive scenes; his music, therefore, moves, and is developed with freedom and unfettered power, as music; and speaks as such, even while it suggests the human passion, the vain struggle against fate, the terror, the agony that are the subjects of the drama.

It is music of high imagination and substantial and lasting beauty. The part for the viola d'amore, which symbolizes the timid, plaintive, pathetic child, was played in a masterly manner with much beauty of tone by Emil Férir, first viola player of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck's playing of Beethoven's Symphony had great beauties, as its rich, translucent tonal color, the clearness with which the melodic lines were drawn, and the plasticity of the phrasing, and especially the vigorous and unfailing rhythmic feeling. Some may have thought the tempo of the allegretto somewhat slow. The concert ended with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

184

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915

Establi

Last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony players began the thirtieth season of their visit to New York in this the thirty-fifth season of their existence.

Dr. Muck led his well attuned choirs easily through Brahm's Fourth Symphony, and the most melodious movements, the second and third, won the greatest favor.

The second part of the programme opened with Schumann's gloomy Manfred overture, and reached its climax in the superb crescendo of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which has never been done more masterly. Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," spoke eloquently for the noble Bohemians and brought the concert to a close.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 5 - 1915

Establish

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

W. J. Henderson Dwells Chiefly on the Loeffler Dramatic Poem.

W. J. Henderson, musical critic of the New York Sun, lectured yesterday afternoon before the Brooklyn Institute on the programme which the Boston Sympony Orchestra will play this evening at the first Philharmonic concert of the season at the Academy of Music. He devoted the major part of his lecture to a consideration of the dramatic poem, "Le Mort de Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, after the drama by Maeterlinck, giving a resume of the symphonic poem, relating the quaint fanciful little story of the legendary boy, his sisters and the hideous queen. He said that it was a picture of the striving of the soul of the boy and the themes typifying the striving were pointed out by Mr. Henderson.

Parts of the symphonic poem were played by two young women, Miss Clara Rabinowitz and Miss Marion Kahn, who presented a four-handed arrangement of the music, which had been prepared under the personal direction of the composer. Mr. Henderson said that Loeffler is an aristocrat in his composition and, though considered by many to be a disciple of the French school, he has distinct individuality.

The latter part of the lecture touched upon the eighth or "little" symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Henderson told an interesting story of the tempos in which the movements were first played till Hans von Buelow, the conductor, played the symphony with a striking contrast in rhythm. He became personally acquainted with von Buelow and frim him learned that he had received his knowledge of the right tempo from some one who played with Spohr, who had it direct from Beethoven. The speaker did not discuss Liszt's "Les Préludes," the last number on to-night's programme, saying that it is too familiar to need explanation.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 5 - 1915

Est

WELCOME BOSTONIANS!

The first of that series of events for which the Academy of Music is always sold out to the last seat, occurs tonight. The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Brooklyn for another concert season after a transcontinental tour from ocean to ocean. And the West has reaffirmed what the East has long known, that in the Boston orchestra we possess a national institution.

With a German leader, an Australian prima donna and a body of musicians drawn from all lands where music is revered, tonight's programme will attest the universality of art, that supreme expression of human genius which the contending armies are treading under foot. Symphonic music is the highest form of art, and to hear it interpreted by that body of master musicians which visits us tonight is to enjoy one of the ennobling influences reserved to those who dwell in big cities. Brooklyn gives welcome to Dr. Muck and his fellow artists.

884

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its thirtieth season in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, with Brahms's Fourth Symphony. The second movement of this symphony is as fine a thing as Brahms ever wrote—the first movement is somewhat inferior, but full of unusual beauty, but the third and fourth movements, particularly the latter, are among the most uninspired in the Brahms repertoire. The second number was Schumann's beautiful "Manfred" Overture, which is not as often heard, perhaps, as it deserves. The three syncopated chords at the beginning are syncopated to the eye only—unless the conductor follows the courageous example of Gustav Mahler and introduces a cymbal crash on the down beat. But this is only a trifling blemish; most of Schumann's syncopations are real ones, and do not need the eye to help them out. There is much poetic beauty in this overture. The third number was Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration,"

1884

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat uns im geſtrigen Nachmittagskonzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters eine Beethoven'ſche Siebente geſchenkt, die wie ein feuriger Hymnus durch den vollen Saal rauſchte. Mit gebührender Betonung der wechſelnden Lichter, die ſelbſt in dieſer friedlichen Symphonie nicht ſelten dem Düſteren zuneigen, führte er uns den feſtlichen Grundcharakter dieſes Werkes mit überzeugender Kraft und Feinheit vor. Das Finale überbot ſich förmlich an Steigerungen, um in unbeſchreiblich heller Pracht zu enden. Beifallsſtürme, wie man ſie bei Konzerten nicht allzuhäufig hört, brauſten durch den Saal, und Muck mußte viermal für den Beifall danken. Das wundervolle Orcheſter hat ſich wieder einmal mit Ruhm bedeckt.

Den Liszt'ſchen „Préludes" möchte ich ein beſonderes Plätzchen einräumen. Seit vielen Jahren ſchon iſt es ſozuſagen Mode geworden, über dieſes Werk des großen Weimaraners achſelzuckend hinwegzugehen oder etwas von „Gartenkonzertmuſik" und dergleichen in den Bart zu murmeln. Ich habe jederzeit an meiner hohen Meinung von dieſem anmuthenden, ſo berückend romantiſchen Werke feſtgehalten. Den Gegnern aber möchte ich wünſchen, daß ſie eine Wiedergabe der „Préludes" zu hören bekommen, wie ſie geſtern die Boſtoner unter Muck oder ſonſt die Philharmoniker unter Stransky zu bieten vermögen; die Herren würden dann zugeben, daß ſogar ein edles Werk von minder gelungenen minderwerthigen Wiedergaben verunglimpft werden könne, daß Ausarbeitungen, die mit künſtleriſchen Mitteln, Schwung und Liebe arbeiten, wie die erwähnten aber Schönheiten und Feinheiten darthun, die wie unerwartet zu Tage treten und den wahren Geiſt der Schöpfung offenbaren. Es war eine Leiſtung, für die man Muck und ſeinen Meiſterſpielern wirklich dankbar ſein mußte.

Löffler's „Der Tod des Tintagiles" iſt ein mit hohem Streben und prächtigem Rüſtzeug arbeitendes Werk, das ich den beſten Schöpfungen unſerer amerikaniſchen Komponiſten zuzählen möchte. Ich finde in dieſer Muſik eine Ehrlichkeit, eine Hoheit des Wollens und Strebens und eine kräftige und ſtellenweiſe inſpirirte Mache, die nur ein wirklich hochbegabter Muſiker zu erreichen vermag. So geſpielt wie geſtern iſt das Werk ſeiner Wirkung jederzeit ſicher.

Ravel's Suite „Ma Mère l'Oye", urſprünglich als Kinderſpiel für Piano geſchrieben, 1912 zu einem Ballet umgearbeitet, iſt kleine Muſik. Es fehlt mir darin die mitſchwingende Note des Kindlichen und Märchenhaften. Es iſt ein ſtellenweiſe effektvolles Tonſpiel mit hübſchen Orcheſtereffekten und kleinen Ueberraſchungen, nicht viel mehr als eine pikante Sauce für einen etwas mageren Braten. Das Publikum ſchien an der herrlichen Wiedergabe durch unſere Gäſte viel Gefallen zu finden, daß es dieſe Muſik ſchön befunden habe, das erlaube ich mir aber zu bezweifeln.

H.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915
Established:

Boston Orchestra Gives First Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made a first appearance for the season at Carnegie Hall last night before a crowded house that paid well deserved tribute to the conductor and to the unexcelled band that he directs. There was no soloist. The programme consisted of Brahms's fourth symphony, unloved by many, but played so superbly that even the most indifferent of hearers of Brahms was enthralled; Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." It was too long by at least fifteen minutes and might well have ended with the Strauss work, a stunning exposition of virtuosity by the players and of masterful direction by the conductor, and of genius by the composer. The orchestra was made to share with Dr. Muck the tribute of the most select and discriminating audience of music lovers that New York possesses.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

…rst of the five concerts whic… Symphony Orchestra is to… adelphia the coming s… to-morrow (Monday eve… er 1, in the Academy of… will be no soloist, but Dr.… anged a program of u…

…ymphony will be Brahms… minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Brahms..Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98.
Schumann..............Overture, "Manfred"
R. Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Liszt......Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra, at its concerts this week, will present the first novelty, playing, probably for the first time in America, Schoenberg's "Kammer-Symphonie." As to the merits of Schoenberg's music in general, the musical world is much divided. Having developed an almost absolutely new harmonic scheme, Schoenberg has produced some works which have been readily accepted, and other works which have been condemned with vitriolic intensity.

The other orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, of which no comment need be made, as it was played here last year. The soloist will be Mischa Elma, who is very popular here, and the composition which he will play will be the Goldmark concerto in A Minor, one of the most grateful and pleasing works written for the violin.

* * *

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 5 - 1915
Establish

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

W. J. Henderson Dwells Chiefly on the Loeffler Dramatic Poem.

W. J. Henderson, musical critic of the New York Sun, lectured yesterday afternoon before the Brooklyn Institute on the programme which the Boston Sympony Orchestra will play this evening at the first Philharmonic concert of the season at the Academy of Music. He devoted the major part of his lecture to a consideration of the dramatic poem, "Le Mort de Tintagiles." by Charles Martin Loeffler, after the drama by Maeterlinck, giving a resume of the symphonic poem, relating the quaint fanciful little story of the legendary boy, his sisters and the hideous queen. He said that it was a picture of the striving of the soul of the boy and the themes typifying the striving were pointed out by Mr. Henderson.

Parts of the symphonic poem were played by two young women, Miss Clara Rabinowitz and Miss Marion Kahn, who presented a four-handed arrangement of the music, which had been prepared under the personal direction of the composer. Mr. Henderson said that Loeffler is an aristocrat in his composition and, though considered by many to be a disciple of the French school, he has distinct individuality.

The latter part of the lecture touched upon the eighth or "little" symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Henderson told an interesting story of the tempos in which the movements were first played till Hans von Buelow, the conductor, played the symphony with a striking contrast in rhythm. He became personally acquainted with von Buelow and frim him learned that he had received his knowledge of the right tempo from some one who played with Spohr, who had it direct from Beethoven. The speaker did not discuss Liszt's "Les Preludes," the last number on to-night's programme, saying that it is too familiar to need explanation.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date
Established:

Music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—New Singer in "Carmen."

Not for years has there been a more delightful programme than that given at Carnegie Hall last night by the organization that is now probably the premier orchestra of the world. With Dr. Muck's interpretations there is seldom occasion to find fault. But there have been times when the combinations of works he saw fit for us to hear have been accepted with a wry face. It never made any difference in the size of the audience, of course. To procure a seat for these concerts is an achievement rather than a purchase.

This time, however, the austere Dr. Muck relented and gave us a perfectly balanced programme that was a joy to be remembered. And how that magnificent orchestra did play! It was not the first time by any means that it has done Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Dr. Muck shows that a scholarly reverence for the classics is quite compatible with a love for this work, as it seems to have a particular attraction for him. The way it was played last night was an inspiration, a revelation of overwhelming tonal beauty. The exquisite, limpid quality of sound that issued from the brass and wood wind choirs was a thing to cherish. Never has this tremendous work been so magnificently delivered.

It is impossible to say anything new of Dr. Muck's readings of Brahms. The playing of the E minor symphony was vivified perfection. It was such as to cause the listener to wonder what could be the aural ailments of those who proclaim Brahms's music academic or dry. Academic—fudge! Simply because a composer has a perfect sense of form and shows himself the master, according to Goethe's definition, by respecting its bounds, to call him academic is absurd with the sounds of any of his symphonies still ringing in the ears. As rendered last night it was a well of ravishing melody. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the "Husitska" overture of Dvorak completed the programme.

Twice did the men from Boston have to rise from their chairs and acknowledge the audience's well-timed enthusiasm. Throughout the entire evening not a single phrase, not a passage, but was uttered with eloquence and perfection of balance.

TIMES
New York City
NOV 7 - 1915

…E BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

…oven, Ravel, Loeffler, and …szt Heard at Its Concert.

…afternoon subscribers to the Bos… …mphony Orchestra's New York …s heard an interesting recital yesterday in Carnegie Hall in which the matters of greatest significance were Beethoven's Seventh Sympho… and Charles Martin Loeffler's drama… tone poem, "Le Mort de Tintagile… There were also Maurice Ravel's sui… "Ma Mère l'Oye," five "childre… pieces," as the composer had ca… them, based on fairy stories, for… French Mother Goose differs from o… in that she tells of the "Sleep… Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "E… press of the Pagodes," and "Bea… and the Beast."

These pieces are a rearrangement… orchestra of a set of duets for c… dren, and were first played here by… Damrosch three years ago. They w… thought then to be moderately amus… with some delicately charming effec… orchestration, and some others that… laboriously sought out and elaborately artificial.

The musical ideas on which they are based seemed then thin, and on a rehearing they seem even thinner; they are made plausible only through the ingenuities of the instrumental color in which they are presented. Indeed, it was a work of supererogation for Mr. Ravel, who has done so much that is of substantial originality, to spend his time making over these little pieces.

Mr. Loeffler's noble and tragically conceived tone poem has been heard here several times. It makes a profounder impression on repeated hearing, though its sustained imagination, its eloquent expression, the strong fibre of its musical substance and the remarkable finish and complete mastery of its workmanship, both as regards the form and the orchestration. Mr. Loeffler has intended his music to suggest to his listeners the grewsome story set forth in Maeterlinck's play; but he has not attempted to follow closely its incidents or its successive scenes; his music, therefore, moves, and is developed with freedom and unfettered power, as music; and speaks as such, even while it suggests the human passion, the vain struggle against fate, the terror, the agony that are the subjects of the drama.

It is music of high imagination and substantial and lasting beauty. The part for the viola d'amore, which symbolizes the timid, plaintive, pathetic child, was played in a masterly manner with much beauty of tone by Emil Férir, first viola player of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck's playing of Beethoven's Symphony had great beauties, as its rich, translucent tonal color, the clearness with which the melodic lines were drawn, and the plasticity of the phrasing, and especially the vigorous and unfailing rhythmic feeling. Some may have thought the tempo of the allegretto somewhat slow. The concert ended with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N Y
Date NOV 5 - 1915

WELCOME BOSTONIANS!

The first of that series of events for which the Academy of Music is always sold out to the last seat, occurs tonight. The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Brooklyn for another concert season after a transcontinental tour from ocean to ocean. And the West has reaffirmed what the East has long known, that in the Boston orchestra we possess a national institution.

With a German leader, an Australian prima donna and a body of musicians drawn from all lands where music is revered, tonight's programme will attest the universality of art, that supreme expression of human genius which the contending armies are treading under foot. Symphonic music is the highest form of art, and to hear it interpreted by that body of master musicians which visits us tonight is to enjoy one of the ennobling influences reserved to those who dwell in big cities. Brooklyn gives welcome to Dr. Muck and his fellow artists.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 2 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

As in former years the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, its leader, will appear three times at Parsons's theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15th, December 13th and March 27th.

The wonderful success of this organization is not by accident or much advertising but is the result of constant effort to attain perfection regardless of expense. Thirty-five years of constant work have developed an ensemble probably never before realized and with Dr. Muck's genius for interpretation the performances of the great master works is well nigh perfect.

The demand for these concerts from every quarter of the country makes a continuance of the Hartford concerts more and more uncertain and the public should take advantage of every opportunity to hear these musicians. The sale of reserved seats for the series of three concerts continues until Saturday when seats for the first concert will be sold at Gallup & Alfred's store.

From COURANT
Address …tford, Conn.
Date OCT 31 1915
Establis…

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Monday evenings, November 15, December 13 and March 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, will give concerts in Parsons Theater. It is doubtful if any other musical organization has ever attained the popularity or artistic excellence of the world famous Boston Orchestra and its management has but to choose the cities where the season's quota of 110 concerts shall be given, for the demand comes from all the larger cities, East and West. The fact that the Hartford public have for many years supported and enjoyed these entertainments is the chief reason for the continuance of the series. The advantages of larger auditoriums in other communities would mean much to the management. The limited number of reserved seats in Parsons Theater should be entirely taken before the end of the present

---

…NG TELEGRAM
…ew York City
NOV 5 - 1915

…ht in Carnegie Hall the Boston …players began the thirtieth season… …ir visit to New York in this …fifth season of their existence. …ck led his well attuned choirs …ough Brahm's Fourth Symphony, …most melodious movements, the …d third, won the greatest favor.

The second part of the programme opened with Schumann's gloomy Manfred overture, and reached its climax in the superb crescendo of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which has never been done more masterly. Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," spoke eloquently for the noble Bohemians and brought the concert to a close.

[41]

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its thirtieth season in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, with Brahms's Fourth Symphony. The second movement of this symphony is as fine a thing as Brahms ever wrote—the first movement is somewhat inferior, but still of unusual beauty, but the third and fourth movements, particularly the latter, are among the most uninspired in the Brahms repertoire. The second number was Schumann's beautiful "Manfred" Overture, which is not as often heard, perhaps, as it deserves. The three syncopated chords at the beginning are syncopated to the eye only—unless the conductor follows the courageous example of Gustav Mahler and introduces a cymbal crash on the down beat. But this is only a trifling blemish; most of Schumann's syncopations are real ones, and do not need the eye to help them out. There is much poetic beauty in this overture. The third number was Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration,"

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat uns im geſtrigen Nachmittagskonzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters eine Beethoven'ſche Siebente geſchenkt, die wie ein feuriger Hymnus durch den vollen Saal rauſchte. Mit gebührender Betonung der wechſelnden Lichter, die ſelbſt in dieſer friedlichen Symphonie nicht ſelten dem Düſteren zuneigen, führte er uns den feſtlichen Grundcharakter dieſes Werkes mit überzeugender Kraft und Feinheit vor. Das Finale überbot ſich förmlich an Steigerungen, um in unbeſchreiblich heller Pracht zu enden. Beifallsſtürme, wie man ſie bei Konzerten nicht allzuhäufig hört, brauſten durch den Saal, und Muck mußte viermal für den Beifall danken. Das wundervolle Orcheſter hat ſich wieder einmal mit Ruhm bedeckt.

Den Liszt'ſchen „Préludes" möchte ich ein beſonderes Plätzchen einräumen. Seit vielen Jahren ſchon iſt es ſozuſagen Mode geworden, über dieſes Werk des großen Weimaraners achſelzuckend hinwegzugehen oder etwas von „Gartenkonzertmuſik" und dergleichen in den Bart zu murmeln. Ich habe jederzeit an meiner hohen Meinung von dieſem anmuthenden, ſo berückend romantiſchen Werke feſtgehalten. Den Gegnern aber möchte ich wünſchen, daß ſie eine Wiedergabe der „Préludes" zu hören bekommen, wie ſie geſtern die Boſtoner unter Muck oder ſonſt die Philharmoniker unter Stransky zu bieten vermögen; die Herren würden dann zugeben, daß ſogar ein edles Werk von minder gelungenen minderwerthigen Wiedergaben verunglimpft werden könne, daß Ausarbeitungen, die mit künſtleriſchen Mitteln, Schwung und Liebe arbeiten, wie die erwähnten aber Schönheiten und Feinheiten darthun, die wie unerwartet zu Tage treten und den wahren Geiſt der Schöpfung offenbaren. Es war eine Leiſtung, für die man Muck und ſeinen Meiſterſpielern wirklich dankbar ſein mußte.

Löffler's „Der Tod des Tintagiles" iſt ein mit hohem Streben und prächtigem Rüſtzeug arbeitendes Werk, das ich den beſten Schöpfungen unſerer amerikaniſchen Komponiſten zuzählen möchte. Ich finde in dieſer Muſik eine Ehrlichkeit, eine Hoheit des Wollens und Strebens und eine kräftige und ſtellenweiſe inſpirirte Mache, die nur ein wirklich hochbegabter Muſiker zu erreichen vermag. So geſpielt wie geſtern iſt das Werk ſeiner Wirkung jederzeit ſicher.

Ravel's Suite „Ma Mère l'Oye", urſprünglich als Kinderſpiel für Piano geſchrieben, 1912 zu einem Ballet umgearbeitet, iſt kleine Muſik. Es fehlt mir darin die mitſchwingende Note des Kindlichen und Märchenhaften. Es iſt ein ſtellenweiſe effektvolles Tonſpiel mit hübſchen Orcheſtereffekten und kleinen Ueberraſchungen, nicht viel mehr als eine pikante Sauce für einen etwas mageren Braten. Das Publikum ſchien an der herrlichen Wiedergabe durch unſere Gäſte viel Gefallen zu finden, daß es dieſe Muſik ſchön befunden habe, das erlaube ich mir aber zu bezweifeln. H.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 2 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

As in former years the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, its leader, will appear three times at Parsons's theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15th, December 13th and March 27th.

The wonderful success of this organization is not by accident or much advertising but is the result of constant effort to attain perfection regardless of expense. Thirty-five years of constant work have developed an ensemble probably never before realized and with Dr. Muck's genius for interpretation the performances of the great master works is well nigh perfect.

The demand for these concerts from every quarter of the country makes a continuance of the Hartford concerts more and more uncertain and the public should take advantage of every opportunity to hear these musicians. The sale of reserved seats for the series of three concerts continues until Saturday when seats for the first concert will be sold at Gallup & Alfred's store.

13

Established: 1884

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1

Boston Orchestr
Gives First Co

By Sylvester Rawli

Established:

DR. KARL MUCK and th Symphony Orchestra ma first appearance for the season at Carnegie Hall last night before a crowded house that paid well deserved tribute to the conductor and to the unexcelled band that he directs. There was no soloist. The programme consisted of Brahms's fourth symphony, unloved by many, but played so superbly that even the most indifferent of hearers of Brahms was enthralled; Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." It was too long by at least fifteen minutes and might well have ended with the Strauss work, a stunning exposition of virtuosity by the players and of masterful direction by the conductor, and of genius by the composer. The orchestra was made to share with Dr. Muck the tribute of the most select and discriminating audience of music lovers that New York possesses.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date NOV

Music.

Boston Symphony Orc
New Singer in "Carm

Established:

Not for years has ther more delightful programme t given at Carnegie Hall last night by the organization that is now probably the premier orchestra of the world. With Dr. Muck's interpretations there is seldom occasion to find fault. But there have been times when the combinations of works he saw fit for us to hear have been accepted with a wry face. It never made any difference in the size of the audience, of course. To procure a seat for these concerts is an achievement rather than a purchase.

This time, however, the austere Dr. Muck relented and gave us a perfectly balanced programme that was a joy to be remembered. And how that magnificent orchestra did play! It was not the first time by any means that it has done Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Dr. Muck shows that a scholarly reverence for the classics is quite compatible with a love for this work, as it seems to have a particular attraction for him. The way it was played last night was an inspiration, a revelation of overwhelming tonal beauty. The exquisite, limpid quality of sound that issued from the brass and wood wind choirs was a thing to cherish. Never has this tremendous work been so magnificently delivered.

It is impossible to say anything new of Dr. Muck's readings of Brahms. The playing of the E minor symphony was vivified perfection. It was such as to cause the listener to wonder what could be the aural ailments of those who proclaim Brahms's music academic or dry. Academic—fudge! Simply because a composer has a perfect sense of form and shows himself the master, according to Goethe's definition, by respecting its bounds, to call him academic is absurd with the sounds of any of his symphonies still ringing in the ears. As rendered last night it was a well of ravishing melody. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the "Husitska" overture of Dvorak completed the programme.

Twice did the men from Boston have to rise from their chairs and acknowledge the audience's well-timed enthusiasm. Throughout the entire evening not a single phrase, not a passage, but was uttered with eloquence and perfection of balance.

From OURANT tford, Conn
Address
Date OCT 31 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Establis

On Monday evenings, November 1 December 13 and March 27, the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra, conducte by Dr. Karl Muck, will give concer in Parsons Theater. It is doubtful any other musical organization h ever attained the popularity or ar tic excellence of the world famo Boston Orchestra and its manageme has but to choose the cities where the season's quota of 110 concerts shall be given, for the demand comes from all the larger cities, East and West. The fact that the Hartford public have for many years supported and enjoyed these entertainments is the chief reason for the continuance of the series. The advantages of larger auditoriums in other communities would mean much to the management. The limited number of reserved seats in Parsons Theater should be entirely taken before the end of the present

14

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Est 1884

contrary.

* * *

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Philadelphia the coming season, comes to-morrow (Monday evening), November 1, in the Academy of Music. There will be no soloist, but Dr. Muck has arranged a program of unusual interest.

The Symphony will be Brahms' in E minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Brahms..Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98.
Schumann..............Overture, "Manfred"
R. Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Liszt......Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra, at its concerts this week, will present the first novelty, playing, probably for the first time in America, Schoenberg's "Kammer-Symphonie." As to the merits of Schoenberg's music in general, the musical world is much divided. Having developed an almost absolutely new harmonic scheme, Schoenberg has produced some works which have been readily accepted, and other works which have been condemned with vitriolic intensity.

The other orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, of which no comment need be made, as it was played here last year. The soloist will be Mischa Elma, who is very popular here, and the composition which he will play will be the Goldmark concerto in A Minor, one of the most grateful and pleasing works written for the violin.

* * *

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven, Ravel, Loeffler, and Liszt Heard at Its Concert.

Estab 1884

The afternoon subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts heard an interesting recital yesterday in Carnegie Hall in which the matters of greatest significance were Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Charles Martin Loeffler's dramatic tone poem, "Le Mort de Tintagiles." There were also Maurice Ravel's suite, "Ma Mère l'Oye," five "children's pieces," as the composer had called them, based on fairy stories, for the French Mother Goose differs from ours in that she tells of the "Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Empress of the Pagodes," and "Beauty and the Beast."

These pieces are a rearrangement for orchestra of a set of duets for children, and were first played here by Mr. Damrosch three years ago. They were thought then to be moderately amusing, with some delicately charming effects of orchestration, and some others that are laboriously sought out and elaborately artificial.

The musical ideas on which they are based seemed then thin, and on a rehearing they seem even thinner; they are made plausible only through the ingenuities of the instrumental color in which they are presented. Indeed, it was a work of supererogation for Mr. Ravel, who has done so much that is of substantial originality, to spend his time making over these little pieces.

Mr. Loeffler's noble and tragically conceived tone poem has been heard here several times. It makes a profounder impression on repeated hearing, though its sustained imagination, its eloquent expression, the strong fibre of its musical substance and the remarkable finish and complete mastery of its workmanship, both as regards the form and the orchestration. Mr. Loeffler has intended his music to suggest to his listeners the grewsome story set forth in Maeterlinck's play; but he has not attempted to follow closely its incidents or its successive scenes; his music, therefore, moves, and is developed with freedom and unfettered power, as music; and speaks as such, even while it suggests the human passion, the vain struggle against fate, the terror, the agony that are the subjects of the drama.

It is music of high imagination and substantial and lasting beauty. The part for the viola d'amore, which symbolizes the timid, plaintive, pathetic child, was played in a masterly manner with much beauty of tone by Emil Férir, first viola player of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck's playing of Beethoven's Symphony had great beauties, as its rich, translucent tonal color, the clearness with which the melodic lines were drawn, and the plasticity of the phrasing, and especially the vigorous and unfailing rhythmic feeling. Some may have thought the tempo of the allegretto somewhat slow. The concert ended with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915

Establis

Last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony players began the thirtieth season of their visit to New York in this the thirty-fifth season of their existence.

Dr. Muck led his well attuned choirs easily through Brahm's Fourth Symphony, and the most melodious movements, the second and third, won the greatest favor.

The second part of the programme opened with Schumann's gloomy Manfred overture, and reached its climax in the superb crescendo of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which has never been done more masterly. Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," spoke eloquently for the noble Bohemians and brought the concert to a close.

GLE
N. Y.
NOV 5 - 1915

SYMPHONY LECTURE.

nderson Dwells Chiefly on the effler Dramatic Poem.

Henderson, musical critic of York Sun, lectured yesterday afternoon before the Brooklyn Institute on the programme which the Boston Sympony Orchestra will play this evening at the first Philharmonic concert of the season at the Academy of Music. He devoted the major part of his lecture to a consideration of the dramatic poem, "Le Mort de Tintagiles." by Charles Martin Loeffler, after the drama by Maeterlinck, giving a resume of the symphonic poem, relating the quaint fanciful little story of the legendary boy, his sisters and the hideous queen. He said that it was a picture of the striving of the soul of the boy and the themes typifying the striving were pointed out by Mr. Henderson.

Parts of the symphonic poem were played by two young women, Miss Clara Rabinowitz and Miss Marion Kahn, who presented a four-handed arrangement of the music, which had been prepared under the personal direction of the composer. Mr. Henderson said that Loeffler is an aristocrat in his composition and, though considered by many to be a disciple of the French school, he has distinct individuality.

The latter part of the lecture touched upon the eighth or "little" symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Henderson told an interesting story of the tempos in which the movements were first played till Hans von Buelow, the conductor, played the symphony with a striking contrast in rhythm. He became personally acquainted with von Buelow and frim him learned that he had received his knowledge of the ight tempo from some one who played with Spohr, who had it direct from Beethoven. The speaker did not discuss Liszt's "Les Preludes," he last number on to-night's programme, saying that it is too familiar o need explanation.

EAGLE
ss Brooklyn, N Y
NOV 5 - 1915

884

WELCOME BOSTONIANS!

he first of that series of events for ch the Academy of Music is al-'s sold out to the last seat, occurs ght. The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Brooklyn for another concert season after a transcontinental tour from ocean to ocean. And the West has reaffirmed what the East has long known, that in the Boston orchestra we possess a national institution.

With a German leader, an Australian prima donna and a body of musicians drawn from all lands where music is revered, tonight's programme will attest the universality of art, that supreme expression of human genius which the contending armies are treading under foot. Symphonic music is the highest form of art, and to hear it interpreted by that body of master musicians which visits us tonight is to enjoy one of the ennobling influences reserved to those who dwell in big cities. Brooklyn gives welcome to Dr. Muck and his fellow artists.

EVENING POST
s: New York City

1884

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra ned its thirtieth season in New York night in Carnegie Hall, with hms's Fourth Symphony. The second movement of this symphony is as fine a thing as Brahms ever wrote—the first movement is somewhat inferior, but ill of unusual beauty, but the third and urth movements, particularly the lat-er, are among the most uninspired in he Brahms repertoire. The second number was Schumann's beautiful "Manfred" Overture, which is not as often heard, perhaps, as it deserves. The three syncopated chords at the beginning are syncopated to the eye only—unless the conductor follows the courageous example of Gustav Mahler and introduces a cymbal crash on the down beat. But this is only a trifling blemish; most of Schumann's syncopations are real ones, and do not need the eye to help them out. There is much poetic beauty in this overture. The third number was Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration,"

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Dr. Muck hat uns im geſtrigen Nachmittagskonzert des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters eine Beethoven'ſche Siebente geſchenkt, die wie ein feuriger Hymnus durch den vollen Saal rauſchte. Mit gebührender Betonung der wechſelnden Lichter, die ſelbſt in dieſer friedlichen Symphonie nicht ſelten dem Düſteren zuneigen, führte er uns den feſtlichen Grundcharakter dieſes Werkes mit überzeugender Kraft und Feinheit vor. Das Finale überbot ſich förmlich an Steigerungen, um in unbeſchreiblich heller Pracht zu enden. Beifallsſtürme, wie man ſie bei Konzerten nicht allzuhäufig hört, brauſten durch den Saal, und Muck mußte viermal für den Beifall danken. Das wundervolle Orcheſter hat ſich wieder einmal mit Ruhm bedeckt.

Den Liszt'ſchen „Préludes" möchte ich ein beſonderes Plätzchen einräumen. Seit vielen Jahren ſchon iſt es ſozuſagen Mode geworden, über dieſes Werk des großen Weimaraners achſelzuckend hinwegzugehen oder etwas von „Gartenkonzertmuſik" und dergleichen in den Bart zu murmeln. Ich habe jederzeit an meiner hohen Meinung von dieſem anmuthenden, ſo berückend romantiſchen Werke feſtgehalten. Den Gegnern aber möchte ich wünſchen, daß ſie eine Wiedergabe der „Préludes" zu hören bekommen, wie ſie geſtern die Boſtoner unter Muck oder ſonſt die Philharmoniker unter Stransky zu bieten vermögen; die Herren würden dann zugeben, daß ſogar ein edles Werk von minder gelungenen minderwerthigen Wiedergaben verunglimpft werden könne, daß Ausarbeitungen, die mit künſtleriſchen Mitteln, Schwung und Liebe arbeiten, wie die erwähnten aber Schönheiten und Feinheiten darthun, die wie unerwartet zu Tage treten und den wahren Geiſt der Schöpfung offenbaren. Es war eine Leiſtung, für die man Muck und ſeinen Meiſterſpielern wirklich dankbar ſein mußte.

Löffler's „Der Tod des Tintagiles" iſt ein mit hohem Streben und prächtigem Rüſtzeug arbeitendes Werk, das ich den beſten Schöpfungen unſerer amerikaniſchen Komponiſten zuzählen möchte. Ich finde in dieſer Muſik eine Ehrlichkeit, eine Hoheit des Wollens und Strebens und eine kräftige und ſtellenweiſe inſpirirte Mache, die nur ein wirklich hochbegabter Muſiker zu erreichen vermag. So geſpielt wie geſtern iſt das Werk ſeiner Wirkung jederzeit ſicher.

Ravel's Suite „Ma Mère l'Oye", urſprünglich als Kinderſpiel für Piano geſchrieben, 1912 zu einem Ballet umgearbeitet, iſt kleine Muſik. Es fehlt mir darin die mitſchwingende Note des Kindlichen und Märchenhaften. Es iſt ein ſtellenweiſe effektvolles Tonſpiel mit hübſchen Orcheſtereffekten und kleinen Ueberraſchungen, nicht viel mehr als eine pikante Sauce für einen etwas mageren Braten. Das Publikum ſchien an der herrlichen Wiedergabe durch unſere Gäſte viel Gefallen zu finden, daß es dieſe Muſik ſchön befunden habe, das erlaube ich mir aber zu bezweifeln. H.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 2 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

As in former years the famous Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Karl Muck, its leader, will appear three times at Parsons's theater on Monday evenings as follows: November 15th, December 13th and March 27th.

The wonderful success of this organization is not by accident or much advertising but is the result of constant effort to attain perfection regardless of expense. Thirty-five years of constant work have developed an ensemble probably never before realized and with Dr. Muck's genius for interpretation the performances of the great master works is well nigh perfect.

The demand for these concerts from every quarter of the country makes a continuance of the Hartford concerts more and more uncertain and the public should take advantage of every opportunity to hear these musicians. The sale of reserved seats for the series of three concerts continues until Saturday when seats for the first concert will be sold at Gallup & Alfred's store.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 19

Boston Orchestr
Gives First Co

By Sylvester Rawli

Established:

DR. KARL MUCK and th Symphony Orchestra ma first appearance for the season at Carnegie Hall last night before a crowded house that paid well deserved tribute to the conductor and to the unexcelled band that he directs. There was no soloist. The programme consisted of Brahms's fourth symphony, unloved by many, but played so superbly that even the most indifferent of hearers of Brahms was enthralled; Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's overture "Husitska." It was too long by at least fifteen minutes and might well have ended with the Strauss work, a stunning exposition of virtuosity by the players and of masterful direction by the conductor, and of genius by the composer. The orchestra was made to share with Dr. Muck the tribute of the most select and discriminating audience of music lovers that New York possesses.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 1915

Music.

Boston Symphony Orc
New Singer in "Carm

Established:

Not for years has ther more delightful programme given at Carnegie Hall last night by the organization that is now probably the premier orchestra of the world. With Dr. Muck's interpretations there is seldom occasion to find fault. But there have been times when the combinations of works he saw fit for us to hear have been accepted with a wry face. It never made any difference in the size of the audience, of course. To procure a seat for these concerts is an achievement rather than a purchase.

This time, however, the austere Dr. Muck relented and gave us a perfectly balanced programme that was a joy to be remembered. And how that magnificent orchestra did play! It was not the first time by any means that it has done Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Dr. Muck shows that a scholarly reverence for the classics is quite compatible with a love for this work, as it seems to have a particular attraction for him. The way it was played last night was an inspiration, a revelation of overwhelming tonal beauty. The exquisite, limpid quality of sound that issued from the brass and wood wind choirs was a thing to cherish. Never has this tremendous work been so magnificently delivered.

It is impossible to say anything new of Dr. Muck's readings of Brahms. The playing of the E minor symphony was vivified perfection. It was such as to cause the listener to wonder what could be the aural ailments of those who proclaim Brahms's music academic or dry. Academic—fudge! Simply because a composer has a perfect sense of form and shows himself the master, according to Goethe's definition, by respecting its bounds, to call him academic is absurd with the sounds of any of his symphonies still ringing in the ears. As rendered last night it was a well of ravishing melody. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the "Husitska" overture of Dvorak completed the programme.

Twice did the men from Boston have to rise from their chairs and acknowledge the audience's well-timed enthusiasm. Throughout the entire evening not a single phrase, not a passage, but was uttered with eloquence and perfection of balance.

From
Address ford, Conn
Date OCT 31 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Monday evenings, November 1 December 13 and March 27, the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra, conduc by Dr. Karl Muck, will give concer in Parsons Theater. It is doubtful any other musical organization h ever attained the popularity or ar tic excellence of the world famo Boston Orchestra and its manageme has but to choose the cities where the season's quota of 110 concerts shall be given, for the demand comes from all the larger cities, East and West. The fact that the Hartford public have for many years supported and enjoyed these entertainments is the chief reason for the continuance of the series. The advantages of larger auditoriums in other communities would mean much to the management. The limited number of reserved seats in Parsons Theater should be entirely [illegible] before the end of the present

---

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

contrary.

* * *

The first of the five concerts whi Boston Symphony Orchestra is t in Philadelphia the coming comes to-morrow (Monday ev November 1, in the Academy of There will be no soloist, but Dr has arranged a program of u interest.

The Symphony will be Brahms minor, No. 4, Opus 98. The outstanding number on the second part of the program will be Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The program in its entirety is as follows:—

Brahms..Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Schumann...............Overture, "Manfred"
R. Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Liszt......Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra, at its concerts this week, will present the first novelty, playing, probably for the first time in America, Schoenberg's "Kammer-Symphonie." As to the merits of Schoenberg's music in general, the musical world is much divided. Having developed an almost absolutely new harmonic scheme, Schoenberg has produced some works which have been readily accepted, and other works which have been condemned with vitriolic intensity.

The other orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, of which no comment need be made, as it was played here last year. The soloist will be Mischa Elma, who is very popular here, and the composition which he will play will be the Goldmark concerto in A Minor, one of the most grateful and pleasing works written for the violin.

* * *

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 - 1915

THE BOSTON ORCHESTR

Beethoven, Ravel, Loeffler, Liszt Heard at Its Concert

The afternoon subscribers to the ton Symphony Orchestra's New concerts heard an interesting yesterday in Carnegie Hall in the matters of greatest significance were Beethoven's Seventh Sympho and Charles Martin Loeffler's drama tone poem, "Le Mort de Tintagile There were also Maurice Ravel's sui "Ma Mère l'Oye," five "childre pieces," as the composer had ca them, based on fairy stories, for French Mother Goose differs from o in that she tells of the "Sleep Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "E press of the Pagodes," and "Bea and the Beast."

These pieces are a rearrangement orchestra of a set of duets for c dren, and were first played here by Damrosch three years ago. They w thought then to be moderately amus with some delicately charming effec orchestration, and some others that laboriously sought out and elaborately artificial.

The musical ideas on which they are based seemed then thin, and on a rehearing they seem even thinner; they are made plausible only through the ingenuities of the instrumental color in which they are presented. Indeed, it was a work of supererogation for Mr. Ravel, who has done so much that is of substantial originality, to spend his time making over these little pieces.

Mr. Loeffler's noble and tragically conceived tone poem has been heard here several times. It makes a profounder impression on repeated hearing, though its sustained imagination, its eloquent expression, the strong fibre of its musical substance and the remarkable finish and complete mastery of its workmanship, both as regards the form and the orchestration. Mr. Loeffler has intended his music to suggest to his listeners the grewsome story set forth in Maeterlinck's play; but he has not attempted to follow closely its incidents or its successive scenes; his music, therefore, moves, and is developed with freedom and unfettered power, as music; and speaks as such, even while it suggests the human passion, the vain struggle against fate, the terror, the agony that are the subjects of the drama.

It is music of high imagination and substantial and lasting beauty. The part for the viola d'amore, which symbolizes the timid, plaintive, pathetic child, was played in a masterly manner with much beauty of tone by Em Férir, first viola player of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck's playing of Beethoven's Symphony had great beauties, as its rich, translucent tonal color, the clearness with which the melodic lines were drawn, and the plasticity of the phrasing, and especially the vigorous and unfailing rhythmic feeling. Some may have thought the tempo of the allegretto somewhat slow. The concert ended with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date NOV 5 - 19

Last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony players began the thirtieth season of their visit to New York in this the thirty-fifth season of their existence.

Dr. Muck led his well attuned choirs easily through Brahm's Fourth Symphony, and the most melodious movements, the second and third, won the greatest favor.

The second part of the programme opened with Schumann's gloomy Manfred overture, and reached its climax in the superb crescendo of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," which has never been done more masterly. Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," spoke eloquently for the noble Bohemians and brought the concert to a close.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 5 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

W. J. Henderson Dwells Chiefly on the Loeffler Dramatic Poem.

Establish

W. J. Henderson, musical critic of the New York Sun, lectured yesterday afternoon before the Brooklyn Institute on the programme which the Boston Sympony Orchestra will play this evening at the first Philharmonic concert of the season at the Academy of Music. He devoted the major part of his lecture to a consideration of the dramatic poem, "Le Mort de Tintagiles." by Charles Martin Loeffler, after the drama by Maeterlinck, giving a resume of the symphonic poem, relating the quaint fanciful little story of the legendary boy, his sisters and the hideous queen. He said that it was a picture of the striving of the soul of the boy and the themes typifying the striving were pointed out by Mr. Henderson.

Parts of the symphonic poem were played by two young women, Miss Clara Rabinowitz and Miss Marion Kahn, who presented a four-handed arrangement of the music, which had been prepared under the personal direction of the composer. Mr. Henderson said that Loeffler is an aristocrat in his composition and, though considered by many to be a disciple of the French school, he has distinct individuality.

The latter part of the lecture touched upon the eighth or "little" symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Henderson told an interesting story of the tempos in which the movements were first played till Hans von Buelow, the conductor, played the symphony with a striking contrast in rhythm. He became personally acquainted with von Buelow and frim him learned that he had received his knowledge of the right tempo from some one who played with Spohr, who had it direct from Beethoven. The speaker did not discuss Liszt's "Les Préludes," the last number on to-night's programme, saying that it is too familiar to need explanation.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N Y
Date NOV 5 - 1915

WELCOME BOSTONIANS!

The first of that series of events for which the Academy of Music is always sold out to the last seat, occurs tonight. The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Brooklyn for another concert season after a transcontinental tour from ocean to ocean. And the West has reaffirmed what the East has long known, that in the Boston orchestra we possess a national institution.

With a German leader, an Australian prima donna and a body of musicians drawn from all lands where music is revered, tonight's programme will attest the universality of art, that supreme expression of human genius which the contending armies are treading under foot. Symphonic music is the highest form of art, and to hear it interpreted by that body of master musicians which visits us tonight is to enjoy one of the ennobling influences reserved to those who dwell in big cities. Brooklyn gives welcome to Dr. Muck and his fellow artists.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its thirtieth season in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, with Brahms's Fourth Symphony. The second movement of this symphony is as fine a thing as Brahms ever wrote—the first movement is somewhat inferior, but full of unusual beauty, but the third and fourth movements, particularly the latter, are among the most uninspired in the Brahms repertoire. The second number was Schumann's beautiful "Manfred" Overture, which is not as often heard, perhaps, as it deserves. The three syncopated chords at the beginning are syncopated to the eye only—unless the conductor follows the courageous example of Gustav Mahler and introduces a cymbal crash on the down beat. But this is only a trifling blemish; most of Schumann's syncopations are real ones, and do not need the eye to help them out. There is much poetic beauty in this overture. The third number was Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," household word." Dvorak's "Husitska" Overture closed the programme. The latter is comparatively unfamiliar, but deserves to be heard oftener. Hanslick said that certain parts might have been "orchestrated with hatchets, scythes, and battle-maces." This means little nowadays, when the prevailing styles of orchestration are with shrapnel and machine-guns (there is a certain man at present planning a big peace jubilee with choruses of thousands and orchestras of hundreds, with dozens of cannon!!); but there is dramatic force in this overture, which is more than can be said of some modern works which require an orchestra far outnumbering Wagner's Nibelung orchestra.

The concert was conducted by Dr. Muck in his accustomed scholarly manner, about which nothing new can be said. The whole orchestra had to rise in acknowledgment of the applause after the Brahms and Strauss numbers, and Dr. Muck was recalled several times after the Symphony. At the next concerts, December 2 and 4, Fritz Kreisler is announced as the soloist.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date
Established

Brahms Symphony Illumina Recital by Marc

The fourth and last symphony of Johannes Brahms has often been considered the least interesting of the group. It has been dubbed a rehash of old material, an academic exercise without melodic inspiration, a muddy and labored piece of orchestral writing. Last evening the unfairness of such slanders was impressively demonstrated by Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In their hands the work became a masterpiece, simple and spontaneous in its invention, and amazingly lucid in the details of its composition.

If none of the themes can be called truly great, they are all drawn up to the heights of inspiration by Brahms's masterly treatment of their content. In the last movement, for example, he deliberately reminds his hearers that he is working merely upon the unadorned scale of E minor, and that the entire movement is based upon this simple combination of tones.

That such work escapes monotony is largely due to the composer's manifold variations of rhythm. If Brahms had never before shown himself a master of rhythmic relationships, the fourth symphony would establish the fact without room for further argument.

The second half of Dr Muck's opening programme centered in the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss, set in a frame of overtures; Schumann's "Manfred" first and Dvorak's unfamiliar "Husitska" at the end. The latter was a trifle anticlimatic, being construed along conventional lines on a Hussite hymntune, with a fairly obvious use of folk melody and rhythm.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 13,

ARAB MUSIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Early Russian Work Given Admirable Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

Owing to the regrettable indisposition of Mme. Melba her place on the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was taken by Mendellsohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

Why nothing better could be done to enliven an already dull programme is a matter for conjecture.

GROWS FROM FOLK-MELODY

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony, the one composition worthy of serious attention, was admirably played. This is not the mature Rimsky-Korsakoff, but it is none the less music of unmistakable genius and originality. The novelty of the harmonic scheme coloring, [illegible] as Dr. Muck played the work yesterday.

This is music built largely on Oriental folk-themes, for the Arab air which serves as the love-song of the last movement is not the only popular air with which Rimsky-Korsakoff enriched his score. But not only is this music largely based on folk-melody and slavishly dependant upon it; it grows from folk-melody. The harmonies are those suggested by airs of Asiatic origin. It is a new harmonic scheme for which Europe of the 80's was wholly unprepared. How mad this music must have seemed to the Germans when it was performed in Magdeburg for the first time in 1881!

The Spell of the Desert

The "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff is more finely put together than this "Antar" music, but, after the very illuminative reading given yesterday, one wonders whether the music of "Antar," although of earlier inspiration, is not at least as powerful and original as the music to tales of the Arabian nights, even if its technical development is by no means so sure. The spell of the desert, the dreams of those who, as Henley said, would reduce immensity to the limits of desire; the world-weariness of "Antar," who gives up life in a supreme moment of passion because of his indomitable craving for battles and conquests which the world cannot afford—these things are unmistakably and inimitably conveyed by the composer.

The symphony represents a new world of color and musical ideals. Object to its monotony, its lack of true thematic development as one may, and with reason, it still remains wonderful in its emotional suggestion and its gorgeous, pictorial quality, and it represents one of the first compositions in which Russia commenced to find herself, and inaugurate a musical movement which proved in its results one of the most fascinating in the field of modern composition.

Braunfels' Carnival Overture

The novelty of the programme was a carnival overture to the opera, "Die Prinzessin Brambilla," after a tale of E. A. T. Hoffman, by Walter Braunfels, a young German composer now living in Munich. Braunfels, when his opera was heard in 1909, was reproached for his garbling of Hoffman's tale. He answered that in adapting this tale for operatic treatment he had had in mind principally the musical portrayal of the carnival at Rome. When this carnival takes place, the Roman actor Claudio is reconciled with his former mistress, Giazinta, because she, clad in royal costume, appears to him as an image of the imaginary woman, the Princess Brambilla, who has of late obsessed his dreams. The music is in carnival style. The orchestration is heavy and brilliant. The music aims at wit and humor, and is, as a matter of fact, very conventional after the modern German style.

Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs is likewise a dull, routine work, of service only as it displayed the capacities of the wind instrument players of the orchestra, who were warmly applauded for their performance, and for the 4th movement, a melodious slow movement in 12-8 time. Then followed the cheerful irrelevancies of Mendellsohn's overture.

BOSTON GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 13,

"ANTAR" SYMPHONY.

Gorgeously Colored Music Finely Played.

Braunfels' New Carnival Overture Distinguished Chiefly for Noise.

It is nearly 50 years since Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote his symphony "Antar." The name of "symphony" applied to such a work in itself is a sign of romanticism, for it is a suite of four tone pictures in symphonic form. And this was in Russia, a country whose music has had tardy recognition in England and France, to their own loss. While it was in Paris, in the year of grace 1889, that Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor was denied the vote of a director of the Conservatoire because it had a part for the English horn, an instrument he alleged Beethoven had not found it necessary to use.

Yesterday, in the event of Mme Melba's cold, "Antar" was the feature of the concert. Heard under the interpretative hand of Dr Muck and these virtuosi of the orchestra, now this music glows with imagination. What pictorial power, what sweeping force and what dexterity in characterization! How masterfully, with a few strokes of the brush, atmosphere is summoned and moods established!

A man of the North, yet a cosmopolitan by his travel in youth as a naval officer, Rimsky caught the mystery, the flame of the smoldering fires, the pursuing, haunting fragrances, the subtle lure of the Orient, the spell of its langour and its women. Antar, the son Shaldad, was a picturesque subject, albeit that in history he was a mulatto with a split lip. A courageous warrior, exulting in battle, he is the more commanding in the hours of triumph and love. His dream of the three great desires of the heart of man has been treated by the composer impersonally, universally. In the opening scene in the desert passage, in which the hero rescues the gazelle from the winged monster whose wings beat illusively in the scurrying double basses, all men may be seen realizing the joys of revenge, of power and of love.

The first movement is admirable in its subject matter, in its graphic painting, which is not too badly photographed in its illusion and suggestion

The hearer sees with the dreaming Antar, the splendid palace, the voluptuous slaves, who enchant him with the songs and postures, and the fairy, none other than the gazelle he had saved, who promises him the three fruitions.

The second movement of revenge, although not without a sinister element, and the fourth of tragic love are not the equal in invention to the third, a marvelous picture of the pomp, majesty and splendor of Oriental materialism. Opulence and sensuous beauty are in every bar. The performance was one of superb spirit, gorgeous in a wealth of orchestral color.

Walter Braunfels, who now lives in Munich, has written an opera on the subject of E. T. A. Hoffmann's Princess Brambilda. The overture was played yesterday for the first time in Boston. The story was a fantastical one, it is true, but it now becomes evident that the actor Claudio's attachment for the imaginary princess, whom by friendly intervention he is made presently to see in the flesh as the more humble seamstress to whom he already is betrothed, is a volcanic, a cataclysmic affair. Brass instruments, cymbals and tympani are diligent in publishing the details. The true spirit of fantasy is not necessarily boisterousness unless seen through turbulent German eyes.

Handel's concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs, music in accepted Handelian formulas, was played, and in the third movement again afforded the delight of the duet for oboes.

Messrs Longy and Mueller performed in virtuoso fashion and twice bowed their acknowledgments to the audience. Had Braunfel's stormy overture come fourth, Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous" voyage would have been an appropriate benediction.

BOSTON HERALD,

NOVEMBER 13.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN 4TH CONCERT

Severe Cold Prevents Mme. Melba from Singing—Mendelssohn's Overture Added.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphnoy Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony "Antar" .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Carnival Overture to "Princess Brambilla" .... Braunfels
Concerto in F for two wind-choirs and strings .... Handel
Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" .... Mendelssohn

Mme. Melba was expected to sing at this concert airs by Handel and Mozart. Suffering from a severe cold she was unable to appear. Mendelssohn's overture was therefore added to the orchestral compositions that had ben announced.

For the first time in the history of this orchestra the Program Book announced the "Public Rehearsal" as a "concert." The change was welcome. There was a time when the concert of Friday afternoon was a rehearsal. In the earlier years, the conductor would stop the performance to explain or correct. Compositions have been performed on Friday and not repeated on Staurday night. The significance of the phrase "Public Rehearsal" long ago passed away. The orchestra now gives two concerts in a week.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" has not been so popular here as his "Scheherazade." Until yesterday it had been performed only twice while the Suite has been played here six times. Is the popular verdict well founded? When "Antar" was composed (1868) it was years ahead of the time for appreciation. Nevertheless 10 years later Buelow spoke of it as a "gorgeous tone-picture." Liszt thought highly of it. Mr. Nikisch conducted it at Magdebury in 1881 with marked success at a meeting of the Allgemeiner Deutsche Musikverein. It was written in the year that the composer left the marine service of Russia and entered upon what he once described as the most adventurous period of his life. "Associating with students, workingmen, poor artists and vagabonds, I learned the very depths of human miseries and got the first impulse of my best creations. I learned to realize the power of legends and fairy tales."

It is easy to see why the average hearer prefers "Scheherazade" to "Antar." In the first place he knows his "Thousand Nights and a Night," the wondrous tales told by Scheherazade, the adventures of Sinbad, the story of the two Princesses. The music of "Scheherazade" reeks with benzoin, frankincense, all the perfumes of the East. The melodic phrases are more defined, more obvious. There is greater rhythmic piquancy; there is a more sensuous atmosphere; there are sharper contrasts, as that between the marvellously pictorial description of the shipwreck caused by the lodestone mountain and the lyrics of swooning lovers; there is the constant suggestion of the wild tales of cruel jests, sensual beauties of the harem, strange inhabitants of the air, hashish-inspired dreams, terrible revenges, and what Sir Richard F. Burton called "the tedium of the East."

The dominating feature of "Antar" is barbaric splendor. What is Antar to the average hearer or he to Antar? He might ask with the undergraduate: "What are Keats?" Yet this symphony makes a deeper impression with every repetition. The opening measures picture the desert in a manner that Borodin, Goldmark (in his "Queen of Sheba" and Felicien David have not surpassed. Splendid in its ferocity is the second movement, while in the march movement there is the portrayal of triumphant invading hordes. And after this blare and fury and barbaric din, the composer had the courage to end his symphony with amorous strains; to is wildly romantic, highly imaginative, oriental in endless repetitions, music expressed in an instrumentation that is strangely devised and strangely effective.

[42]

After the symphony, the overture of Braunfels seemed noisily empty. The opera "Princess Brambilla" was produced at Stuttgart in 1909. This overture was not published until 1912 and is not found in the edition of the opera for voice and piano. Was it composed after the production of the opera? The title now reads: "Carnival Overture to E. T. A. Hoffmann's 'Princess Brambilla,'" but when the overture was performed at Dresden the program book stated that it was a "Carnival overture to the joyous opera 'Princess Brambilla.'" Braunfels took his libretto from Hoffmann's story; he also took so great liberties with the story that he was roundly abused at the time. He said that his chief object in writing the opera was to picture in tone the Carnival at Rome. Well, one Hector Berlioz did this before him, but more vividly, more musically, and with fewer instruments. Braunfels's overture is not only impotently noisy; it lacks continuity; too much of it is mosaic work; the Carnival spirit quickly disappears. In all probability certain episodes have to do with lovers at the Carnival; but while they chatter, the Carnival itself disappears. Flaubert in "Madame Bovary" did in prose what Braunfels failed to do in music. At the fair that resembled our cattle shows Emma and her Rudolph talked amorously while the exercises were in full blast on the platform; but the one did not cause the other to be forgotten; the two themes were contrapuntally treated.

After all, the performance of Handel's concerto was the feature of the concert. "Mr. George Frideric Handel," Mr. Runciman once wrote, "is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." This concerto is in the true meaning of the word superb. When Handel wrote "Pomposo" on a page, he wrote not idly. What magnificent simplicity in outlines! Nor did he permit technical ability to darken his thought. No wonder that Messrs. Longy and Mueller were twice obliged to bow in response to the applause for their brilliant playing of the oboes. Yet to some the crowning glory of the work itself is the slow movement. For melodic lines of such chaste and noble beauty, such Olympian authority no one has approached Handel. "Within that circle none durst walk but he." His nearest rival is the Chevalier Gluck.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Bruckner, symphony No. 7; Mozart symphonic concerto for violin and viola (Mr. Witek, violin; Mr. Ferir, viola).

ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 13,

CONCERT PURELY ORCHESTRAL EVENT

MME. MELBA ABSENT, BUT ORCHESTRA AT BEST

Concert Came in Like Lion, Went Out Like Lamb, With Quiet Overture

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Rimski-Korsakoff—"Antar" Symphony.
Walter Braunfels—"Princess Brambilla," Carnival Overture.
Handel—Concerto for Two Wind Choirs and String Orchestra.
Mendelssohn—"Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Overture.

It was by pure accident that the tail did not wag the dog yesterday at the Symphony Concert, for Mme. Melba had a severe cold and could not sing, whereupon the orchestra came into its rights again, a vocal recital with a symphonic background was averted, and Mendelssohn's rather faded overture was added to the list instead of a couple of Mozart arias, and Handel's "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of Folly." We were sorry to miss the last-named. We desired to see whether that bird was the double-headed eagle or not.

Speaking in all seriousness we do not care for even the greatest singer at these symphonic concerts. It always jars on the real scheme of these programmes and changes the atmosphere of the concert room to something of the footlight flavor. The public, however, disagree with this idea most emphatically, and the long line of "rush-seaters" which would have stood all the morning for a chance to hear Melba was somewhat diminished by the absence of the famous prima donna, although many of the patient waiters were in ignorance of the change of programme made necessary by inflamed vocal cords.

But we must not forget that there was still an orchestra at this concert. It happened to be the best orchestra in the world, and it played at its best. We had an opportunity of comparing Dr. Muck's reading of a Rimski-Korsakoff score, with Mr. Stransky's interpretation of one, last Sunday. The advantage was with our own conductor, for there was more of elasticity, of abandon and of contrast in the reading of "Antar" than there was in "Scheherazade." There was Oriental programme-music in the one score as in the other. The first movement pictured the mighty hunter Antar, not exactly in the Antarctic regions, but amid the ruins of Palmyra. The ruins were largely occupied by bassoons and trombones, but suddenly an innocent young [illegible] rushed across them, chased by several wicked contrabasses and violoncellos. It was the fairy Ghul-Nazar pursued by the spirits of darkness. What happens when you rescue a fairy? Either you marry her or she gives you some valuable presents. She did the latter to Antar, at once.

She gave him "Revenge," which led to the second movement. Why Antar should take revenge upon the teachers of Harmony is inexplicable, but he did so by violating all their rules. Our kettle-drummer had a strikingly good time, in which he was joined by the cymbals, the gong, the muted horns and several other evils, and there were dissonances that proved that even in symphony (?) a Song of Hate is unpleasant. The fairy also gave Antar "Power." In Russia the only idea of power is military force, and this was present strongly in the movement. But there was a species of "Trio" to this, in which it was evident that some Nautch girls were visiting the trenches. This movement is the best of the entire work. It is absolutely and wonderfully Oriental, and not like the "Turkish March" of Beethoven, or the "Alla Turca" of Mozart, an Orientalism that does not get any further east than Vienna.

The fairy finally gave Antar "Love," and that killed him. She incinerates the hero with a burning kiss, which almost puts Kundry's Parsifal kiss in the shade. This kiss burns Antar up—no insurance. In this last movement, there is a charming duet for English horn and clarinette, which had a most dreamy and tender style, but Antar's Liebestod did not quite rival Isolde's. Nevertheless, there was the best style of modern music in this symphony. It was very free in form for its classical name, but symphony or not, it was original and one felt that some of the Russians have more to say, in music, than some of the Germans of the present, even if the skill of a Strauss, or a Schoenberg, or a Reger, is not yet there. When that comes the sceptre of musical supremacy will go over to Russia. As it is the advance of the Muscovite in tone-coloring has been most rapid and phenomenal, and nowhere can it be better studied than in the works of Rimski-Korsakoff.

Handel's Concerto was in strongest contrast with Antar's antics, and it was refreshing to have some good counterpoint after the fierce dissonances which were so copious in the Russian work. The Handelian composition has been heard here often and is a favorite with our concert auditors.

It had five movements, of which the third was the noblest, although the fourth, with Mr. Witek's violin obbligato, and the fifth, with the splendid work of the two horn soloists, were also very attractive.

In listening to the finale one ought to remember that it was Handel who introduced the horn into the Old English orchestra, and was roundly criticized for it. He also experimented with the harp and the then very crude clarinette, and was in every way the Richard Strauss, possibly even the Richard Wagner, of the 18th century.

We are glad to state that two movements of this concerto, the third and the fifth, were applauded almost to the encore point.

Braunfels' "Princess Brambilla" overture was a novelty. Even the name of this composer is new to our programmes, although of course Mr. Hale managed to give details about him in the programme book. He was born in Frankfort in 1882, and is at present living in Munich.

The Carnival overture stood well between the savagery of Rimski-Korsakoff and the suavity of Handel. It was a modern score with a few classical leanings, and being modern it called for a whole army of tonal forces, everything from a Heckelphone to a regiment of percussive instruments being asked for. As the picture is of a Roman Carnival these latter play a good part in the tumult of festivity. There were a few points that suggested Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine," such as dance rhythms, sudden interruptions, and a chromatic rush, but altogether this overture just escapes being a great work.

And then the concert, which had come in like a lion, went out like a lamb, with Mendelssohn's quiet overture. "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" is a picture of a voyage free from all thoughts of submarines or of British detentions. Its introduction might portray Coleridge's verse:

> "Day after day, day after day,
> We stuck, nor life nor motion,
> As idle as a painted ship
> Upon a painted ocean."

which is more graphic than the Goethe lines on a similar subject which inspired Mendelssohn. It all sounds very innocuous nowadays, the piping of the boatswain on the piccolo, as the wind begins to blow, the motion of the ship, and the blare of trumpets as the vessel comes to land and the voyagers are taken in hand by the emigration commissioners. Mendelssohn seldom triumphed very grandly and we could not help wishing that the ship had been sailed by Richard Strauss, or Reger, or any other modern, who would have warped it up to the wharf with a string of diminished ninths and augmented fifths, on all the brasses fortissimo.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 13

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN EASY PROGRAMME FOR QUIET PLEASURE

Conductor and Orchestra at a High Pitch of Perfection—Rimsky-Korsakov's Pictorial and Poetic "Antar," Mendelssohn's "Sea-Overture" and a Full-Voiced Concerto from Haendel—An Exercise, Besides, in the Journalism of Music

TRULY the way of the conductor with his audiences is hard, especially when they are as variously exacting as the companies that assemble on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck's programme yesterday happened to be as short as the most restless of the elect ladies could ask. It filled indeed only an hour and a half; none the less, faithful to habit, out they went before the final number and that, too, when it was music of Mendelssohn—the old, smooth, "tuneful" music that they profess so much to admire. The other pieces of the day could be heard as easily and tranquilly; from beginning to end the concert was light and "pleasant." Yet in the talk of the intermission as many seemed to repine as to be content. Some found the programme "tame"; others called it "commonplace"; both asked for something more exciting than these "nice" numbers. And so it went. Verily, brethren—and also sisters—a conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is wisest when he goes his own catholic way and seeks not to oscillate between the ever-changing desires of a public of many likings.

In the prevailing calm, there was opportunity to note a change in the programme-book about which, again, opinion was divided. The word "rehearsal," absurd these twenty-five years as applied to the afternoon concerts, has at last disappeared from the official vocabulary of Symphony Hall as it long since vanished from nearly all talk and writing about them. Of course, some objected; in their eyes the change was a "break with the past" and "Boston is a conservative place" and all that sort of thing. To others it was a pleasure to see the management squaring its nomenclature with actualities and doing its share—as it has done in many another instance—to make the ways of Boston with concerts, even in small details, as metropolitan as they should now be. Among the utterly unregenerate, hope rose once more that in a season or two the evening concerts may begin at the normal hour—everywhere else and with all other concerts here—of eight-fifteen.

Upon one point at least all with ears to hear could agree—the perfection of the performance of the four pieces of the day—an uncommon perfection even for Dr. Muck and the orchestra. The tone of the band, in mass, in separate choirs, in individual instruments, was as flawless as fallible men can make it. In clarity, euphony, accent, rhythm and color, the band was beyond praise. For once, it seemed the entirely malleable and supple, the tempered yet eloquent instrument of the conductor's ideal. Whatever the music in hand—Rimsky-Korsakov's pictorial "Antar," Braunfels's new and resounding overture, Händel's old concerto or Mendelssohn's variously voiced sea-piece—it was as sensitive and mirror-like as a photographic plate. In the harmonic and instrumental color that Korsakov has lavished upon the symphonic suite, the orchestra surpassed itself in sheer loveliness, richness and expressiveness of tone. It has never been more opulent of sound than it was in the march movement of "Antar" or more songful than it was in the finale. It missed not one of the abrupt modulations with which Mr. Braunfels has cluttered his new "Carnival Overture" and it gave some of his broad progressions an eloquence hardly intrinsic in them. Mr. Mueller of the wood-winds and Mr. Wendler and Mr. Jaenicke of the horns outdid themselves in virtuosos' skill and in quality of tone in Händel's concerto; while the whole band that it enlisted was a marvellously elastic, luminous and rich-voiced instrument. The conductor and the orchestra almost painted the lily when they added their own smoothness and euphony of tone to the polished surface of Mendelssohn's instrumentation; and not within long memory has the beginning of his sea-piece carried such suggestion of the glassy mystery, the uncanny and penetrating stillness, of absolutely windless waters.

As usual Dr. Muck made all these perfections serve—not his own glory as the inspirer and the finisher of them—but the substance, style and quality of the music that they were uttering. Ebullient Chicagoans and neurotic New Yorkers may object that there is too little of sound and fury in the conductor's version of the second movement of Korsakov's suite wherein Antar tastes the pleasures of revenge. But the force and fire that Dr. Muck gave to it were exactly scaled to the design of the whole performance and the composer in this music is no wild and whirling Slav. Korsakov had measure, even though the "typical" Tschaikovski lacked it. On the other hand, the illusion of pictorial music could hardly go higher than that which Dr. Muck attained in the passages that summon the still expanse of the shining and solitary desert—silence, shimmer and emptiness that penetrate the hearer as they might in such a waste itself. As vivid of suggestion of another sort were the measures at the beginning in which Korsakov would evoke the atmosphere of old legend. The oriental melody that is presumed to imply the amorous fairy, came from the conductor's hand as full of character as it was of tonal loveliness. Under his leading the march of power moved in a large and sober magnificence of rhythm and color; while the love-song and the vaporous measures of the end of the suite caressed the ear and melted the heart with their beauty.

Such performance enhances the beauty, the imagination, the suggestion, the wondrous play of rhythm, harmony and instrumental color in Rimsky-Korsakov's music. It glosses also his shortcomings—less apparent in "Antar" than in almost any other of his familiar music—his fondness for repetition, his occasional emptiness of phrase and halts of imagination; his reliance upon the suggestion of color rather than upon the force of idea. But in "Antar" he escapes most of his limitations and such a performance as that of yesterday gave him luminous wings. The better the news, then, that before the season ends Dr. Muck intends to undertake the companion-piece, "Scheherazade." He has been studying it for long.

The performance of Mendelssohn's sea-overture—one of his few pieces from the smooth surfaces of which the teeth of time still slip way—was as perfectly accomplished. The long introduction is of the fine and enduring poetry of tones; the northern ocean, as with Mendelssohn's other sea-piece, the "Hebrides" overture, quickened his imagination; the "impressionists" of our day might envy him the clouded color, the long, slow, lifeless undulation, the suggestion of uncanny stillness and suspense that rises out of his music of sea-calm. Inert as it should be, it is alive with picture and it was doubly so yesterday as Dr. Muck in turn poetized its illusion. In contrast, how adroit was his ordering of the long advance of the "main body" and the climax of the overture—the elastic quickening of the rhythm, the supple expansion of the succeeding phrases, the gradual heightening of pace and color, the livelier and livelier outflinging of phrase, the warming voice, the rising suspense until at last the soberly sonorous sweep of the close. The whole process was the art of the conductor revealing and animating the art of the composer and the one and the other seemed to join hands in spontaneous perfection.

Once more conductor and orchestra played the familiar concerto for strings and two wind choirs which seems the beginning and the end of Händel's music at the Symphony Concerts unless some singer chances to resurrect an air from his forgotten operas or oratorios. It was very warmly applauded yesterday as it always is when it reappears in the "active repertory"; the virtuosity of orchestra and conductor with music in the ancient style shone out of the performance. Why, then, should not other pieces of Händel be occasionally disinterred and heard likewise at the Symphony Concerts? The old Prussian did not leave a slender musical baggage behind him. To hear more of his music would give pleasure to the many that welcome Händel hardly less than they welcome Bach. As it was, the sonorities of the strings in the rotund phrases and the soberly striding pace that conductor and music both enjoined upon them, told in the first movement; the second was alive again with spirited and songful pattern-weaving; the third brought the glories aforesaid to Mr. Mueller of the English horn—one of the usually unnoted and exceptionally modest virtuosi of the orchestra—and to the whole wood-wind choir; the fourth ran its course in the ample line, the sober progress, the long curve and the deepening harmonies of slow and grave Händelian song; and in the finale, the groups of instruments chattered and raced themselves away in the merry give-and-take of such closing movements in the ancient music. The whole piece was exhilarating in itself—in spite of the Prussian's big-wigged manner—and it was yet more exhilaratingly played. More and more contemporary ears, sated with music that swims in harmonic and instrumental color, hear gladly this music of more naked line—even if it costs them a trifle of effort in comprehension of a comparatively strange matter and manner. The change, though it be a change backward, is grateful.

In a single hearing, at any rate, Mr. Braunfels's overture is no remarkable or interesting piece, nor does it suggest that repetition and study would better the impression. The truth is that a deal of music is written in this world today and has been written ever since music began to be that is all in the day's work for the composer, and that is tonal journalism, so to say, and not tonal literature. It is not a whit more important in itself than a sound and able article in a newspaper or a magazine that the writer accomplishes in the daily exercise of his calling, and there is not a whit more reason why it should be or why it should be expected to be remarkable. There is the same good reason for the playing of it that there is for the printing of the article and not a jot more reason why it should be minutely considered or sedulously remembered. Now and again, some of this music of the daily practice of the composer's profession happens to have notable and lasting quality even as on occasion may the daily work of the journalist in letters. Bach and Mozart, for example, had the genius and the good fortune to glorify and make perennial music of which they surely thought and spoke as "routine stuff." Our generation reads with pleasure the journalism of Sainte-Beuve and Gauthier and our children's children may be doing as much for the journalism of Mr. Brownell or Mr. Moore or even—to keep to music and the theatre—for the articles of Mr. Newman and Mr. Walkey.

Mr. Braunfels's overture belongs to this journalism of music but not, as it seemed yesterday, to the part of it that survives the day on which it appears. According to the programme-book, it was attached to a light opera, "Princess Brambilla," drawn from a like-named tale of Hoffmann, some time after the piece of the theatre had run a brief course on a few German stages. The action of the opera takes place during the carnival in a Rome of the renaissance. The overture would suggest the flicker and flare of the revelling as background to the serio-comic amorous adventures that make the substance of tale and play. It undertakes to do so in the fashion of Munich a few years ago when Strauss was the all-sufficient model for the youngsters. Mr. Braunfels assembles a big Straussian orchestra even to a heckelphone; and he clearly likes to keep as much of it "going" at a given moment as is possible. He writes in the bold and large-voiced Straussian fashion—in broad phrases and with large dependence on his wood-winds and horns when he would be songful; and with much involved polphony and many a stroke of instrumental and harmonic color, when he is laying in background and atmosphere. But, somehow neither ear nor fancy disengages much from the intricacies, and the strokes are often of little effect.

There are plentiful labor and superabundant sound in Mr. Braunfels's piece but little imagination and suggestion. Were it not for the title, it would imply no more than an exercise in orchestral writing in the Straussian manner and the listener may hunt in vain through it for the high spirits or the romantic savor of Roman carnivals as the writers and the composers, from Hoffmann and Berlioz onward, have elected to glorify them. The wonder was that it should have been played at all while such pieces as Balakirev's "Thamar," as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," as Granados's magnificently eloquent "Dante"—to cite only a few examples at the spur of the moment—wait seemingly in vain for performance at the Symphony Concerts. Nor was it quite the practical wisdom of programme-making to place the resounding emptiness of the overture—full though it was of notes—after the rich and ranging imagery, the beauty of substance, the finesse of form, the mastery of workmanship and the poetic illusion of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar." Of late, Dr. Muck's German "novelties" have come off least well of all.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
NOVEMBER 13,

'ANTAR' SYMPHONY AND HANDEL PIECE CONCERT FEATURES

Exceptionally fine playing of the most interesting "Antar" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff, provided the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, admitted at last by the program book to be a concert and not a rehearsal. The symphony makes slow headway in public favor, but is certain to win out on its merits, particularly when those merits are so admirably set forth. It's a beautiful work and well worth more frequent hearing.

Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and strings was a noticeably close second in the honors of the concert. It was played as only this band of players can play and fully merited the most noticeable enthusiasm of the afternoon. The Carnival overture of Braunfels, which was played here for the first time, will doubtless find a resting place on the shelf. It was perhaps well to give it one hearing, but that one was enough. The composer evidently lost sight of his subject and doesn't say what he has to say in an interesting or convincing manner.

Many who have made a sea voyage might well envy Mendelssohn the joy expressed in the "Sea Calm" overture. But doubtless Mendelssohn, like many another, had other trips not quite so agreeable.

suddenly an innocent young flute rushed across them, chased by several "wicked" contrabasses and violoncellos. It was the fairy Ghul-Nazar pursued by the spirits of darkness. What happens when you rescue a fairy? Either you marry her or she gives you some valuable presents. She did the latter to Antar, at once.

She gave him "Revenge," which led to the second movement. Why Antar should take revenge upon the teachers of Harmony is inexplicable, but he did so by violating all their rules. Our kettle-drummer had a strikingly good time, in which he was joined by the cymbals, the gong, the muted horns and several other evils, and there were dissonances that proved that even in symphony (?) a Song of Hate is unpleasant. The fairy also gave Antar "Power." In Russia the only idea of power is military force, and this was present strongly in the movement. But there was a species of "Trio" to this, in which it was evident that some Nautch girls were visiting the trenches. This movement is the best of the entire work. It is absolutely and wonderfully Oriental, and not like the "Turkish March" of Beethoven, or the "Alla Turca" of Mozart, an Orientalism that does not get any further east than Vienna.

The fairy finally gave Antar "Love," and that killed him. She incinerates the hero with a burning kiss, which almost puts Kundry's Parsifal kiss in the shade. This kiss burns Antar up—no insurance. In this last movement, there is a charming duet for English horn and clarinette, which had a most dreamy and tender style, but Antar's Liebestod did not quite rival Isolde's. Nevertheless, there was the best style of modern music in this symphony. It was very free in form for its classical name, but symphony or not, it was original and one felt that some of the Russians have more to say, in music, than some of the Germans of the present, even if the skill of a Strauss, or a Schoenberg, or a Reger, is not yet there. When that comes the sceptre of musical supremacy will go over to Russia. As it is the advance of the Muscovite in tone-coloring has been most rapid and phenomenal, and nowhere can it be better studied than in the works of Rimski-Korsakoff.

Handel's Concerto was in strongest contrast with Antar's antics, and it was refreshing to have some good counterpoint after the fierce dissonances which were so copious in the Russian work. The Handelian composition has been heard here often and is a favorite with our concert auditors.

It had five movements, of which the third was the noblest, although the fourth, with Mr. Witek's violin obbligato, and the fifth, with the splendid work of the two horn soloists, were also very attractive.

In listening to the finale one ought to remember that it was Handel who introduced the horn into the Old English orchestra, and was roundly criticized for it. He also experimented with the harp and the then very crude clarinette, and was in every way the Richard Strauss, possibly even the Richard Wagner, of the 18th century.

We are glad to state that two movements of this concerto, the third and the fifth, were applauded almost to the encore point.

Braunfels' "Princess Brambilla" overture was a novelty. Even the name of this composer is new to our programmes, although of course Mr. Hale managed to give details about him in the programme book. He was born in Frankfort in 1882, and is at present living in Munich.

The Carnival overture stood well between the savagery of Rimski-Korsakoff and the suavity of Handel. It was a modern score with a few classical leanings, and being modern it called for a whole army of tonal forces, everything from a Heckelphone to a regiment of percussive instruments being asked for. As the picture is of a Roman Carnival these latter play a good part in the tumult of festivity. There were a few points that suggested Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine," such as dance rhythms, sudden interruptions, and a chromatic rush, but altogether this overture just escapes being a great work.

And then the concert, which had come in like a lion, went out like a lamb, with Mendelssohn's quiet overture. "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" is a picture of a voyage free from all thoughts of submarines or of British detentions. Its introduction might portray Coleridge's verse:

> "Day after day, day after day,
> We stuck, nor life nor motion,
> As idle as a painted ship
> Upon a painted ocean."

which is more graphic than the Goethe lines on a similar subject which inspired Mendelssohn. It all sounds very innocuous nowadays, the piping of the boatswain on the piccolo, as the wind begins to blow, the motion of the ship, and the blare of trumpets as the vessel comes to land and the voyagers are taken in hand by the emigration commissioners. Mendelssohn seldom triumphed very grandly and we could not help wishing that the ship had been sailed by Richard Strauss, or Reger, or any other modern, who would have warped it up to the wharf with a string of diminished ninths and augmented fifths, on all the brasses fortissimo.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 13

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN EASY PROGRAMME FOR QUIET PLEASURE

Conductor and Orchestra at a High Pitch of Perfection—Rimsky-Korsakov's Pictorial and Poetic "Antar," Mendelssohn's "Sea-Overture" and a Full-Voiced Concerto from Haendel—An Exercise, Besides, in the Journalism of Music

TRULY the way of the conductor with his audiences is hard, especially when they are as variously exacting as the companies that assemble on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck's programme yesterday happened to be as short as the most restless of the elect ladies could ask. It filled indeed only an hour and a half; none the less, faithful to habit, out they went before the final number and that, too, when it was music of Mendelssohn—the old, smooth, "tuneful" music that they profess so much to admire. The other pieces of the day could be heard as easily and tranquilly; from beginning to end the concert was light and "pleasant." Yet in the talk of the intermission as many seemed to repine as to be content. Some found the programme "tame"; others called it "commonplace"; both asked for something more exciting than these "nice" numbers. And so it went. Verily, brethren—and also sisters—a conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is wisest when he goes his own catholic way and seeks not to oscillate between the ever-changing desires of a public of many likings.

In the prevailing calm, there was opportunity to note a change in the programme-book about which, again, opinion was divided. The word "rehearsal," absurd these twenty-five years as applied to the afternoon concerts, has at last disappeared from the official vocabulary of Symphony Hall as it long since vanished from nearly all talk and writing about them. Of course, some objected; in their eyes the change was a "break with the past" and "Boston is a conservative place" and all that sort of thing. To others it was a pleasure to see the management squaring its nomenclature with actualities and doing its share—as it has done in many another instance—to make the ways of Boston with concerts, even in small details, as metropolitan as they should now be. Among the utterly unregenerate, hope rose once more that in a season or two the evening concerts may begin at the normal hour—everywhere else and with all other concerts here—of eight-fifteen.

Upon one point at least all with ears to hear could agree—the perfection of the performance of the four pieces of the day—an uncommon perfection even for Dr. Muck and the orchestra. The tone of the band, in mass, in separate choirs, in individual instruments, was as flawless as fallible men can make it. In clarity, euphony, accent, rhythm and color, the band was beyond praise. For once, it seemed the entirely malleable and supple, the tempered yet eloquent instrument of the conductor's ideal. Whatever the music in hand—Rimsky-Korsakov's pictorial "Antar," Braunfels's new and resounding overture, Händel's old concerto or Mendelssohn's variously voiced sea-piece—it was as sensitive and mirror-like as a photographic plate. In the harmonic and instrumental color that Korsakov has lavished upon the symphonic suite, the orchestra surpassed itself in sheer loveliness, richness and expressiveness of tone. It has never been more opulent of sound than it was in the march movement of "Antar" or more songful than it was in the finale. It missed not one of the abrupt modulations with which Mr. Braunfels has cluttered his new "Carnival Overture" and it gave some of his broad progressions an eloquence hardly intrinsic in them. Mr. Mueller of the wood-winds and Mr. Wendler and Mr. Jaenicke of the horns outdid themselves in virtuosos' skill and in quality of tone in Händel's concerto; while the whole band that it enlisted was a marvellously elastic, luminous and rich-voiced instrument. The conductor and the orchestra almost painted the lily when they added their own smoothness and euphony of tone to the polished surface of Mendelssohn's instrumentation; and not within long memory has the beginning of his sea-piece carried such suggestion of the glassy mystery, the uncanny and penetrating stillness, of absolutely windless waters.

As usual Dr. Muck made all these perfections serve—not his own glory as the inspirer and the finisher of them—but the substance, style and quality of the music that they were uttering. Ebullient Chicagoans and neurotic New Yorkers may object that there is too little of sound and fury in the conductor's version of the second movement of Korsakov's suite wherein Antar tastes the pleasures of revenge. But the force and fire that Dr. Muck gave to it were exactly scaled to the design of the whole performance and the composer in this music is no wild and whirling Slav. Korsakov had measure, even though the "typical" Tschaikovski lacked it. On the other hand, the illusion of pictorial music could hardly go higher than that which Dr. Muck attained in the passages that summon the still expanse of the shining and solitary desert—silence, shimmer and emptiness that penetrate the hearer as they might in such a waste itself. As vivid of suggestion of another sort were the measures at the beginning in which Korsakov would evoke the atmosphere of old legend. The oriental melody that is presumed to imply the amorous fairy, came from the conductor's hand as full of character as it was of tonal loveliness. Under his leading the march of power moved in a large and sober magnificence of rhythm and color; while the love-song and the vaporous measures of the end of the suite caressed the ear and melted the heart with their beauty.

Such performance enhances the beauty, the imagination, the suggestion, the wondrous play of rhythm, harmony and instrumental color in Rimsky-Korsakov's music. It glosses also his shortcomings—less apparent in "Antar" than in almost any other of his familiar music—his fondness for repetition, his occasional emptiness of phrase and halts of imagination; his reliance upon the suggestion of color rather than upon the force of idea. But in "Antar" he escapes most of his limitations and such a performance as that of yesterday gave him luminous wings. The better the news, then, that before the season ends Dr. Muck intends to undertake the companion-piece, "Scheherazade." He has been studying it for long.

The performance of Mendelssohn's sea-overture—one of his few pieces from the smooth surfaces of which the teeth of time still slip way—was as perfectly accomplished. The long introduction is of the fine and enduring poetry of tones; the northern ocean, as with Mendelssohn's other sea-piece, the "Hebrides" overture, quickened his imagination; the "impressionists" of our day might envy him the clouded color, the long, slow, lifeless undulation, the suggestion of uncanny stillness and suspense that rises out of his music of sea-calm. Inert as it should be, it is alive with picture and it was doubly so yesterday as Dr. Muck in turn poetized its illusion. In contrast, how adroit was his ordering of the long advance of the "main body" and the climax of the overture—the elastic quickening of the rhythm, the supple expansion of the succeeding phrases, the gradual heightening of pace and color, the livelier and livelier outflinging of phrase, the warming voice, the rising suspense until at last the soberly sonorous sweep of the close. The whole process was the art of the conductor revealing and animating the art of the composer and the one and the other seemed to join hands in spontaneous perfection.

Once more conductor and orchestra played the familiar concerto for strings and two wind choirs which seems the beginning and the end of Händel's music at the Symphony Concerts unless some singer chances to resurrect an air from his forgotten operas or oratorios. It was very warmly applauded yesterday as it always is when it reappears in the "active repertory"; the virtuosity of orchestra and conductor with music in the ancient style shone out of the performance. Why, then, should not other pieces of Händel be occasionally disinterred and heard likewise at the Symphony Concerts? The old Prussian did not leave a slender musical baggage behind him. To hear more of his music would give pleasure to the many that welcome Händel hardly less than they welcome Bach. As it was, the sonorities of the strings in the rotund phrases and the soberly striding pace that conductor and music both enjoined upon them, told in the first movement; the second was alive again with spirited and songful pattern-weaving; the third brought the glories aforesaid to Mr. Mueller of the English horn—one of the usually unnoted and exceptionally modest virtuosi of the orchestra—and to the whole wood-wind choir; the fourth ran its course in the ample line, the sober progress, the long curve and the deepening harmonies of slow and grave Händelian song; and in the finale, the groups of instruments chattered and raced themselves away in the merry give-and-take of such closing movements in the ancient music. The whole piece was exhilarating in itself—in spite of the Prussian's big-wigged manner—and it was yet more exhilaratingly played. More and more contemporary ears, sated with music that swims in harmonic and instrumental color, hear gladly this music of more naked line—even if it costs them a trifle of effort in comprehension of a comparatively strange matter and manner. The change, though it be a change backward, is grateful.

In a single hearing, at any rate, Mr. Braunfels's overture is no remarkable or interesting piece, nor does it suggest that repetition and study would better the impression. The truth is that a deal of music is written in this world today and has been written ever since music began to be that is all in the day's work for the composer, and that is tonal journalism, so to say, and not tonal literature. It is not a whit more important in itself than a sound and able article in a newspaper or a magazine that the writer accomplishes in the daily exercise of his calling, and there is not a whit more reason why it should be or why it should be expected to be remarkable. There is the same good reason for the playing of it that there is for the printing of the article and not a jot more reason why it should be minutely considered or sedulously remembered. Now and again, some of this music of the daily practice of the composer's profession happens to have notable and lasting quality even as on occasion may the daily work of the journalist in letters. Bach and Mozart, for example, had the genius and the good fortune to glorify and make perennial music of which they surely thought and spoke as "routine stuff." Our generation reads with pleasure the journalism of Sainte-Beuve and Gauthier and our children's children may be doing as much for the journalism of Mr. Brownell or Mr. Moore or even—to keep to music and the theatre—for the articles of Mr. Newman and Mr. Walkey.

Mr. Braunfels's overture belongs to this journalism of music but not, as it seemed yesterday, to the part of it that survives the day on which it appears. According to the programme-book, it was attached to a light opera, "Princess Brambilla," drawn from a like-named tale of Hoffmann, some time after the piece of the theatre had run a brief course on a few German stages. The action of the opera takes place during the carnival in a Rome of the renaissance. The overture woul suggest the flicker and flare of the revelling as background to the serio-comic amorous adventures that make the substance of tale and play. It undertakes to do so in the fashion of Munich a few years ago when Strauss was the all-sufficient model for the youngsters. Mr. Braunfels assembles a big Straussian orchestra even to a heckelphone; and he clearly likes to keep as much of it "going" at a given moment as is possible. He writes in the bold and large-voiced Straussian fashion—in broad phrases and with large dependence on his wood-winds and horns when he would be songful; and with much involved polphony and many a stroke of instrumental and harmonic color, when he is laying in background and atmosphere. But, somehow neither ear nor fancy disengages much from the intricacies, and the strokes are often of little effect.

There are plentiful labor and superabundant sound in Mr. Braunfels's piece but little imagination and suggestion. Were it not for the title, it would imply no more than an exercise in orchestral writing in the Straussian manner and the listener may hunt in vain through it for the high spirits or the romantic savor of Roman carnivals as the writers and the composers, from Hoffmann and Berlioz onward, have elected to glorify them. The wonder was that it should have been played at all while such pieces as Balakirev's "Thamar," as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," as Granados's magnificently eloquent "Dante"—to cite only a few examples at the spur of the moment—wait seemingly in vain for performance at the Symphony Concerts. Nor was it quite the practical wisdom of programme-making to place the resounding emptiness of the overture—full though it was of notes—after the rich and ranging imagery, the beauty of substance, the finesse of form, the mastery of workmanship and the poetic illusion of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar." Of late, Dr. Muck's German "novelties" have come off least well of all.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 13,

'ANTAR' SYMPHONY AND HANDEL PIECE CONCERT FEATURES

Exceptionally fine playing of the most interesting "Antar" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff, provided the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, admitted at last by the program book to be a concert and not a rehearsal. The symphony makes slow headway in public favor, but is certain to win out on its merits, particularly when those merits are so admirably set forth. It's a beautiful work and well worth more frequent hearing.

Handel's concerto for two wind choirs and strings was a noticeably close second in the honors of the concert. It was played as only this band of players can play and fully merited the most noticeable enthusiasm of the afternoon. The Carnival overture of Braunfels, which was played here for the first time, will doubtless find a resting place on the shelf. It was perhaps well to give it one hearing, but that one was enough. The composer evidently lost sight of his subject and doesn't say what he has to say in an interesting or convincing manner.

Many who have made a sea voyage might well envy Mendelssohn the joy expressed in the "Sea Calm" overture. But doubtless Mendelssohn, like many another, had other trips not quite so agreeable.

Journal
Nov 13, 1915

HANDEL CONCERTO WELL PERFORMED

Braunfels Overture Proves Dull Novelty at the Symphony.

It often happens that a novelty is the least interesting feature of a Symphony program. That is what has happened this week.

The "Princess Brambilla" overture is not a substantial work, nor does it present any golden opportunity to the orchestra. It was written a few years ago by Walter Braunfels, whose father, a lawyer in Frankfort, intended that the son should become a lawyer. There are suggestions in this so-called carnival overture that perhaps a good lawyer was lost to the bar when young Braunfels went to Munich and succumbed to the artistic fascinations of that hospitable town.

The bulk of the overture is occupied with much hemming and hawing over—over what? The 2500 people that attended yesterday's concert may have had 2500 different ideas of it. There was no tell-tale theme, no dramatic climax that conveyed any hint of any particular episode in human history. The story of the Princess Brambilla concerns a Roman actor who, though engaged to a seamstress, pines after an imaginary princess and is cured of his folly by a practical comedian who turns up at carnival time and makes the seamstress appear as the princess. The overture is hazy until near the end, when it suddenly gives forth some of the conventional carnival spirit. There was little applause for it.

But it was very different with Handel concerto for strings and choirs, a work rich in melodies, flu graceful, full of the choice Hande spirit and a perfect showpiece for renowned string and woodwind sect of the Symphony Orchestra. The formance brought out all the time-ored charms of the piece, and after middle movement there was prolo applause for the brilliant solo pl of the two oboes, Mr. Longy and Stanislaus

The concert this week opens
Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symp and ends with the Mendelssohn ture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous age," two pleasing, if not espe stirring compositions. Mme.
whom illness prevented from s will probably appear at some later concerts, but nothing definite can be said about this matter yet.

The program for next week contains the monumental seventh symphony of Bruckner and the Mozart concerto for violin, viola and orchestra, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir as soloists.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
NOV 7 1915
Date

Esta

Fashionable Folk at the Concerts

Miss Margaret Wilson was among the box holders at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which attracted a large and distinguished audience to the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, and had several guests with her, among them Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies, Mrs. George E. Pickett, Mrs. William Hitz, and Carmine Fabrizio. The German ambassador in the adjoining box entertained Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Rollins Morse and Haniel von Haimhausen. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend were among the guests in Mrs. Marshall Field's box. Mrs. Preston Gibson had a box party, including Mrs. Stephen Slocum and Mrs. John Merriam. Miss Laura Harlan, Miss Sherilan and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle were guests of Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe in another box. Mrs. Isaac T. Mann's guests were Mrs. Walter Wells, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Miss Farnsworth, and Miss Hickey. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner and Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier also had box parties. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mme. Pezet, Mrs. Henry B. Brown, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Congressman and Mrs. Towner, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer, Miss Wilmer, Mrs. Bradley Fiske, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Charles C. McChord, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. Joseph Bailey, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. Hiram Irwin, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Miss Caroline Ogden Jones, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Miss Leita Montgomery, Mrs. Charles G. Matthews, Miss Porcher, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Irene Sheridan, Miss Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Nathan Sargent, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Samuel Pilson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Blagdon, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, and Mrs. Peyton Russell.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date NOV 8 - 1915
Es

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Moving pictures have one advantage over the spoken drama; they are fixed on the films before the performers have time to get "stale" in their parts. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not played the Seventh symphony of Beethoven and the Préludes" of Lizt so many times there might have been more life in the performances of these works on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As it was, the orchestra played these great works with a perfunctoriness that was surprising. It was otherwise with the Ravel and Loeffler works on the programme. Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye" was given a splendid performance which revealed all the orchestral iridescence of this pleasing but not great set of orchestral pieces. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" is an interesting piece of music—only it is somewhat too long—but it seems to be groaning under a heavier burden than the murder of an impossible marionette little boy. There is much clever orchestral writing in this work, and it would be more interesting without Maeterlinck's dull and lugubrious story than with it. If Mr. Loeffler had made it half as long, and given as subject-matter the sufferings of his native country under a hated foreign rule, it might have seemed much more important. There was no flaw in the playing of this piece, but in Ravel's composition there were occasional lapses from true intonation on the part of the concert-master. Such things will happen in the best-regulated orchestra.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date V 4 - 1915
Established:

MELBA HOLDS OWN

Boston Orchestra Solois Retains Charm.

Symphony Played By Special Request Is Testimony To City's Musical Taste.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Lyric.

Rumors have been rife of late that this orchestra, thus early in the season, was even in more perfect shape than at any time in its previous memorable history; but, though there was nothing in last night's performance actually to belie this opinion, it cannot be said that the concert as a whole was more specially distinguished than those, for instance, of last year.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 4, and if, as reported, it was selected in response to Baltimoreans' wishes, it is a signal testimony to the growth of musical taste in our city. No more exacting test of the musical acumen and appreciation of a community could well be found than in this ultra-Brahmsish work.

All the characteristics of this composer—the blending of the classical and romantic schools, the uncompromising nobility of sentiment and contempt for popular esteem, the relative insignificance of the themes as compared with the extraordinary interest of their development, the rugged and powerful nature of the orchestration—above all the singular wearing power of the musical material—all these are exemplified in this symphony as perhaps in no other work by Brahms in the same degree.

Out Of Place As A Finale.

The first movement is naturally the least appealing to the general public and it was played last night with a certain stiffness and frigidity that did nothing toward bringing its latent beauties to the surface. The other movements were beautifully interpreted and made a profound impression, but it is unfortunate that the last movement with all its poetic interest should, through its too metaphysical character, be so out of place as a finale.

"Le Mort de Tintagiles," by Loeffler, is very characteristic of the composer, and, for that matter, of many composers of the present day. There is much atmosphere, a very highly developed sense of color and a few moments of real beauty, but an utter paucity of genuine musical ideas. Moreover, the work is far too long drawn-out for such small thematic material as the composer here had at his command.

Mme. Melba's Work.

tains that peculiar charm of you freshness and buoyancy, which, gether with her splendid person has so distinguished her in the

Such works as Handel's sc
"Sweet bird that shun'st the nois folly," serve to display to perfec her remarkable diction, absolute voca control, clarity of tone and the singular beauty of her middle, rather, it must be said, than her upper notes.

The artist, however, was not nearly so appealing in Mozart's divine aria "Porgi Amor," which calls for far more tender and emotional handling. Nor in the same composer's "Voi Che Sapete," where once again there was an entire lack of the requisite light and shade.

The concert closed with a brilliant and altogether satisfying performance of Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

H. D. P.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date OV 8 -
Establis

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck and his men again provided a programme on Saturday afternoon that for the most part was thoroughly delightful. The one exception was Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles." A dry, uninteresting work, devoid alike of invention or any but banal musical ideas, this made at home symphonic poem is conducive chiefly to somnolence. Of course, it is properly made and all that sort of thing. And it is quite as interesting as the mystico-hysterical piece of Maeterlinckian flubdub that suggested it. But that does not prevent it from being a specimen of scholarly inanity.

However, the rest of the programme was ample compensation. It began with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Never could the exquisite modulation, the light and shade of Dr. Muck's interpretation of his work be surpassed. In fact the present writer has never heard the beautiful allegretto played with greater delicacy or more subtle phrasing. At the same time it is undeniable that Dr. Muck's tempi were quite amazingly slow. The allegretto was taken rather as an andante and the last movement, although perfectly played as far as tonal balance was concerned, was decidedly lacking in vivacity.

Ravel's melodious and amusing suite, "Ma Mère L'Oye" and Liszt's, "Les Préludes" completed the programme. It must be said that of its kind "Ma Mère L'Oye" is neither as ingenious nor as interesting as John Alden Carpenter's "In a Perambulator," which Mr. Damrosch repeated with excellent effect at Aeolian Hall yesterday. Miss Hempel again aroused vociferous enthusiasm. She was in excellent voice.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 7 - 1915
Dat
Esta 184

* * *

The echoes linger of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony in their concert without a soloist last Monday evening. How strange it seems that anybody could have stopped his ears to the gorgeous tone-color of Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung" while the work was young, and have found its idiom muddy and obscure! Last Monday evening the audience took great and evident delight in it. And instrumentalists always perform the work with relish, for it gives the woodwind and the brasses a field day, and oboe, flute, violin, kettle drums have a fine chance to "show off." Anton Witek, the concertmeister, has rarely been in better form, and his violin sang like a bird in its flawless upper register. Superbly insouciant Dr. Carl Muck always seems. Contrast him, for example, with Alfred Hertz—who is such a loss to the Metropolitan—Hertz always seemed alarmingly about to fly in pieces; the demeanor of Muck is at times as detached as that of Mephisto enjoying the entanglement of Faust. The polished urbanity that nothing seems to ruffle is almost uncanny.

Like our own gifted conductor, he illustrates the conservation of energy: he does not indulge in superfluous motion for the sake of impressing the groundlings or the gallery. Such leaders make it appear easy to the innocent: as though anybody could stand there with a thin wand in his hand beating time for music that seems to run itself. But what would Nikisch's orchestra be with Nikisch left out? The conductor's dais is another spot where the presence of the galvanizing, magnetizing human factor is indispensable.

* * *

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 4 - 1915
'ished:

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT

Due to Lack of Musical Contrast. Mme. Melba, Soloist, Pleases.

Presenting a program largely of works of German composers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Baltimore concert of the season last night at the Lyric Theater. The audience crowded the house. This is the thirty-fifth season of the orchestra. Mme. Melba, soprano, was the special soloist.

There was not much musical contrast in the program, consequently it became tiresome as it progressed. The work of the orchestra, too, was often so repressed as to be cramped, to cause a sensation of undue compression. The non-technical listener was taxed also by the comparative unfamiliarity of Brahms' fourth symphony and the unjustified length of Loeffler's "tone poem," Le Mort de Tintagiles. The hasty performance of Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger at the end of the program was not unwelcome.

Mme. Melba gave much pleasure with her voice and facility, but she stifled enthusiasm with the pieces she sang. The Handel Sweet Bird aria is one of those errors in a composer's judgment which attempt to change natural elements. Mme. Melba trilled exquisitely for a human singer, but these vocal achievements are not most pleasant when performed by men and women. The flute, which plays the chief obligato in this composition, is incomparably more pleasing. The second Mozart aria, Voi Che sapete, was Mme. Melba's most pleasing offering.

One of the most enjoyable things of the concert was the tone color of the viole d'Amour, played by Emile Ferir in the Loeffler work. Both Mr. Ferir and Andre Maquarre, who played the principal flute part in the Handel aria, participated in the especial honors of the concert.

J. H. H.

[44]

Journal
Nov 13, 1915

HANDEL CONCERTO WELL PERFORMED

Braunfels Overture Proves Dull Novelty at the Symphony.

It often happens that a novelty is the least interesting feature of a Symphony program. That is what has happened this week.

The "Princess Brambilla" overture is not a substantial work, nor does it present any golden opportunity to the orchestra. It was written a few years ago by Walter Braunfels, whose father, a lawyer in Frankfort, intended that the son should become a lawyer. There are suggestions in this so-called carnival overture that perhaps a good lawyer was lost to the bar when young Braunfels went to Munich and succumbed to the artistic fascinations of that hospitable town.

The bulk of the overture is occupied with much hemming and hawing over—over what? The 2500 people that attended yesterday's concert may have had 2500 different ideas of it. There was no tell-tale theme, no dramatic climax that conveyed any hint of any particular episode in human history. The story of the Princess Brambilla concerns a Roman actor who, though engaged to a seamstress, pines after an imaginary princess and is cured of his folly by a practical comedian who turns up at carnival time and makes the seamstress appear as the princess. The overture is hazy until near the end, when it suddenly gives forth some of the conventional carnival spirit. There was little applause for it.

But it was very different with the Handel concerto for strings and wind choirs, a work rich in melodies, fluent, graceful, full of the choice Handelian spirit and a perfect showpiece for the renowned string and woodwind sections of the Symphony Orchestra. The performance brought out all the time-honored charms of the piece, and after the middle movement there was prolonged applause for the brilliant solo playing of the two oboes, Mr. Longy and Mr. Stanislaus.

The concert this week opens with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony and ends with the Mendelssohn overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," two pleasing, if not especially stirring compositions. Mme. Melba, whom illness prevented from singing, will probably appear at some later concerts, but nothing definite can be said about this matter yet.

The program for next week contains the monumental seventh symphony of Bruckner and the Mozart concerto for violin, viola and orchestra, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir as soloists.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

Date NOV 8 - 1915

Es

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Moving pictures have one advantage over the spoken drama; they are fixed on the films before the performers have time to get "stale" in their parts. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not played the Seventh symphony of Beethoven and the Préludes" of Lizt so many times there might have been more life in the performances of these works on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As it was, the orchestra played these great works with a perfunctoriness that was surprising. It was otherwise with the Ravel and Loeffler works on the programme. Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye" was given a splendid performance which revealed all the orchestral iridescence of this pleasing but not great set of orchestral pieces. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" is an interesting piece of music—only it is somewhat too long—but it seems to be groaning under a heavier burden than the murder of an impossible marionette little boy. There is much clever orchestral writing in this work, and it would be more interesting without Maeterlinck's dull and lugubrious story than with it. If Mr. Loeffler had made it half as long, and given as subject-matter the sufferings of his native country under a hated foreign rule, it might have seemed much more important. There was no flaw in the playing of this piece, but in Ravel's composition there were occasional lapses from true intonation on the part of the concert-master. Such things will happen in the best-regulated orchestra.

---

tains that peculiar charm of youthful freshness and buoyancy, which, together with her splendid personality, has so distinguished her in the past.

Such works as Handel's scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," serve to display to perfection her remarkable diction, absolute vocal control, clarity of tone and the singular beauty of her middle, rather, it must be said, than her upper notes.

The artist, however, was not nearly so appealing in Mozart's divine aria "Porgi Amor," which calls for far more tender and emotional handling. Nor in the same composer's "Voi Che Sapete," where once again there was an entire lack of the requisite light and shade.

The concert closed with a brilliant and altogether satisfying performance of Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

H. D. P.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City

Date OV 8

Establis

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck and his men again provided a programme on Saturday afternoon that for the most part was thoroughly delightful. The one exception was Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles." A dry, uninteresting work, devoid alike of invention or any but banal musical ideas, this made at home symphonic poem is conducive chiefly to somnolence. Of course, it is properly made and all that sort of thing. And it is quite as interesting as the mystico-hysterical piece of Maeterlinckian flubdub that suggested it. But that does not prevent it from being a specimen of scholarly inanity.

However, the rest of the programme was ample compensation. It began with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Never could the exquisite modulation, the light and shade of Dr. Muck's interpretation of his work be surpassed. In fact the present writer has never heard the beautiful allegretto played with greater delicacy or more subtle phrasing. At the same time it is undeniable that Dr. Muck's tempi were quite amazingly slow. The allegretto was taken rather as an andante and the last movement, although perfectly played as far as tonal balance was concerned, was decidedly lacking in vivacity.

Ravel's melodious and amusing suite, "Ma Mère L'Oye" and Liszt's, "Les Préludes" completed the programme. It must be said that of its kind "Ma Mère L'Oye" is neither as ingenious nor as interesting as John Alden Carpenter's "In a Perambulator," which Mr. Damrosch repeated with excellent effect at Aeolian Hall yesterday. Miss Hempel again aroused vociferous enthusiasm. She was in excellent voice.

AR
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 4 - 1915

'shed:

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT

Due to Lack of Musical Contrast. Mme. Melba, Soloist, Pleases.

Presenting a program largely of works of German composers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Baltimore concert of the season last night at the Lyric Theater. The audience crowded the house. This is the thirty-fifth season of the orchestra. Mme. Melba, soprano, was the special soloist.

There was not much musical contrast in the program, consequently it became tiresome as it progressed. The work of the orchestra, too, was often so repressed as to be cramped, to cause a sensation of undue compression. The non-technical listener was taxed also by the comparative unfamiliarity of Brahms' fourth symphony and the unjustified length of Loeffler's "tone poem," Le Mort de Tintagiles. The hasty performance of Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger at the end of the program was not unwelcome.

Mme. Melba gave much pleasure with her voice and facility, but she stifled enthusiasm with the pieces she sang. The Handel Sweet Bird aria is one of those errors in a composer's judgment which attempt to change natural elements. Mme. Melba trilled exquisitely for a human singer, but these vocal achievements are not most pleasant when performed by men and women. The flute, which plays the chief obligato in this composition, is incomparably more pleasing. The second Mozart aria, Voi Che sapete, was Mme. Melba's most pleasing offering.

One of the most enjoyable things of the concert was the tone color of the viole d'Amour, played by Emile Ferir in the Loeffler work. Both Mr. Ferir and Andre Maquarre, who played the principal flute part in the Handel aria, participated in the especial honors of the concert.

J. H. H.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C. NOV 7 1915

Date

Esta

Fashionable Folk at the Concerts

Miss Margaret Wilson was among the box holders at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which attracted a large and distinguished audience to the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, and had several guests with her, among them Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Davies, Mrs. George E. Pickett, Mrs. William Hitz, and Carmine Fabrizio. The German ambassador in the adjoining box entertained Mme. Christian Hauge, Mrs. Rollins Morse and Haniel von Haimhausen. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend were among the guests in Mrs. Marshall Field's box. Mrs. Preston Gibson had a box party, including Mrs. Stephen Slocum and Mrs. John Merriam. Miss Laura Harlan, Miss Sherilan and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle were guests of Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe in another box. Mrs. Isaac T. Mann's guests were Mrs. Walter Wells, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Miss Farnsworth, and Miss Hickey. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner and Gen. and Mrs. William Crozier also had box parties. Among others in the audience were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Swedish Minister and Mme. Ekengren, Mme. Pezet, Mrs. Henry B. Brown, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Congressman and Mrs. Towner, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer, Miss Wilmer, Mrs. Bradley Fiske, Mrs. John Biddle, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Charles C. McChord, Mrs. S. B. Williamson, Mrs. Joseph Bailey, the Rev. and Mrs. Ward Denys, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Eustis, Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Chatard, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. Hiram Irwin, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Miss Caroline Ogden Jones, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Miss Leita Montgomery, Mrs. Charles G. Matthews, Miss Porcher, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Irene Sheridan, Miss Louise Sheridan, Mrs. Frank Carpenter, Mrs. Nathan Sargent, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Samuel Pilson, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Blagdon, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Samuel Spencer, and Mrs. Peyton Russell.

WS
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 4 - 1915

MELBA HOLDS OWN

Boston Orchestra Solois Retains Charm.

Symphony Played By Special Request Is Testimony To City's Musical Taste.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season last night at the Lyric.

Rumors have been rife of late that this orchestra, thus early in the season, was even in more perfect shape than at any time in its previous memorable history; but, though there was nothing in last night's performance actually to belie this opinion, it cannot be said that the concert as a whole was more specially distinguished than those, for instance, of last year.

The symphony was Brahms' No. 4, and if, as reported, it was selected in response to Baltimoreans' wishes, it is a signal testimony to the growth of musical taste in our city. No more exacting test of the musical acumen and appreciation of a community could well be found than in this ultra-Brahmsish work.

All the characteristics of this composer—the blending of the classical and romantic schools, the uncompromising nobility of sentiment and contempt for popular esteem, the relative insignificance of the themes as compared with the extraordinary interest of their development, the rugged and powerful nature of the orchestration—above all the singular wearing power of the musical material—all these are exemplified in this symphony as perhaps in no other work by Brahms in the same degree.

Out Of Place As A Finale.

The first movement is naturally the least appealing to the general public and it was played last night with a certain stiffness and frigidity that did nothing toward bringing its latent beauties to the surface. The other movements were beautifully interpreted and made a profound impression, but it is unfortunate that the last movement with all its poetic interest should, through its too metaphysical character, be so out of place as a finale.

"Le Mort de Tintagiles," by Loeffler, is very characteristic of the composer, and, for that matter, of many composers of the present day. There is much atmosphere, a very highly developed sense of color and a few moments of real beauty, but an utter paucity of genuine musical ideas. Moreover, the work is far too long drawn-out for such small thematic material as the composer here had at his command.

Mme. Melba's Work.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. NOV 7 - 1915

Dat

Esta 84

* * *

The echoes linger of the wonderful playing of the Boston Symphony in their concert without a soloist last Monday evening. How strange it seems that anybody could have stopped his ears to the gorgeous tone-color of Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung" while the work was young, and have found its idiom muddy and obscure! Last Monday evening the audience took great and evident delight in it. And instrumentalists always perform the work with relish, for it gives the woodwind and the brasses a field day, and oboe, flute, violin, kettle drums have a fine chance to "show off." Anton Witek, the concertmeister, has rarely been in better form, and his violin sang like a bird in its flawless upper register. Superbly insouciant Dr. Carl Muck always seems. Contrast him, for example, with Alfred Hertz—who is such a loss to the Metropolitan—Hertz always seemed alarmingly about to fly in pieces; the demeanor of Muck is at times as detached as that of Mephisto enjoying the entanglement of Faust. The polished urbanity that nothing seems to ruffle is almost uncanny.

Like our own gifted conductor, he illustrates the conservation of energy: he does not indulge in superfluous motion for the sake of impressing the groundlings or the gallery. Such leaders make it appear easy to the innocent: as though anybody could stand there with a thin wand in his hand beating time for music that seems to run itself. But what would Nikisch's orchestra be with Nikisch left out? The conductor's dais is another spot where the presence of the galvanizing, magnetizing human factor is indispensable.

* * *

MONITOR, BOSTO

NOVEMBER 13.

"BRAMBILLA" OF BRAUNFELS GIVEN BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Nov. 13. The program: Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Antar"; Walter Braunfels, overture, "Princess Brambilla" (first time in Boston); Handel, concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

If anybody should ask what sort of program the Boston Symphony orchestra excels in playing, here is one. And it would be a long search to find another day's schedule of pieces in which the leader and his men maintained their technique so nearly flawless and their interpretation so brilliant from first note to last as in this one. It may be a strange situation that the program is not a remarkable one; for Rimsky-Korsakoff, Braunfels, Handel and Mendelssohn, as here represented, far from being mounted knights on the highroad of inspiration are just pedestrians. But minor art, be it music, poetry or painting, sometimes has an ironical way of making an extraordinary showing. It somehow proves itself necessary in the social scheme, notwithstanding its theoretical shortcomings.

A work of a decidedly second quality on the side of orchestral invention, and yet one that has a pleasant sound, is the Braunfels overture. It is scored with a larger proportion of passages for full orchestra than overtures are generally supposed to demand. The contrast of solo wind instrument episodes which is the usual requirement in such works is wanting. And listeners are compelled to believe that the writer fails to make such contrast because of a lack of mastery of light effect and of melodic characterization. For more than once all the preparations are made for change from full to half orchestra, everything is made ready for a moment of lyric exaltation, but nothing happens beyond the parade of getting ready. At the same time the overture is delightful to listen to because of the composer's skillful management of the combined orchestral sonorities. The background of string tone in particular is admirably painted in. The perspective and atmosphere of the sketch are of irresistible effect. If the classic composers had not taught us that an overture should be a complete piece of expression in itself this work of Braunfels would be wholly plausible.

A successful experiment on the part of the conductor was the revival of the set of little pieces by Handel for string orchestra playing against two choirs of wind instruments. Five pieces were included in the group and all pleased the audience greatly because of their quaintness of style and still more because of the exquisite interpretation they received. The reading of the third piece won appreciation from the audience because of the masterly execution of the duet for oboes. The solo players were Messrs. Longy and Mueller, whose work brought one of those brisk and brief outbursts of applause which indicate a keen house. They stood and bowed in acknowledgement of the hand-clapping.

The conductor and players were at their very highest mark in the Rimsky-Korsakoff work. They have never gone at a repertory piece with freer command of themselves technically and with more glowing enthusiasm interpretively. The easiness of the task, instead of being an excuse for a routine performance was a challenge to their best powers. The phrasing of the work was sensitive, the tone contrasts were vivid. "Antar" was presented at its full value as a symphony and as a piece of descriptive orchestration too. The composer's skill in short-theme handling in the first movement was allowed to show itself and his knack at setting forth a story was permitted full scope at the same time. All values were given their place, no one of them to the detriment of another. And it came about that way, of course, because the work was carefully prepared and because its qualities were intimately studied before public performance was attempted.

TRANSCRIPT.

NOVEMBER 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BRUCKNER AND MOZART SIDE BY SIDE

A Two-Hour Programme and a Content Audience — A Concerto for Violin and Viola Resurrected from Mozart, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir to Play It—Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in Eloquent Performance—The Blanks and the Wonders of It

BEING an intelligent public, the audiences at the Symphony Concerts are beginning to discover timely that the clock does not determine the pleasure or the pain of a given programme. Dr. Muck's chosen music of yesterday—Bruckner's seventh symphony and a "Concertante Symphonie" by Mozart—filled almost exactly the one hundred and twenty minutes that have gradually become the standard duration of the Symphony Concerts. Yet complaint over the length or the exaction of the programme was hardly heard and—what was much more significant—nearly all the listening company stayed to the end; whereas, a week ago, when the concert was short by the clock, many departed before the final number. Neither Bruckner's symphony nor Mozart's concerto—to use a simpler and more convenient designation than the composer's archaic title—exhausted the ears or the interest of the audience and the second piece made pleasant contrast to the first. Thereby we may learn as the old textbooks in moral philosophy used to say, that a concert is overlong and over-exacting when the nature of the chosen music makes it so and not when the hands of the clock, at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, point to four-thirty as the orchestra sounds the last measure.

It was particularly agreeable to see the audience so remain to the very end, because Mr. Witek and Mr. Férir of the leaders of the string choir were playing the solo parts in Mozart's music and deserving such courtesy and compliment. Whatever the shortcomings of the public of the Symphony Concerts—and nearly every group of it takes a turn at railing at the rest—it is warm to the members of the orchestra, like Mr. Witek and Mr. Férir, whom it has come to know as individuals, and to others, like Mr. Mueller a week ago, whom the music of the day raises for the instant above their fellows. When the violinist and the violist came from their usual places to stand close to the conductor, they were long and loudly applauded; and at the end of the concerto the audience even lingered to clap them, while Dr. Muck himself was quick to praise. After all, there is esprit de corps in the auditorium as well as on the stage of Symphony Hall.

Mozart's concerto, heard for the first time "in its entirety" (which is considerable) at the Symphony Concerts, is an amusing and engaging little piece, neither too long nor too thin-bodied, like so much of his minor music, for twentieth-century ears. The most diligent of his biographers and the yet more diligent grubbers among the miscellanea of his time have been unable to unearth any fact or presumption concerning it. The piece merely exists in what is authentically a copy of Mozart's manuscript, to which various musicians from Hellmesberger to Loeffler have added cadenzas for the solo instruments. Hellmesberger's were used yesterday, since Mr. Loeffler's overlook the higher tuning of the viola that the composer enjoined for greater brightness. The probability is that Mozart wrote the concerto, as he wrote so much of his major and minor music, in the hurry of the work and the play of the day—for he was a busy and a sportive young man even by present standards—and handed it forthwith to the virtuosi and the little band who were to play it for noble "patrons" listening leisurely.

The orchestra usually does no more than weave a bright or a shadowy background for the solo instruments, creeping gradually upon them with its lightly energetic tutti. joining its euphonies and tonal colors to theirs or rarely pitty-patting through instrumental dialogue with them. Mozart treats the individualized violin and viola as simply. They blend their songful phrases or they repeat, diversify and contrast them; they speak in suavely united accents; or the high, bright and fine timbre of the viola tells colorfully against the darker and fuller-bodied voice of the violin. There are few feats of virtuosity for the two players, as virtuosity went in Mozart's time, and they lie easily within the skill of a Witek or a Férir. More difficult, in reality, were the limpid and lucent flow of tone, the delicate spinning of modulation and transition, the answering euphonies, the airy arabesques and the pervading finesse and elegance of voice that the music ask. But these attributes of disclosing and glamoring virtuosity, of sensibility to music and of taste and discernment in style were no less readily at Mr. Witek's and Mr. Férir's command. With reason the conductor, the audience, and may be Mozart himself, hearing from the Elysian Fields, rejoiced in them.

As for the music itself, it runs in an Allegro Maestoso, serene of voice, ingratiating of pattern and ambling of movement, that Dr. Muck heightened and animated by adept and unobtrusive modulation of pace and accent; in an Andante all sensibility to the matter and the mood of its pensive song, carried oftenest by the wistful and penetrating voice of the viola; and in a lively and sunny little finale, all pretty quirks or smooth rushes. No very remarkable music in itself, and akin to many another such piece from forgotten hands save for the two qualities with which Mozart and the [illegible] cherished him glorified even his daily tasks—his felicity of design and stroke and his manifold and unceasing charm. It is as proof against the years and the fashions in his minor music as it is, according to Barrie, in women themselves.

Again, Dr. Muck and the orchestra bade their hearers—or so many of them as reflect upon the music to which they listen—read the riddle of Bruckner. Once more, they played the seventh symphony which is accounted his masterpiece, even if the eighth moves some ears and hearts more deeply, and played it with a magnificent sweep of vibrant, massed and mounting tone in the strings, with a suavity and suppleness of phrase and accent in the coloring and pointing wood-winds, and with a beauty of the depths of sound made music in horns and tenor tubas and the more sonorous brass that would have transported Bruckner out of himself even, as they still tell in Vienna, did the hearing of the music of Beethoven. And this symphony, so glorified, was his own. Thrice blessed in these days is the dreaming organist of St. Florian and the queer and solitary figure of the later years of teaching and composing in Vienna in the admiration that conductor after conductor feels for his music. They give it annual place on their programmes; they lavish all their powers upon it; they would win—and in the instance of Dr. Muck, they do win—their hearers to like answer in kind to it. When he is so moved to divining comprehension, enkindled emotional response and transfiguring communication as he is with this seventh symphony of Bruckner, he seems to summon from the engraved page the music that Bruckner heard with the ears of the spirit and would fashion into tones that other men might also hear it so. Now that Mahler is dead and Nikisch elects to wander from concert-room to concert-room with conventionalized programmes, there is no prophet of Bruckner to compare with Dr. Muck. And yesterday the orchestra was herald and prophet, too.

This seventh symphony is indeed all Bruckner's own by the strange shortcomings that it is critical—and maybe human—infirmity to seek out first and that yet vanishes on the instant in the wondrous achievement beside them. By this time, all the world that scrutinizes music knows the reiterated tale of these defects—the spaces in the music that seem suddenly to go blank as though invention and manipulation had for the moment run dry; the putterings—for the homely word of the New England vernacular defines them better than any other—over trivial and futile details; the instants of seeming waiting for the wind of creation to ruffle again the composer's spirit; the innocent mannerisms of procedure like the reiterated inversion of motives or the long and slow ascending progressions and the abrupt descending modulations; the lacking faculties of rigid selection and adroit proportion when invention and ardor run high; the stretching of too vast a tonal canvas for imagination and resource to fill; the occasional maunderings into a vague sentimentality or an altogether indefinite import. No; the Latins from Paris to Palermo will never understand Bruckner; for his shortcomings are the very negation of the qualities that they most prize in music.

Then the flash of inspiration—for it is nothing else—comes upon Bruckner's spirit and dwells for a space in it, melting and scattering all these limitations and inabilities, filling all these empty places, like the consuming fire of the Scripture. Then enkindled and transported he writes a music of a celestial beauty that not even Franck, to whom in temperament he was more than a little akin, may always summon. There are such passages in all his symphonies; they are not a few in the first movement, they even recur in the last movement, of this very seventh. Then, also does he write, as in the Adagio of lament, solace, resignation and apocalyptic vision in the symphony of yesterday, music that bodies forth the deep and universal emotion of the spirits of men as has no other composer since Beethoven. Only the slow movement of the Eroica symphony or the sublimest pages of Wagner when there was the dead Siegfried to mourn or Isolde looked out upon the sunset over Tristan's still body, may stand beside it in the beauty that fills the answering soul and the power that transports it. And in an instant and with the flame of inspiration still blazing full, Bruckner sweeps away into a scherzo that no less fills and transports with the robust joy of free and ardent living or that stays for a moment in the trio for like transfiguration of our common human tenderness. In these slow movements of the seventh and the eighth symphonies, Bruckner might be of the pure in heart who are blessed in that they have seen God. In the scherzi of nearly all the symphonies, this same devout recluse of Linz and Vienna might have known, no less, the finer passions and pleasures of men.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST.

NOVEMBER 20.

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES BRUCKNER

Eloquence Given His 7th—Mozart's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Seventh Symphony of Anton Bruckner and a concerto for violin and viola with orchestra of Mozart were the items of yesterday's public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, in Symphony Hall.

The performance of the Bruckner symphony had a finish and an eloquence which it is difficult to imagine from another conductor than Dr. Muck. This is a work for which he has evidently an affection as well as a high regard. When this is the case, it is difficult to excel in interpretation the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A MARVEL OF FINISH

It has become a sort of a byword to remark of Dr. Muck that when he likes a work the least he gives it the most scrupulous and stirring performance. That is a fallacious doctrine. Any human being does that best which is most sympathetic to his nature, and this principle is intensified, rather than weakened, in the case of the interpretive artist. Not only was the performance of yesterday a marvel of finish and of exalted utterance, but it was a performance for which the composer himself would have thanked the conductor had he been present.

Once Bruckner said to a friend, "I think that if Beethoven were alive, and I should go to him with my Seventh Symphony and say, 'Here, Mr. Van Beethoven, this is not so bad, this Seventh, as certain gentlemen would make out.'" Had the composer been present yesterday he would have said to Dr. Muck: "My dear Doctor, may I thank you for saying in your performance all that I wished to say, and was not quite able to say completely, in my score."

A Master Interpreter

The conductor met the composer half way. To take a movement, such as the uneven and poorly proportioned finale of this work, and give it unity and coherence, its line, fill in the chinks left open, supply the connecting passages between grand ideas that the absent-minded Mr. Bruckner did not always supply, was the act, not only of a master interpretater, but of a creative musician, whose intention was as noble as that of the author of the symphony.

And after all, a symphony by Bruckner, with all its weakness of structure and discrepancies of style, is sure to contain material so great, and display in its entirely such a heroic stride that the hearer may well be content to wade through the occasional doddering found in the first and more particularly the last movement of the seventh symphony for the sake of the prophetic voice, the vision apocalyptic, of other pages. As for the slow movement, it is one of the masterpieces of modern music.

Mozart's Long Concerto

The Mozart concerto, which was performed as a whole for the first time in Boston, has one movement of value—the second movement, which has a haunting beauty and melancholy. The first movement is exceedingly inferior, routine stuff, of which the best pages are those of the double cadenza written by Helmsberger. The finale is more sprightly but hardly more distinguished. The performance on the part of the soloists was finished and in keeping with the character of the music. The accompaniment, most of the time, was rough and too heavy. It is seldom that Dr. Muck conducts such an accompaniment. Even Mozart, on occasion, can snore in his chair and write music by the yard.

The programme of the concerts of next week will include the E flat symphony of Mozart, the Beethoven violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, and Rachmaninoff's noble tone-poem, after the picture of Arnold Boecklin, "The Isle of the Dead."

MONITOR, BOSTO

NOVEMBER 13,

"BRAMBILLA" OF BRAUNFELS GIVEN BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Nov. 13. The program: Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Antar"; Walter Braunfels, overture, "Princess Brambilla" (first time in Boston); Handel, concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra; Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

If anybody should ask what sort of program the Boston Symphony orchestra excels in playing, here is one. And it would be a long search to find another day's schedule of pieces in which the leader and his men maintained their technique so nearly flawless and their interpretation so brilliant from first note to last as in this one. It may be a strange situation that the program is not a remarkable one; for Rimsky-Korsakoff, Braunfels, Handel and Mendelssohn, as here represented, far from being mounted knights on the highroad of inspiration are just pedestrians. But minor art, be it music, poetry or painting, sometimes has an ironical way of making an extraordinary showing. It somehow proves itself necessary in the social scheme, notwithstanding its theoretical shortcomings.

A work of a decidedly second quality on the side of orchestral invention, and yet one that has a pleasant sound, is the Braunfels overture. It is scored with a larger proportion of passages for full orchestra than overtures are generally supposed to demand. The contrast of solo wind instrument episodes which is the usual requirement in such works is wanting. And listeners are compelled to believe that the writer fails to make such contrast because of a lack of mastery of light effect and of melodic characterization. For more than once all the preparations are made for change from full to half orchestra, everything is made ready for a moment of lyric exaltation, but nothing happens beyond the parade of getting ready. At the same time the overture is delightful to listen to because of the composer's skillful management of the combined orchestral sonorities. The background of string tone in particular is admirably painted in. The perspective and atmosphere of the sketch are of irresistible effect. If the classic composers had not taught us that an overture should be a complete piece of expression in itself this work of Braunfels would be wholly plausible.

A successful experiment on the part of the conductor was the revival of the set of little pieces by Handel for string orchestra playing against two choirs of wind instruments. Five pieces were included in the group and all pleased the audience greatly because of their quaintness of style and still more because of the exquisite interpretation they received. The reading of the third piece won appreciation from the audience because of the masterly execution of the duet for oboes. The solo players were Messrs. Longy and Mueller, whose work brought one of those brisk and brief outbursts of applause which indicate a keen house. They stood and bowed in acknowledgement of the hand-clapping.

The conductor and players were at their very highest mark in the Rimsky-Korsakoff work. They have never gone at a repertory piece with freer command of themselves technically and with more glowing enthusiasm interpretively. The easiness of the task, instead of being an excuse for a routine performance was a challenge to their best powers. The phrasing of the work was sensitive, the tone contrasts were vivid. "Antar" was presented at its full value as a symphony and as a piece of descriptive orchestration too. The composer's skill in short-theme handling in the first movement was allowed to show itself and his knack at setting forth a story was permitted full scope at the same time. All values were given their place, no one of them to the detriment of another. And it came about that way, of course, because the work was carefully prepared and because its qualities were intimately studied before public performance was attempted.

TRANSCRIPT.

NOVEMBER 20,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BRUCKNER AND MOZART SIDE BY SIDE

A Two-Hour Programme and a Content Audience — A Concerto for Violin and Viola Resurrected from Mozart, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir to Play It—Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in Eloquent Performance—The Blanks and the Wonders of It

BEING an intelligent public, the audiences at the Symphony Concerts are beginning to discover timely that the clock does not determine the pleasure or the pain of a given programme. Dr. Muck's chosen music of yesterday—Bruckner's seventh symphony and a "Concertante Symphonie" by Mozart—filled almost exactly the one hundred and twenty minutes that have gradually become the standard duration of the Symphony Concerts. Yet complaint over the length or the exaction of the programme was hardly heard and—what was much more significant—nearly all the listening company stayed to the end; whereas, a week ago, when the concert was short by the clock, many departed before the final number. Neither Bruckner's symphony nor Mozart's concerto—to use a simpler and more convenient designation than the composer's archaic title—exhausted the ears or the interest of the audience and the second piece made pleasant contrast to the first. Thereby we may learn as the old text-books in moral philosophy used to say, that a concert is overlong and over-exacting when the nature of the chosen music makes it so and not when the hands of the clock, at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, point to four-thirty as the orchestra sounds the last measure.

It was particularly agreeable to see the audience so remain to the very end, because Mr. Witek and Mr. Férir of the leaders of the string choir were playing the solo parts in Mozart's music and deserving such courtesy and compliment. Whatever the shortcomings of the public of the Symphony Concerts—and nearly every group of it takes a turn at railing at the rest—it is warm to the members of the orchestra, like Mr. Witek and Mr. Férir, whom it has come to know as individuals, and to others, like Mr. Mueller a week ago, whom the music of the day raises for the instant above their fellows. When the violinist and the violist came from their usual places to stand close to the conductor, they were long and loudly applauded; and at the end of the concerto the audience even lingered to clap them, while Dr. Muck himself was quick to praise. After all, there is esprit de corps in the auditorium as well as on the stage of Symphony Hall.

Mozart's concerto, heard for the first time "in its entirety" (which is considerable) at the Symphony Concerts, is an amusing and engaging little piece, neither too long nor too thin-bodied, like so much of his minor music, for twentieth-century ears. The most diligent of his biographers and the yet more diligent grubbers among the miscellanea of his time have been unable to unearth any fact or presumption concerning it. The piece merely exists in what is authentically a copy of Mozart's manuscript, to which various musicians from Hellmesberger to Loeffler have added cadenzas for the solo instruments. Hellmesberger's were used yesterday, since Mr. Loeffler's overlook the higher tuning of the viola that the composer enjoined for greater brightness. The probability is that Mozart wrote the concerto, as he wrote so much of his major and minor music, in the hurry of the work and the play of the day—for he was a busy and a sportive young man even by present standards—and handed it forthwith to the virtuosi and the little band who were to play it for noble "patrons" listening leisurely.

The orchestra usually does no more than weave a bright or a shadowy background for the solo instruments, creeping gradually upon them with its lightly energetic tutti. joining its euphonies and tonal colors to theirs or rarely pitty-patting through instrumental dialogue with them. Mozart treats the individualized violin and viola as simply. They blend their songful phrases or they repeat, diversify and contrast them; they speak in suavely united accents; or the high, bright and fine timbre of the viola tells colorfully against the darker and fuller-bodied voice of the violin. There are few feats of virtuosity for the two players, as virtuosity went in Mozart's time, and they lie easily within the skill of a Witek or a Férir. More difficult, in reality, were the limpid and lucent flow of tone, the delicate spinning of modulation and transition, the answering euphonies, the airy arabesques and the pervading finesse and elegance of voice that the music ask. But these attributes of disclosing and glamoring virtuosity, of sensibility to music and of taste and discernment in style were no less readily at Mr. Witek's and Mr. Férir's command. With reason the conductor, the audience, and may be Mozart himself, hearing from the Elysian Fields, rejoiced in them.

As for the music itself, it runs in an Allegro Maestoso, serene of voice, ingratiating of pattern and ambling of movement, that Dr. Muck heightened and animated by adept and unobtrusive modulation of pace and accent; in an Andante all sensibility to the matter and the mood of its pensive song, carried oftenest by the wistful and penetrating voice of the viola; and in a lively and sunny little finale, all pretty quirks or smooth rushes. No very remarkable music in itself, and akin to many another such piece from forgotten hands save for the two qualities with which Mozart and the kindly Fates that cherished him glorified even his daily tasks—his felicity of design and stroke and his manifold and unceasing charm. It is as proof against the years and the fashions in his minor music as it is, according to Barrie, in women themselves.

Again, Dr. Muck and the orchestra bade their hearers—or so many of them as reflect upon the music to which they listen—read the riddle of Bruckner. Once more, they played the seventh symphony which is accounted his masterpiece, even if the eighth moves some ears and hearts more deeply, and played it with a magnificent sweep of vibrant, massed and mounting tone in the strings, with a suavity and suppleness of phrase and accent in the coloring and pointing wood-winds, and with a beauty of the depths of sound made music in horns and tenor tubas and the more sonorous brass that would have transported Bruckner out of himself even, as they still tell in Vienna, did the hearing of the music of Beethoven. And this symphony, so glorified, was his own. Thrice blessed in these days is the dreaming organist of St. Florian and the queer and solitary figure of the later years of teaching and composing in Vienna in the admiration that conductor after conductor feels for his music. They give it annual place on their programmes; they lavish all their powers upon it; they would win—and in the instance of Dr. Muck, they do win—their hearers to like answer in kind to it. When he is so moved to divining comprehension, enkindled emotional response and transfiguring communication as he is with this seventh symphony of Bruckner, he seems to summon from the engraved page the music that Bruckner heard with the ears of the spirit and would fashion into tones that other men might also hear it so. Now that Mahler is dead and Nikisch elects to wander from concert-room to concert-room with conventionalized programmes, there is no prophet of Bruckner to compare with Dr. Muck. And yesterday the orchestra was herald and prophet, too.

This seventh symphony is indeed all Bruckner's own by the strange shortcomings that it is critical—and maybe human—infirmity to seek out first and that yet vanishes on the instant in the wondrous achievement beside them. By this time, all the world that scrutinizes music knows the reiterated tale of these defects—the spaces in the music that seem suddenly to go blank as though invention and manipulation had for the moment run dry; the putterings—for the homely word of the New England vernacular defines them better than any other—over trivial and futile details; the instants of seeming waiting for the wind of creation to ruffle again the composer's spirit; the innocent mannerisms of procedure like the reiterated inversion of motives or the long and slow ascending progressions and the abrupt descending modulations; the lacking faculties of rigid selection and adroit proportion when invention and ardor run high; the stretching of too vast a tonal canvas for imagination and resource to fill; the occasional maunderings into a vague sentimentality or an altogether indefinite import. No; the Latins from Paris to Palermo will never understand Bruckner; for his shortcomings are the very negation of the qualities that they most prize in music.

Then the flash of inspiration—for it is nothing else—comes upon Bruckner's spirit and dwells for a space in it, melting and scattering all these limitations and inabilities, filling all these empty places, like the consuming fire of the Scripture. Then enkindled and transported he writes a music of a celestial beauty that not even Franck, to whom in temperament he was more than a little akin, may always summon. There are such passages in all his symphonies; they are not a few in the first movement, they even recur in the last movement, of this very seventh. Then, also does he write, as in the Adagio of lament, solace, resignation and apocalyptic vision in the symphony of yesterday, music that bodies forth the deep and universal emotion of the spirits of men as has no other composer since Beethoven. Only the slow movement of the Eroica symphony or the sublimest pages of Wagner when there was the dead Siegfried to mourn or Isolde looked out upon the sunset over Tristan's still body, may stand beside it in the beauty that fills the answering soul and the power that transports it. And in an instant and with the flame of inspiration still blazing full, Bruckner sweeps away into a scherzo that no less fills and transports with the robust joy of free and ardent living or that stays for a moment in the trio for like transfiguration of our common human tenderness. In these slow movements of the seventh and the eighth symphonies, Bruckner might be of the pure in heart who are blessed in that they have seen God. In the scherzi of nearly all the symphonies, this same devout recluse of Linz and Vienna might have known, no less, the finer passions and pleasures of men.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 20,

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES BRUCKNER

Eloquence Given His 7th—Mozart's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Seventh Symphony of Anton Bruckner and a concerto for violin and viola with orchestra of Mozart were the items of yesterday's public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, in Symphony Hall.

The performance of the Bruckner symphony had a finish and an eloquence which it is difficult to imagine from another conductor than Dr. Muck. This is a work for which he has evidently an affection as well as a high regard. When this is the case, it is difficult to excel in interpretation the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A MARVEL OF FINISH

It has become a sort of a byword to remark of Dr. Muck that when he likes a work the least he gives it the most scrupulous and stirring performance. That is a fallacious doctrine. Any human being does that best which is most sympathetic to his nature, and this principle is intensified, rather than weakened, in the case of the interpretive artist. Not only was the performance of yesterday a marvel of finish and of exalted utterance, but it was a performance for which the composer himself would have thanked the conductor had he been present.

Once Bruckner said to a friend, "I think that if Beethoven were alive, and I should go to him with my Seventh Symphony and say, 'Here, Mr. Van Beethoven, this is not so bad, this Seventh, as certain gentlemen would make out.'" Had the composer been present yesterday he would have said to Dr. Muck: "My dear Doctor, may I thank you for saying in your performance all that I wished to say, and was not quite able to say completely, in my score."

A Master Interpreter

The conductor met the composer half way. To take a movement, such as the uneven and poorly proportioned finale of this work, and give it unity and coherence, its line, fill in the chinks left open, supply the connecting passages between grand ideas that the absent-minded Mr. Bruckner did not always supply, was the act, not only of a master interpretater, but of a creative musician, whose intention was as noble as that of the author of the symphony.

And after all, a symphony by Bruckner, with all its weakness of structure and discrepancies of style, is sure to contain material so great, and display in its entirely such a heroic stride that the hearer may well be content to wade through the occasional doddering found in the first and more particularly the last movement of the seventh symphony for the sake of the prophetic voice, the vision apocalyptic, of other pages. As for the slow movement, it is one of the masterpieces of modern music.

Mozart's Long Concerto

The Mozart concerto, which was performed as a whole for the first time in Boston, has one movement of value—the second movement, which has a haunting beauty and melancholy. The first movement is exceedingly inferior, routine stuff, of which the best pages are those of the double cadenza written by Helmsberger. The finale is more sprightly but hardly more distinguished. The performance on the part of the soloists was finished and in keeping with the character of the music. The accompaniment, most of the time, was rough and too heavy. It is seldom that Dr. Muck conducts such an accompaniment. Even Mozart, on occasion, can snore in his chair and write music by the yard.

The programme of the concerts of next week will include the E flat symphony of Mozart; the Beethoven violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, and Rachmaninoff's noble tone-poem, after the picture of Arnold Boecklin, "The Isle of the Dead."

Bruckner and Mozart Partnered

(From a Noted Drawing in Jugend)

Their Waltz Among the Stars to the Music of Johann Strauss

BOSTON GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 20.

HOUR OF BRUCKNER.

Seventh Symphony Plays 65 Minutes.

Messrs Witek and Ferir Soloists in Mozart Piece.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert consisted of but two pieces, lest some possibly should think it too short to be worth the cost, the management, the week before, had taken the precaution to insert a line, saying the length of the program would be one hour and 40 minutes.

None conversant with Bruckner's seventh symphony were apprehensive lest it be too brief. Not less than 65 minutes were necessary yesterday to complete the four movements. Is it worth it? Few, very few, are the symphonic works that last an hour, and three-quarters is enough for many that promise to live, and are called great.

Bruckner, naive child and pedantic German music master, left strangely conflicting pages. There are noble thoughts in this symphony, buried in long passages of bombastic rhetoric and tedious, unending repetitions. Of development there is little. Material is recalled again and again, with the persistence of a conscientious professor lecturing his class, not revitalized or transformed into new guises that stir the imagination, but quoted literally.

An honest mind that never plans little surprises, hidden retreats for its readers, nor invites into new paths of exploration, nor spreads before the vision some new arresting scene without revealing it all before. It is singularly obvious music, with a certain honest sentiment, but more fit for his disciples than a general public. To the simple-minded schoolmaster, the much prolonged climaxes closing the first and last movements with a monotonous persistence in the one unbroken tonality may have been grandeur. They were saved yesterday by the magnificent response of the basses, here as elsewhere, to Dr Muck's crescendo. The performance would have glorified any music, however dull.

The art of Mr Witek and Mr Ferir in Mozart's Concert Symphony for Violin and Viola (K op 364) played in its entirety for the first time in Boston, was as refreshing as the clear transparency of the music.

The program of next week will be one of unusual interest, including Mozart's E-flat symphony, Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra, Mr Kreisler, soloist, and Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead," after Boecklin's painting.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 20.

SYMPHONY GIVES SUPERB CONCERT

Novel Mozart Concerto and Bruckner Symphony Nobly Played.

There are only two numbers on this week's Symphony program, but these, the Bruckner symphony in E major and the Mozart symphonic concerto for violin and viola, are of a length and a quality sufficient to make a good average concert.

The Mozart number, in which the solos are played by Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir, is in the nature of a novelty, for this is the first time it has been played in its entirety at the Symphony concerts; nor even have fragments of it been performed in Boston for many years until this week.

It is a work showing characteristics of the composer's full powers—beauty and fluency in the invention and development of themes, graceful structure such as no composer equaled before or since, happy effects in the treatment of both the solo instruments and the accompaniment, which is truly of symphonic mold and not the thin, colorless material common to such compositions of late 18th century date. Yesterday it was gracefully and sympathetically performed—in true Mozartian style, and con amore.

This quasi-novel offering, together with the always attractive seventh Bruckner symphony, drew yesterday a large audience that began to gather out in the storm before noon. This enthusiasm was well rewarded by the beautiful performance of one of the most interesting programs of the season. There are many magnificent utterances in the Bruckner symphony, not only in the dirge-like adagio, which has been hailed as Bruckner's master-effort, but in the finale, where the use of the brass is Wagnerian in its freedom and eloquence. Dr. Muck, who years ago conducted the symphony in the presence of the composer, was vigorously applauded, and so was the orchestra.

This program will be played again tonight.

Fritz Kreisler will play the Beethoven violin concerto at next week's concerts. The orchestral numbers will be the Mozart symphony in E flat and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Der Toteninsel."

ADVERTISER

NOVEMBER 20.

GIVE BRUCKNER'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Great Reading Marks Symphony Concert

NEVER YET SO GRANDLY PLAYED IN BOSTON

Mozart's Symphonic Concerto Vivid Contrast to Preceding Work

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Seventh Symphony, E major.
Mozart—Symphonic Concerto, Violin, Viola and Orchestra.
Violin, Mr. Witek; Viola, Mr. Ferir.

This programme looks very short in print, but in actuality it was over an hour and 40 minutes in length. Bruckner's Symphony is a concert in itself. But the more we hear Bruckner the more we find to admire in him. It certainly was not always thus, for Mr. Gericke used to describe the first performance of this particular symphony in Boston, with much dramatic effect. At the end of the second movement the exodus began. At the next movement hundreds left the hall. At the last movement there were more people upon the platform, in the orchestra, than there were in the audience. All this is greatly changed at present. Today Bruckner seems fairly easy of comprehension, and by no means ugly. We have been trained in the school of dissonances and complexities until Bruckner seems easy by comparison. One can scarcely forgive Brahms for assenting complacently to Mme. Von Herzogenberg's sneers at Bruckner, likening him to a very thin soup, with a few flecks of fat on the top to make one believe in its richness. There was glory and triumph in the performance of the seventh symphony, yesterday afternoon, and it has never yet been so grandly played in Boston.

After all figure development, which is Bruckner's strong point, has been the essence of good music from Bach to Richard Strauss, and the task of following the figure through the tonal web is not an unpleasant one. Bruckner has much more to say than the average long-winded symphonist. He may be as long as many of the moderns, but he is considered deeper and broader. We always feel that there is a kinship between Bruckner and D'Indy, for both of these care far more for the intellectuality of their music than for emotional power, but Bruckner is much the loftier of the two. We have had this symphony several times in the last few years, an honor that is not accorded to any other writers of this length and ascetic style. All the brutal and sarcastic criticisms of Hanslick have not prevailed against Bruckner's holding his place in the repertoire.

To give such a work as Dr. Muck gives it, is a labor of love, for even at its best such a work cannot be much desired by the general public. It is an educational task to force the average concert-goer to hear it so often. Bruckner's tone-coloring is not much beyond that of Brahms. Some startling combinations, such as deep brasses with the flute, may astonish but cannot charm, while the antiphonal character of full orchestra against responses of the solo instruments is not a very new device and can easily be overdone. The first movement must ever remain Music for musicians only.

But the slow movement has some fervid climaxes, and the sonorous effects of the brasses (especially the tubas) gave an impressive solemnity, a most earnest homage to Wagner, whom Bruckner celebrated in this movement. The brasses were altogether great in yesterday's performance. Possibly, however, the Scherzo is the movement which may soonest win popularity, for its six-noted trumpet figure is easily followed in all its transformations, and its makes an excellent contrast to the long and rather sombre Adagio which precedes it. The figure aforesaid is not very far removed from the "Flying Dutchman" figure, and the resemblance-hunter may also find suggestions of "Lohengrin" in this movement, and hear the waves of "Rheingold" flow at the end of the first movement. This Scherzo is throughout coherent and well-knit together.

The finale, like the first movement, is again given over to displays of ingenuity, but it must be added that in all these inversions, augmentations, diminutions, etc., there is no ugliness of the Schoenberg, or even of the Reger type. The performance was a masterpiece. Nothing could display the technique of our orchestra so well as the execution of a work of this character. The titanic work demands force at times, and we have not had such a volume of tone since [illegible] liches Praeludium, but the "fff" effects were infinitely more in place in this "Germania Triumphans" than in that made-to-order prelude.

Mozart's symphonic concerto was a vivid contrast to the preceding work. It is a work which we believe has never been given entire in these concerts, and the first movement has been given a single time, but not in this century. It served well to display two artists of whom Boston is justly proud, and it also served to make the public acquainted with the beauty of the viola as a solo instrument. The viola is really the Cinderella of the orchestra. It is crushed out by the richness of the violin and the violoncello, between which it stands almost unnoticed. Yet there is a pensive tenderness in its tones which cannot be quite attained by the deep tones of the violin and still less by the high tones of the violoncello. This effect was finely brought out by Mr. Ferir, in the Andante.

The two artists (Messrs. Witek and Ferir) played splendidly. The final cadenza of the first movement (composed by Hellmesberger) was in itself a revelation of perfect technique and ensemble. But even the best interpretation could not make the suavities of this Concertante Symphonie absolutely effective after the tremendous Bruckner work. Yet we must state that both works were applauded vehemently. We believe that the second ovation belonged to the soloists, however, while the first was a spontaneous tribute to the interpretation of the orchestra, the power of Bruckner and the great conductorship of Dr. Muck. The reading was one of those memorable events such as the triumphs won by Dr. Muck in the first Brahms symphony or the Faust symphony by Liszt in the recent past.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY,

NOVEMBER 20, 1915.

BRUCKNER'S GRAND SYMPHONY STIRS CONCERT AUDIENCE

With only two numbers on the program, Bruckner's seventh symphony and Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony orchestra was a bit out of the ordinary. There was, however, no lack of either quantity or quality. The Bruckner number afforded both and in goodly measure. It's a grand work and was superbly given, fully meriting the outbursts of applause that followed the close of each movement, culminating in such enthusiasm as to force Dr. Muck to twice return to the stage at its close and call upon his players to rise in their places and share in the audience's tribute. Bruckner worked hard and long for his honors and overcame many an obstacle that would have discouraged a less determined man.

It was something of a change from Bruckner to Mozart and no small credit to Dr. Muck and the orchestra that the contrast was so successfully brought out. Such playing as Mr. Witek and Mr. Ferir gave of the solo parts in the Mozart selection was alone well worth the afternoon. Both were enthusiastically applauded at every possible opportunity.

BOSTON H

NOVEMBER 2

BRUCKNER AT SYMPHONY H

Dr. Muck Conducts Fifth Friday Afternoon Concert of the Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola played by Mr. Witek (violin) and Mr. Ferir (viola).

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony has now been performed here six times. There have been 13 performances of symphonies by Bruckner since 1887. Audiences have often been impatient or openly bored. It is said that letters have been written protesting against any music by Bruckner at these concerts. Conductors, however, have gone on undisturbed. They might have said with Carl Bergman, who, when he was told that the people did not like Wagner's music, answered: "Then they must hear it till they do like it." Yesterday poor Bruckner had his revenge. His Seventh Symphony, superbly played, was loudly applauded, and it was not only the solemn Adagio that was thus appreciated.

Dr. Muck is evidently fond of the seventh symphony. He conducted the first performance in Austria in 1886—it was at Graz; in Berlin in 1894, and he conducted it in Boston in 1906 and in 1913.

It certainly is a gigantic work, abounding in lofty and noble pages, also in trivialities, tiresome r and fussy and insignificant de in the other symphonies of that we have heard, there is continuity in each movement; impressive preparations that nothing: "In the name of the Figs!" The composer had littl structure. To use Disraeli's p was intoxicated with his own
His taste in ornamentation than doubtful. He would crow facade with gingerbread work; plan an extension of cheap st
pure temple of marble.

And yet in this seventh ther are pages that come closer hoven at his greatest than w
the symphonies of other c
There are grand thoughts exp
a masterly manner in Franc phony and in the symphony in Vincent d'Indy; the Introducti
Finale of Brahm's first symphony has elemental grandeur and spiritual intensity; but Bruckner's spirit in the Adagio and in the main body of the Scherzo of the seventh symphony is nearer akin to that of Beethoven.

We must take Bruckner as he is, with all his childish, endless garrulity, his delight in saying the same thing over and over again, his stopping as if he were taking breath and wondering what he should do next, his dallying with straws and pebbles. It is not necessary to accept him in bulk as Victor Hugo was eager to take Shakespeare; but we may forget his inanities, every now and then realizing that it was given to the composer of the seventh symphony to be caught up to the seventh heaven, where he heard that which was ineffable, to be repeated to mortals only in music.

Nothing is known about the origin of Mozart's concerto for violin and viola. No one knows where it was composed or for what occasion. The autograph manuscript is lost. Mozart does not refer to the concerto in his letters. The indefatigable Jahn could furnish no information. It is doubtful whether Mozart valued the concerto highly. He probably wrote it as in a day's work; it served some purpose and he forgot it. The first movement was played at a Symphony concert in 1892 by Messrs. Loeffler (violin) and Kneisel (viola). Then, as yesterday, a cadenza by Hellmesberger was used; and yesterday another cadenza by Hellmesberger was introduced. Much of this music is in Mozart's amiable and lighthearted vein. The Andante in C minor has the plaintive grace peculiar to him. (By mistake the title page of the Program Book stated that this movement was in E flat). Messrs. Witek and Ferir gave a highly artistic performance and the accompaniment was sympathetic, as is always the case when Dr. Muck conducts.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Beethoven's violin concerto; Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem to Boecklin's picture, "The Island of the Dead." Mr. Kreisler will play the concerto.

From POST

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date NOV 16 1915

Established:

THEATRICAL REVIEW

Boston Symphony Orchestra Players Delight Lar Audience at Parsons

The first concert of the series of three scheduled for Hartford during the present season took place last evening in Parsons theatre. Dr. Muck conducted, and Florence Hinkle, soprano, was the soloist. The audience was large and enthusiastic. The following program was given:

Beethoven—Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 92.
I.—Poco Sustenuto; Vivace.
II.—Allegretto.
III.—Presto; Presto meno assai.
IV.—Allegro con brio.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Rimsky Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I.—Alborade
II.—Variations.
III.—Alborado.
IV.—Scene and Gypsy Song.
V.—Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause)
Burch—"Ave Maria." from "The Cross of Fire," A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52.
Weber—Overture to the Opera, "Oberon."

Hartford music lovers have for many years regarded the Boston Symphony concerts as the best musical events of the season in this city, and Dr. Muck and his famous players have never disappointed. Last evening's program was no exception to the general rule. Superlatives only should be used in describing the concert. It would be difficult to bestow any criticism, and only words of commendation should be given. The Boston Symphony orchestra as a musical organization has no superior anywhere, not only in America, but in Europe. Dr. Muck has brought his men to as near a state of perfection as is possible in humans, and every melody produced at evening's concert was a work of art.

With the possible exception of the Fou and the Pastoral, the Eighth Beethoven symphony is the favorite of all of major works of the great composer. Its exquisite harmonies throughout all four movements appeal, not only to the trained musician, but to the layman as well. The remarkably beautiful and well modulated strings were never heard to better advantage, and every climax was the pinnacle of musical achievement. The entire work was played with such a thorough and comprehensive grasp of the idea of the meaning of the composition, that a critic has no opportunity to criticize.

A delicious contrast to the classical strains of the symphony was the vivacious Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice," which was played without any pause between the movements. The brilliant "Fandango," which concluded the work, was a fitting end to a brilliant performance.

Miss Florence Hinkle, who has gained distinction througnout this country as an oratorio soprano, was decidedly pleasing as soloist, and her work did not in the least suffer in comparison with that of the orchestra. The beautiful Mozart aria disclosed her best singing of the evening. The rare simplicity of the aria, with its beautiful, flowing harmony, received adequate treatment at the hands of the artist. second selection, "The Ave Maria," pleased al., although the limitations o upper register did not allow her to ri the dramatic heights which the song mands.

The concluding number of the or tra's program, the familiar "Oberon" ture, was a fitting number with whi end a notable concert.

R. M.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES

From

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date [illegible]

Established:

DR. MUCK AND HIS CONDUCTING.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in First Local Concert of the Season.

RARE BEETHOVEN INTERPRETATION

Great Organization Plays as Only the Boston Orchestra Can Play.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave its first concert for the season at Parsons's theater last evening. There was a very large audience. The program included the Beethoven A Major Symphony No. 7, op. 92; the Mozart aria, "Voi che Sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes; the "Ave Maria" from Bruch's dramatic cantata, "The Cross of Fire"; and Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon." The soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano.

Both the Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice and the Bruch "Ave Maria" have appeared on comparatively recent Hartford programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the f composition having been pre at the concert given on April 7, while the Bruch Aria was su
Mme. Marie Sundelius at the c of November 26, 1914.

Beethoven's Seventh Symph
a panorama of the musical un
The listener is conducted to t of an high mountain whe spread out in immeasurable r to the parapets of space a vas scape of musical creation.
work is absolute music; and,
absolute music rather than p music in the ordinary sense word, what the listener s hears in it will describe his o agination and define the dimensions of his own musical development and understanding.

Dr. Muck brought forward a masterly conception of the work. There was no slavish adherence to tradition, but tradition was reverenced. There was the finest of scholarship, but scholarship was veiled and mantled in the shining vestments of inspiration and artistic comprehension. The Beethoven who, of all composers, dwells apart in the infinity of time was revealed in all his majestic composure; but there was also the Beethoven of cataclysmic [illegible] energy. It were a consumership of this entire symphony, and of its second movement in particular.

For Dr. Muck with the brain and with the soul of a great artist divines the subtle relationship which should exist between musical effect and its physical portrayal through the conductor's art. Conductors there are who suggest Mrs. Jarley's celebrities or magnetized manikins; others who, whether in the production of crescendo and accelerando or diminuendo and retard passages apparently suffer from acute internal disorders. And there are conductors who seem to be chiefly conscious of an overwhelming conviction that they are before a universal camera.

Now conducting is not conducting in any really useful or vitally necessary sense till the conductor first of all things has put far from him all thought save only of the music in hand. Nor is conducting in any high sense conducting till it takes on the significance of a physical portrayal of the intellectual and emotional contents of the art product which it seeks to delineate. And herein lies the explanation of the fact that there are very few great conductors. Therein lies the warrant for pronouncing Dr. Karl Muck a conspicuous member of that small but highly distinguished company.

The orchestra played throughout the evening as the Boston Symphony orchestra alone of American orchestras can play. There were moments of highly spectacular virtuosity in the last movement of the symphony, in the Rimsky-Korsakoff work, and in the Weber overture. But virtuosity bending itself to ends infinitely more important than its own exploitation became the obedient servant of lofty orchestral art. Certain unavoidable slips involved in some of the terrific tempi demanded by Dr. Muck were too trifling seriously to affect the sum total of superb interpretative achievement.

Miss Hinkle is a singer possessed of a very beautiful voice, indeed, exquisitely schooled and exquisitely managed. The singing last evening, from any and every artistic viewpoint, was a distinguished and wholly admirable exemplification of the fine art of song.

From PRESS

Address: New York City

Date NOV 21 1915

Establi

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 2, and Saturday afternoon, December 4. At both concerts the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler. Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto; Saturday afternoon the Concerto in E minor, No. 22, by Viotti.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be performed on Thursday evening. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be devoted almost entirely to music of the eighteenth century.

From COURANT

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date NOV 7 1915

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a national institution. New York critics long ago proclaimed the importance of so wonderful an aggregation of performers and, with a host of home attractions, accepted the work of the Boston players as their musical standard. Probably no body of instrumentalists has ever been assembled with greater care or rerehearsed more diligently by the world's most gifted conductors, covering a period of nearly thirty-five years. The music-loving public finds delight in such orchestral virtuosity and recognizes in Dr. Karl Muck an interpreter capable of using his orchestra more effectively than any of his predecessors. This orchestra is as one performer under the baton of a brilliant conductor. The 1915-1916 series of three concerts at the Parsons Theater will be opened Monday evening, November 15. The soloist on this occasion will be Miss Florence Hinkle, the most popular among American concert singers of the day. Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

Special, New and Beautiful Free Souvenirs for "Hartford Week" at the Anniversary Sale. Wise, Smith & Co. —Advt.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date NOV 17 1915

Establi

LAETA HARTLEY SOLOIST

At Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Nov. 23.

Laeta Hartley, who will be the soloist at the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, is expected to make something of a sensation. It will be her first appearance here and if her success elsewhere is repeated she will quickly become a favorite. She has chosen one of the most delightful concertos for piano in the literature of music, the second of Saint-Saen's in G-minor, which is particularly famous for its delightful, sparkling Scherzo. The rest of the programme maintains the high standard that Dr. Muck has made in the past.

BROOKLYN EDIT

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City

Date NOV 21 1915

Establ

Boston Symphony to Feature Kreisler

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, December 3d. The soloist will be the ever-popular Fritz Kreisler, who will play Brahms's Concerto in D Major. A most interesting item on the programme that Dr. Muck has arranged is the Symphonic Poem "The Island of the Dead," by the Russian composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

From TIMES

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date NOV 11 1915

Esta

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The concert at Parsons's theater next Monday night will be the first of three by the famous Boston orchestra and it is needless to say the return of the great orchestra will be warmly welcomed. The occasion will also serve as an introduction of Miss Florence Hinkle to our public after repeated successes in nearly every other musical center of the United States. She is one of the few artists who possess that indefinable something that enable them to satisfy, alike the trained musician and the lover of music who is not versed in the art. The Boston Globe says: "Her voice is of uncommon, exceeding rare beauty. There are no breaks or apparent boundary line of register." The Philadelphia Record: "She has a voice so rarely beautiful that she has been declared by many persons the finest soprano in the country."

The program for Monday's concert offers material for enjoyment of all music lovers.

Reserved seats on sale at Gallup & Alfred's store.

BOSTON H

NOVEMBER 2

BRUCKNER AT SYMPHONY HALL

Dr. Muck Conducts Fifth Friday Afternoon Concert of the Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola played by Mr. Witek (violin) and Mr. Ferir (viola).

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony has now been performed here six times. There have been 13 performances of symphonies by Bruckner since 1887. Audiences have often been impatient or openly bored. It is said that letters have been written protesting against any music by Bruckner at these concerts. Conductors, however, have gone on undisturbed. They might have said with Carl Bergman, who, when he was told that the people did not like Wagner's music, answered: "Then they must hear it till they do like it." Yesterday poor Bruckner had his revenge. His Seventh Symphony, superbly played, was loudly applauded, and it was not only the solemn Adagio that was thus appreciated.

Dr. Muck is evidently fond of the seventh symphony. He conducted the first performance in Austria in 1886—it was at Graz; in Berlin in 1894, and he conducted it in Boston in 1906 and in 1913.

It certainly is a gigantic work, abounding in lofty and noble pages, abounding also in trivialities, tiresome repetitions and fussy and insignificant details. As in the other symphonies of Bruckner that we have heard, there is a lack of continuity in each movement; there are impressive preparations that lead to nothing: "In the name of the Prophet! Figs!" The composer had little sense of structure. To use Disraeli's phrase, he was intoxicated with his own verbosity. His taste in ornamentation was more than doubtful. He would crown a noble facade with gingerbread work; he would plan an extension of cheap stucco to a pure temple of marble.

And yet in this seventh symphony ther are pages that come closer to Beethoven at his greatest than we find in the symphonies of other composers. There are grand thoughts expressed in a masterly manner in Franck's symphony and in the symphony in B-flat by Vincent d'Indy; the Introduction to the Finale of Brahm's first symphony has elemental grandeur and spiritual intensity; but Bruckner's spirit in the Adagio and in the main body of the Scherzo of the seventh symphony is nearer akin to that of Beethoven.

We must take Bruckner as he is, with all his childish, endless garrulity, his delight in saying the same thing over and over again, his stopping as if he were taking breath and wondering what he should do next, his dallying with straws and pebbles. It is not necessary to accept him in bulk as Victor Hugo was eager to take Shakespeare; but we may forget his inanities, every now and then realizing that it was given to the composer of the seventh symphony to be caught up to the seventh heaven, where he heard that which was ineffable, to be repeated to mortals only in music.

Nothing is known about the origin of Mozart's concerto for violin and viola. No one knows where it was composed or for what occasion. The autograph manuscript is lost. Mozart does not refer to the concerto in his letters. The indefatigable Jahn could furnish no information. It is doubtful whether Mozart valued the concerto highly. He probably wrote it as in a day's work; it served some purpose and he forgot it. The first movement was played at a Symphony concert in 1892 by Messrs. Loeffler (violin) and Kneisel (viola). Then, as yesterday, a cadenza by Hellmesberger was used; and yesterday another cadenza by Hellmesberger was introduced. Much of this music is in Mozart's amiable and lighthearted vein. The Andante in C minor has the plaintive grace peculiar to him. (By mistake the title page of the Program Book stated that this movement was in E flat). Messrs. Witek and Ferir gave a highly artistic performance and the accompaniment was sympathetic, as is always the case when Dr. Muck conducts.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Beethoven's violin concerto; Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem to Boecklin's picture, "The Island of the Dead." Mr. Kreisler will play the concerto.

From Post

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date NOV 16 1915

THEATRICAL REVIEW

Boston Symphony Orchestra Players Delight Large Audience at Parsons

The first concert of the series of three scheduled for Hartford during the present season took place last evening in Parsons theatre. Dr. Muck conducted, and Florence Hinkle, soprano, was the soloist. The audience was large and enthusiastic. The following program was given:

Beethoven—Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 92.
I.—Poco Sustenuto; Vivace.
II.—Allegretto.
III.—Presto; Presto meno assai.
IV.—Allegro con brio.
Mozart—Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Rimsky Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I.—Alborade
II.—Variations.
III.—Alborado.
IV.—Scene and Gypsy Song.
V.—Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause)
Burch—"Ave Maria." from "The Cross of Fire," A Dramatic Cantata, Op. 52.
Weber—Overture to the Opera, "Oberon."

Hartford music lovers have for many years regarded the Boston Symphony concerts as the best musical events of the season in this city, and Dr. Muck and his famous players have never disappointed. Last evening's program was no exception to the general rule. Superlatives only should be used in describing the concert. It would be difficult to bestow any criticism, and only words of commendation should be given. The Boston Symphony orchestra as a musical organization has no superior anywhere, not only in America, but in Europe. Dr. Muck has brought his men to as near a state of perfection as is possible in humans, and every melody produced at last evening's concert was a work of art.

With the possible exception of the Fourth and the Pastoral, the Eighth Beethoven symphony is the favorite of all of major works of the great composer. Its exquisite harmonies throughout all four movements appeal, not only to the trained musician, but to the layman as well. The remarkably beautiful and well modulated strings were never heard to better advantage, and every climax was the pinnacle of musical achievement. The entire work was played with such a thorough and comprehensive grasp of the idea of the meaning of the composition, that a critic has no opportunity to criticize.

A delicious contrast to the classical strains of the symphony was the vivacious Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice," which was played without any pause between the movements. The brilliant "Fandango," which concluded the work, was a fitting end to a brilliant performance.

Miss Florence Hinkle, who has gained distinction througnout this country as an oratorio soprano, was decidedly pleasing as soloist, and her work did not in the least suffer in comparison with that of the orchestra. The beautiful Mozart aria disclosed her best singing of the evening. The rare simplicity of the aria, with its beautiful, flowing harmony, received adequate treatment at the hands of the artist. Her second selection, "The Ave Maria," also pleased all, although the limitations of her upper register did not allow her to rise to the dramatic heights which the song demands.

The concluding number of the orchestra's program, the familiar "Oberon" overture, was a fitting number with which to end a notable concert.

R. M. L.

---

stablished and Most Complete TIMES
Cutting Bureau in the World

Hartford, Conn.

NOV 11 1915

DR. MUCK AND HIS CONDUCTING.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in First Local Concert of the Season.

RARE BEETHOVEN INTERPRETATION

Great Organization Plays as Only the Boston Orchestra Can Play.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave its first concert for the season at Parsons's theater last evening. There was a very large audience. The program included the Beethoven A Major Symphony No. 7, op. 92; the Mozart aria, "Voi che Sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes; the "Ave Maria" from Bruch's dramatic cantata, "The Cross of Fire"; and Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon." The soloist was Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano.

Both the Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice and the Bruch "Ave Maria" have appeared on comparatively recent Hartford programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the former composition having been presented at the concert given on April 7, 1914, while the Bruch Aria was sung by Mme. Marie Sundelius at the concert of November 26, 1914.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is a panorama of the musical universe. The listener is conducted to the top of an high mountain whence is spread out in immeasurable reaches to the parapets of space a vast landscape of musical creation. The work is absolute music; and, being absolute music rather than program music in the ordinary sense of the word, what the listener sees or hears in it will describe his own imagination and define the dimensions of his own musical development and understanding.

Dr. Muck brought forward a masterly conception of the work. There was no slavish adherence to tradition, but tradition was reverenced. There was the finest of scholarship, but scholarship was veiled and mantled in the shining vestments of inspiration and artistic comprehension. The Beethoven who, of all composers, dwells apart in the infinity of time was revealed in all his majestic composure; but there was also the Beethoven of cataclysmic [illegible] energy. It were a consum-ership of this entire symphony, and of its second movement in particular.

For Dr. Muck with the brain and with the soul of a great artist divines the subtle relationship which should exist between musical effect and its physical portrayal through the conductor's art. Conductors there are who suggest Mrs. Jarley's celebrities or magnetized manikins; others who, whether in the production of crescendo and accelerando or diminuendo and retard passages apparently suffer from acute internal disorders. And there are conductors who seem to be chiefly conscious of an overwhelming conviction that they are before a universal camera.

Now conducting is not conducting in any really useful or vitally necessary sense till the conductor first of all things has put far from him all thought save only of the music in hand. Nor is conducting in any high sense conducting till it takes on the significance of a physical portrayal of the intellectual and emotional contents of the art product which it seeks to delineate. And herein lies the explanation of the fact that there are very few great conductors. Therein lies the warrant for pronouncing Dr. Karl Muck a conspicuous member of that small but highly distinguished company.

The orchestra played throughout the evening as the Boston Symphony orchestra alone of American orchestras can play. There were moments of highly spectacular virtuosity in the last movement of the symphony, in the Rimsky-Korsakoff work, and in the Weber overture. But virtuosity bending itself to ends infinitely more important than its own exploitation became the obedient servant of lofty orchestral art. Certain unavoidable slips involved in some of the terrific tempi demanded by Dr. Muck were too trifling seriously to affect the sum total of superb interpretative achievement.

Miss Hinkle is a singer possessed of a very beautiful voice, indeed, exquisitely schooled and exquisitely managed. The singing last evening, from any and every artistic viewpoint, was a distinguished and wholly admirable exemplification of the fine art of song.

◆

RESS

New York City

1 1915

on Symphony Orchestra.

cond pair of concerts by the ymphony Orchestra will be Carnegie Hall on Thursday December 2, and Saturday December 4. At both conoloist will be Fritz Kreisler. evening he will play Beetncerto; Saturday afternoon o in E minor, No. 22, by etti.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be performed on Thursday evening. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be devoted almost entirely to music of the eighteenth century.

34

COURANT

Hartford, Conn.

NOV 7 - 1915

ON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Orchestra is ional institution. New York long ago proclaimed the importf so wonderful an aggregation rformers and, with a host of home attractions, accepted the work of the Boston players as their musical standard. Probably no body of instrumentalists has ever been assembled with greater care or rehearsed more diligently by the world's most gifted conductors, covering a period of nearly thirty-five years. The music-loving public finds delight in such orchestral virtuosity and recognizes in Dr. Karl Muck an interpreter capable of using his orchestra more effectively than any of his predecessors. This orchestra is as one performer under the baton of a brilliant conductor. The 1915-1916 series of three concerts at the Parsons Theater will be opened Monday evening, November 15. The soloist on this occasion will be Miss Florence Hinkle, the most popular among American concert singers of the day. Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

Special, New and Beautiful Free Souvenirs for "Hartford Week" at the Anniversary Sale. Wise, Smith & Co. —Advt.

84

IBUNE

Providence, R. I.

NOV 17 1915

A HARTLEY SOLOIST

n Symphony Orchestra Concert Nov. 23.

artley, who will be the soloist ond Boston Symphony Orches in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, is expected to make something of a sensation. It will be her first appearance here and if her success elsewhere is repeated she will quickly become a favorite. She has chosen one of the most delightful concertos for piano in the literature of music, the second of Saint-Saen's in G-minor, which is particularly famous for its delightful, sparkling Scherzo. The rest of the programme maintains the high standard that Dr. Muck has made in the past.

From BROOKLYN EDIT AMERICAN

Address: New York City

Date NOV 21 1915

Boston Symphony to Feature Kreisler

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, December 3d. The soloist will be the ever-popular Fritz Kreisler, who will play Brahms's Concerto in D Major. A most interesting item on the programme that Dr. Muck has arranged is the Symphonic Poem "The Island of the Dead," by the Russian composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Estab 84

From TIMES

Address Hartford, Conn.

Date NOV 11 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The concert at Parsons's theater next Monday night will be the first of three by the famous Boston orchestra and it is needless to say the return of the great orchestra will be warmly welcomed. The occasion will also serve as an introduction of Miss Florence Hinkle to our public after repeated successes in nearly every other musical center of the United States. She is one of the few artists who possess that indefinable something that enable them to satisfy, alike the trained musician and the lover of music who is not versed in the art. The Boston Globe says: "Her voice is of uncommon, exceeding rare beauty. There are no breaks or apparent boundary line of register." The Philadelphia Record: "She has a voice so rarely beautiful that she has been declared by many persons the finest soprano in the country."

The program for Monday's concert offers material for enjoyment of all music lovers.

Reserved seats on sale at Gallup & Alfred's store.

Esta 884

TIMES
New York City

Established

Two of the most valuable yearly publications on music in this country are the bound volumes of the program books of the Boston and Chicago Symphony Orchestras, respectively. The volume from Boston relates to the thirty-fourth season. Mr. Philip Hale's notes on these programs are well known to New York. The complete command of every known source of information about the music played and its composers, historical, biographical, and aesthetic, and the interest, the originality, fancy, and suggestiveness of Mr. Hale's analytical commentary, are such as are to be met with in no other publication of the kind. Mr. Felix Borowski is the editor of the Chicago notes, which are produced with skill and knowledge. Mr. Borowski has the advantage of using frequently musical notation of themes in his analyses. The volume at hand contains the programs of the twenty-fourth season. A feature that makes it of inestimable value for reference is a cumulative index, that lists every piece of music performed by the orchestra since its foundation, giving the seasons in which it was performed. Twenty-eight programs are contained in the book, besides seven given in the "popular series" outside of the regular season. They show the wide catholicity of taste and the skill in program-making that Mr. Stock inherited from his great predecessor.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 15 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Precisely at 8:15 o'clock to-night the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Karl Muck will commence the series of three concerts at Parsons's theater. The soloist for this event will be Miss Florence Hinkle, one of the most popular sopranos on the concert stage. The program is a delightful one and affords material for all tastes. A wonderful performance is always to be expected from the Boston players who from all reports are excelling all previous efforts. Patrons should endeavor to be seated before the hour of the concert in order to enjoy the first movement of the symphony. Entrance to gallery will be open at 7:30 o'clock.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 22 1915

Tom Daly's Column

Music and the Manly Art

We found on our desk this morning a typewritten sheet, with no marks to indicate its origin, which read as follows:

On the return of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, from Wilmington, where the orchestra had been playing, he discovered that there had been a fire at his home during the night. With his usual capacity for picking out the salient points of an event, Mr. Stokowski said: "This fire was a very remarkable and discreet one. Besides burning a few other things, it completely destroyed a bookcase and all of the books with the exception of one. This one book was a bound volume of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs. By this we learn that the Boston Symphony programs are not as dry as we had supposed."

We print this because we believe in advertising the Philadelphia Orchestra, but we'd be willing to bet our princely wage against a jitney that Leopold never said that. Leopold once confided to us that his mother was a descendant of Tom Moore, the bard of Erin, and so he's got too much Irish blood in him to forget the necessity of keeping the jaw protected. What, some one might inquire, were the dry programs that burned so readily?

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 21 1915

By Pierre V. R. Key.

TURNING points, when they are of the progressive sort, are welcome to either individuals or organizations. When they assume notable importance they stimulate and encourage to a degree difficult to fully estimate. On this account the advantageous turning point in the affairs of the Philharmonic Society of New York, which has now been reached, makes pertinent a consideration of these elements that have brought it to pass and the significance of the turning point itself. Gone are the days when this orchestra had to worry along on a co-operative basis which often brought hardship to the playing members who could attend rehearsals only through the sacrifice of money which might have been earned by employing their time in other ways. Gone, too, are the days when any season deficit required these musicians to divide among themselves whatever loss was involved.

Public-spirited citizens who started the movement seven years ago to place the Philharmonic Orchestra on a permanent basis wherein an annual guaranty fund was made available should experience a sense of pride in what that endeavor has encompassed. First, because the oldest orchestra in America is financially more secure than at any previous time in its existence, and second, for the reason that it has grown artistically into one of the finest bodies of its kind to be found.

Competent judges willing to weigh and pronounce impartially must admit that the Philharmonic concerts have become so vital a factor in the musical life of this community as to be a positive necessity. New York never has needed this institution as it needs it now. And the proof of this particular pudding lies in its having been eaten sufficiently of late to prove it both palatable and nutritious.

No more convincing evidence to this effect is required than may be had from the increased patronage, which has brought from subscriptions 25 per cent. more than that of last season. The single-ticket sale has been similarly gratifying, so much so that including the subscribers the audiences of the first three concerts this fall were complete "sell outs" and the two others within hailing distance of that happy state of affairs.

If this business progress continues, and there is every reason to feel that it will continue, the annual deficit can soon be met with the interest derived from the Joseph Pulitzer $1,000,000 fund. When it is recalled that only a few years ago the annual loss sustained by the Philharmonic reached as high a figure as $80,000, the reduction of this amount by almost one-half is encouraging. But the growth in stability should not cause the New York public to forget that the attendances are still smaller than they should be.

While a number of persons are entitled to the credit for lifting the Philharmonic from the musical slough in which it struggled so long, there are two who should be singled out for notice because each has done so much—one for the artistic side, the other for the business. These men are Conductor Josef Stransky and Business Manager Felix F. Leifels. Working harmoniously together, these men may feel that to their zeal, in considerable measure, is due the present strong position of an organization whose future is destined to exert a potent influence upon other cities as well as New York.

Mr. Stransky is not, in our opinion, a great conductor, though unquestionably a sound musician. His superiority arises in his keen knowledge of the elements that constitute a first-class symphony orchestra, an ability to select and reject members suitable for his needs and a rare talent for painstakingly effective drilling that brings results. Mr. Stransky doesn't know the meaning of the word lazy. He is tireless himself, and by his example he has not only elevated the playing standard of the men who were of the Philharmonic when he took it four years ago, but he has made of himself an abler director and one whose interpretations often reach an admirable mark.

After hearing last Sunday's Philharmonic the reviewer for The World believes the orchestra has at last reached a stage of development justifying its being ranked with the great symphonic societies. Signs that Mr. Stransky's musicians were steadily expanding in that direction had been observed for two successive seasons, but until this fall the artistic height which was being striven for had not been attained.

Three first violin players, three seconds, a double bass, a first trumpet, a first bassoon and a second oboe comprise the new instrumentalists who replaced those discarded. In 1914 two first and two second violins and two 'cellos were secured to serve for the men who were unable to conform to the higher standard that was being exacted.

It is interesting to learn that seventy violinists undertook the examinations for Philharmonic positions, one of the principal qualifications being that the applicant to be acceptable must own an instrument of fine tone. Most of the seventy candidates failed to qualify in the test imposed by an endeavor to play part of the Leonore overture No. 3, which Mr. Stransky used for the purpose of determining the violinist's technical execution and rhythmic sense. The second test—for tone—was the slow movement from Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony and the sight reading task brought before the applicant the music of Strauss's "Don Quixote" and the "Ride of the Walkueres."

As the Philharmonic Orchestra personnel now exists it is susceptible of still greater development in those qualities which make the Boston Symphony the pre-eminent organization of the world. And while many people will undoubtedly declare the statement rank heresy, the fact is evident that the Philharmonic is not so great a distance behind the Boston musicians as some believe and that the Philharmonic concerts are vastly superior to those the Boston orchestra has given New York during the past year.

No expert questions the individual excellence—and a superlative excellence it is—of the strings, the wood winds and the brasses of Dr. Muck's superb organization. No one who knows denies that it is polished and finished to virtually the last degree possible. No one, moreover, disputes the precision of the Bostonians in the attack and execution of a phrase. But there were few of last season's Boston Symphony concerts that did not leave the hearer cold at the end, something recent Philharmonic concerts have not done because they have tonal warmth, a vital spontaneity and an equalization of balance between the several instrumental sections which imparts to the music they perform elements which cannot be denied.

When conditions permit, the Society should find financial support enabling it to secure ground and build a home of its own with an auditorium of size suitable to the playing of symphonic music under conditions more ideal than those that now obtain in Carnegie Hall. A hall seating 2,000, which can be reached from the street level, would be welcomed by the public, and if it can be secured it will serve as an income-producing property which will put the Philharmonic in even a stronger place than it now occupies.

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 7 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A recent tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra throughout the Middle West broke all records for attendance, in seven concerts playing before 3,000 people, this following closely an equally successful series of thirteen concerts at the San Francisco Fair has served to heighten interest in its concerts everywhere. The "Sun" writer, last Friday, expressed a hope to some day visit the other side of the Atlantic, in the following words—

> Now at any rate New Yorkers may be pleased with the knowledge that the West and the gold coast have heard the lyric eloquence of the orchestra from the Back Bay. Let us hope that some day, when the swords of Europe have been sheathed again, this national orchestra may be heard in the concert halls on the other side of the Atlantic. With it may be carried the message that this body of musicians of all nations has throughout the dark days kept alive here the best traditions of the musical art of lands where art is silenced by the shrieking of the songs of battle.

The first concert of the Hartford series of three will be given at the Parsons Theater on Monday evening, November 15. Reserved seats for this, or all three concerts may now be obtained at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first of three concerts of 1915-16 season will be given at Parsons's theater next Monday night. Praises of Dr. Muck and his great orchestra have been sung from coast to coast and their part of the program is never disappointing. Monday night's concert, has an added attraction in Miss Florence Hinkle, the brilliant American soprano, who will appear as soloist. While a young artist, her services are in constant demand by all the leading musical organizations and in many instances where she has appeared the critical reviewers have taken occasion to state that Miss Hinkle is one of the best sopranos ever heard on the concert stage. Her voice is a pure, lyric soprano of smooth, velvety texture. It is not only delightfully sympathetic in quality, but has the timbre that makes it unfailingly effective in music of dramatic character that calls for dramatic power. She will sing with the orchestra the air, "Voie che sapeto," from Mozart's opera "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Ave Maria" from Bruch's "Cross of Fire" cantata. The demand for reserved seats at Gallup & Alfred's music store indicates unusual interest in the coming event.

[48]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 21 1915
Established.

Music

Music lovers, hereabouts, are rejoicin just now, in an abundance of the bes sort of music and the two superb concerts of the past week will be followed by yet others in the week to come.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given next Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, in Infantry Hall, promises many delights for lovers of music. It brings as soloist, a young American woman new to this city, who may safely be regarded as one of the finest women pianists now on the concert stage. Moreover, Dr. Muck has arranged with his usual skill, a programme nicely balanced in contrasting moods.

The Symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms, that in E-minor. This was the last work of the kind that Brahms gave to the world and in many respects it was the most difficult from the popular point of view. Wherefore, it has been slower in making its way in the affections of the public, but Brahms is no longer regarded as pedantic, dry and cryptic. It was a false tradition in the beginning started by incompetent conductors and no one has done more to bring Brahms into his righteous popularity than Dr. Muck, who has always found him an intensely human composer. The Symphony is particularly famous for the beauty of its slow movement and the unusual form of its last movement which is based on an ancient dance called the Passacaglia.

The second half of the programme is devoted entirely to Frenchmen, the composers being Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Bizet—the three greatest names in French music. Berlioz is represented by his "Roman Carnival" overture, that brilliant attractive music which depicts so truly the gaiety and the light-heartedness of the carnival as it was in Rome when the Romans were less modern and sophisticated than they are to-day. Saint-Saens will be represented by his beautiful Concerto in G-minor, No. 2, for piano and orchestra, the Concerto which is particularly notable for its sparkling Scherzo which demands the fleetest and lightest of fingers. This, Miss Hartley will play.

The final number will be the exquisite First "L'Arlesienne" Suite of Bizet, the immortal composer of "Carmer [illegible] These are pieces taken from the mus[illegible] e wrote incidental to Daudet's famo[illegible] play, "L'Arlesienne," or in English [illegible] W[illegible]n of Arles." That the pl[illegible] n[illegible] a success does not signify. But it does signify that its frequent revivals are due almost entirely to the music which Bizet wrote for it. The suite is in four parts comprising a prelude, a minuetto, an adagietto and a carillon. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, Brahms; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for piano in G-minor, No. 2, Saint-Saens; suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 1, Bizet. Soloist, Laeta Hartley.

MONITOR, BOSTON

NOVEMBER 20,

SYMPHONY MEN WIN APPLAUSE IN BRUCKNER WORK

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; Nov. 19. The program; Bruckner, seventh symphony, E major; Mozart, concertante for violin and viola (Anton Witek, violin; Emil Ferir, viola).

Conductor and players gave every evidence of having prepared their reading of the vast symphony with care. And for their efforts they received the reward of vigorous applause. Nearly the full membership was required for the sonorous first number, only the player of some light-toned instrument like the harp having a holiday. The greatest praise of the occasion was doubtless to those who furnished the largest amount of tone. At all events the majority of the men in the brass and woodwind groups were allowed to rest on their Bruckner laurels. Only string players and oboe and horn pairs were required for the Mozart piece in the second part of the program.

Such a contrast as the conductor obtained by presenting these two numbers together may be esthetically justifiable and it may not. But the combination was impressive, if not wholly pleasing; and it brought up vividly the question as to the purpose and method of composers of the Bruckner type, who stand for orchestral assertion, or to put it in phraseology of the day, for musical egotism, as against the purpose and method of those, who, like Mozart, stand for contemplation. Every time one of the modern symphonies of large plan is performed, listeners are obliged to ask themselves what the bigness of it means, and to ask further; where it originated and what it is leading to. Now the assertion of the big idea they will find, if musical criticism and history have been correctly written, begins with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, or if not with that, then with his fifth symphony. It starts with that composer's discovering the availability of the development of short themes for expressive instead of for merely formal uses. And the most powerful representatives of the egotistical idea in music ever since have been those who knew best how to handle short themes. Berlioz is one of these. Liszt is the most resourceful of all. Bruckner is a diligent though not a profoundly inspired master in the number. Strauss is the most graphic and convincing. Mahler is the most fluent.

There have been composers who used the short theme in their writing but who are not of the egotists. Schubert and Schumann are of this number. The assertive quality does not necessarily inhere in the short theme, but it gets voiced chiefly thereby. It is forced to the front constantly in the seventh symphony of Bruckner, except in the beautiful lyrical passages of the slow movement. It is shouted in ascending scale by every brass instrument and echoed back in decending scale.

The Symphony orchestra has done its most magnificent work in the past decade in music of the assertive kind. It has made the doctrine of the short theme which Beethoven promulgated the rule of art. At this concert it summed up the points of that teaching with a mastery that left nothing unsaid. The program might have been more satisfactory as a whole if the second number had also represented the egotistical side of the argument. If contrast of epochs were wanted, Beethoven had been a more suitable classic than Mozart to go with Bruckner.

MUSIC NOTES

At the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 12, in Symphony hall Dr. Muck is going to present lighter works than have hitherto characterized his programs. These include the Straus 'Blue Danube" waltzes, the Delibes "Silvia" ballet music and the Rossini "William Tell" overture. But the program will not all be light, for on it is found a symphony, the fifth of Tschaikowsky.

As a result of the interest shown in the trial of the singing class methods of the People's Choral Union at a concert last week in the Henry L. Pierce school, Dorchester, a regular class is to be started next Friday night in the Dorchester high school. The city is to provide the building with heat, light and other service.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date [illegible] 1 4 1915
Est 84

BUSINESS MAN WRITES SEASON'S MUSIC NOVELTY

"Adventures in a Perambulator," the Work of John A. Carpenter, of Chicago, Makes a Hit.

THERE is an old story with the scene laid in Paris, or Berlin, or Milan, or some other old world musical centre of a young composer living in a garret, starving, struggling for fame, but always composing music by day and by night. He might beg, borrow or even steal, but go out and look for work—never.

In America it is different. Picture a large manufacturing concern with an office force running up into scores. Perhaps the manager, the president or even the office boy is an American composer. The writer of this article knows one native composer who is an antique dealer, and another who is an auctioneer, but he cannot recall a single composer of grand operas, of symphonic music or of serious songs who makes the latter work his means of livelihood. In this country music is written in spare hours or during vacations, but never during business hours.

No one in this country has attracted so much attention as a composer of serious music during the last three years as John [illegible] New York he was a stranger until Mme. Julia Culp presented at one of her recitals season before last two of his songs, "The Sleep That Flits on Baby's Eyes" and "When I Bring You Colored Toys," both set to texts by Rabindranath Tagore, though during the season previous his violin sonata was played here at a private concert.

Last week, starting with a performance of his first and only orchestral work, "Adventures in a Perambulator," played last Sunday by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall under the direction of Walter Damrosch, more than a half a dozen of his works have been presented to local audiences. However, Mr. Carpenter is not a musician by profession, but is a business man. His line is railroad and marine supplies. He is vice president of George B. Carpenter & Co., his father's concern. At half-past eight every morning he is at his desk and does not leave until five. All of his musical studies since he was graduated from Harvard in 1897, except for a few months in England spent with Sir Edward Elgar, have been carried on outside of office hours. His music has been written evenings and holidays.

Mr. Carpenter is thirty-nine years old and is just beginning to establish a reputation for himself in musical matters. He has acquired an unusually fine command of the art of orchestration, but above all he has originality in musical ideas. Who knows what he might have accomplished had he made composing his profession and business!

Practically all American composers have composed only during spare moments. Many of them have been teachers. Edward MacDowell during his most prosperous years was the head of the school of music of Columbia University. Horatio Parker, composed of two ten thousand dollar prize operas, "Mona," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, and "Fairyland," produced in Los Angeles last summer, is the dean of music at Yale, and George Chadwick, the writer of some of the best American orchestra works, is the director of the New England Conservatory of Music. Rubin Goldmark, composer of a large orchestra work. "Samson," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra two seasons ago and soon to be repeated at a Philharmonic Society concert, teaches musical theory about ten hours a day. Conductors of orchestras often compose music. Walter Damrosch has written an opera, "Cyrano"; a song, "Danny Deever," and many other works, and Henry Hadley, formerly conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Ochestra, has written several symphonies. Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, also composes music.

Albert Spalding, writer of violin music, plays the violin, and John Powell, writer of violin and piano music, plays the piano. Many writers of choral music play the organ. Piano accompanists are often song writers. Singers, however, seldom write music.

In Chicago several music critics are composers, and here A. Walter Kramer, Clarence Lucas and Arthur Farwell not only write music but write articles about it. Victor Herbert did not make a fortune from his grand operas, "Natoma," and "Madelein," his sonata for 'cello and orchestra or his serious orchestra works, but has devoted most of his attention to writing light operettas. Manufacturing rag time is not an artistic profession, but it is sometimes a profitable business. Conversely, writing grand operas and symphonic poems is not a profitable business but it may be an artistic profession.

Moral:—If you would be a serious American composer first obtain a remunerative business position, and then pass your spare time, vacations, holidays, evenings Sundays and luncheon hours composing music.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 17 1915
Establ 4

Major Higginson is Anti-German, But He Cannot Do Without Their "Kultur".

Referring to Major Higginson's anti-German attitude, as disclosed in his remarks printed yesterday, an old friend of the Morgen-Herold sends us the following communication: "Major Henry L. Higginson sponsor of the Boston Symphony— a non-Union orchestra—draws largely on Europe for its membership. Mr. Joseph Weber, President of the American Federation of Musicians is said to have recently issued a statement to the effect that the salaries paid by the Boston Symphony are generally under union rates. The predominant element in the Boston Symphony is Teutonic, and, as Mr. Higginson must know, because of their better musical 'Kultur'. This eminent philanthropist's recent proposition, made at the dinner of the Boston Credit Men's Association at Young's Hotel, wherein he admitted that he realized thatits adoption would prevent all German immigrants from becoming U. S. citizens, is naive to say the least. Perhaps such a condition might be best for him and his pet organization? Perhaps when these immigrants, heretofore, became American citizens they also looked for American wages? Then, perhaps, it might be best to play shuttlecock with them!

"Ever since the Boston Symphony became famous it has had none but Teutonic conductors. The present incumbent, Dr. Kar Muck, who bears the title of K u. K. Hofopernkapellmeister, no doubt will gladly verify that, last year, at his solicitation the German government released 14 of its subjects, who were all fit for military service, so that they might come over here and inoculate us with some of the detested German 'Kultur' through the medium of Mr. Higginson's Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Higginson really ought to put this up to the Washington government. It certainly is unneutral and has the

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date NOV 13 1915
Establi

STRANSKY TALKS OF THE PHILHARMONIC

WANTS NEW YORK TO TAKE PRIDE IN ITS GREAT ORCHESTRA.

Conductor Regards Organization as a Civic Institution and Would End Odious Comparisons with Boston Symphony—Says the Critics Should Guide and Educate the Public, Not Merely Point Out Artists' Flaws—Audiences Are Growing.

If Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society orchestra, had not entered upon a musica career, it is not a bad guess that he would have made a good diplomat. In an interview to-day, Mr. Stransky neatly put an end to the time-honored Boston Symphony-Philharmonic controversy—so far as he was concerned. The talk was of New York and its great orchestra and of the duty of New Yorkers—not forgetting the critics—toward their great orchestra. And, as is inevitable, apparently, whenever two or three music lovers are gathered together, the question of the orchestral rivalry between Boston and New York thrust itself into the discussion. In was unavoidable. The surprising thing was that Mr. Stransky seemed almost to welcome it. Boston Symphony or Philharmonic, which?

"Let this be my answer," said Mr. Stransky. "It is no reflection upon Julius Cæsar that Columbus discovered America."

"Remember," he went on, "what the student said when asked which was the greater, Goethe or Schiller: 'Don't bother me with such questions. Be glad we have two such great men with us.' It is so with our orchestras. Let us not draw comparisons. Let us rather enjoy them both to the full, and not spoil them by petty partisanships and prejudices. I repeat, it is no reflection upon Julius Cæsar that Columbus discovered America."

AUDIENCES HAVE GROWN.

This is the beginning of Mr. Stransky's fifth season with the Philharmonic. When he took charge in 1911, the orchestra's weekly concerts, though of a high order, enjoyed nothing like the patronage that they claim to-day.

"The increase in the size of our audiences," said Mr. Stransky, "has been far greater than could possibly have been foreseen by the directors or myself. Of all the changes that have taken place, this has been the most remarkable. People sometimes say, 'How is it that the Boston Symphony concerts are sold out in advance and yours are not?' At our last Thursday night's concert the attendance was exactly 2,670. Yesterday afternoon, the programme was repeated to an audience numbering 2,626. A total of 5,296 persons have heard the Philharmonic play this week. The attendance at the opening concerts last week was nearly as large. In the two weeks of the present season, therefore, more than 10,000 have come to hear us. Can the Boston orchestra equal this?

"We give fifty-four concerts a year in New York and Brooklyn. The Boston Symphony gives ten. We give the same programme twice each week, the Boston Symphony only once. Is it any wonder that one should be sold out in advance and the other not?

"As a matter of fact, our audiences to-day are four times as large as they were in 1911. Then, the Thursday boxes were only partly subscribed for. Now they are all sold out for the season. I am not permitted to give the exact number, but I can say that the subscriptions this year have increased over those of last season by five figures."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 21 1915

Established.

MUSIC

Music lovers, hereabouts, are rejoicin just now, in an abundance of the bes sort of music and the two superb con certs of the past week will be followe by yet others in the week to come.

The second concert of the Bostor Symphony Orchestra which will be giver next Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, in Infantry Hall, promises many delights for lovers of music. It brings as soloist, a young American woman new to this city, who may safely be regarded as one of the finest women pianists now on the concert stage. Moreover, Dr. Muck has arranged with his usual skill, a programme nicely balanced in contrasting moods.

The Symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms, that in E-minor. This was the last work of the kind that Brahms gave to the world and in many respects it was the most difficult from the popular point of view. Wherefore, it has been slower in making its way in the affections of the public, but Brahms is no longer regarded as pedantic, dry and cryptic. It was a false tradition in the beginning started by incompetent conductors and no one has done more to bring Brahms into his righteous popularity than Dr. Muck, who has always found him an intensely human composer. The Symphony is particularly famous for the beauty of its slow movement and the unusual form of its last movement which is based on an ancient dance called the Passacaglia.

The second half of the programme is devoted entirely to Frenchmen, the composers being Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Bizet—the three greatest names in French music. Berlioz is represented by his "Roman Carnival" overture, that brilliant attractive music which depicts so truly the gaiety and the light-heartedness of the carnival as it was in Rome when the Romans were less modern and sophisticated than they are to-day. Saint-Saens will be represented by his beautiful Concerto in G-minor, No. 2, for piano and orchestra, the Concerto which is particularly notable for its sparkling Scherzo which demands the fleetest and lightest of fingers. This, Miss Hartley will play.

The final number will be the exquisite First "L'Arlesienne" Suite of Bizet, the immortal composer of "Carmen." These are pieces taken from the music he wrote incidental to Daudet's famous play, "L'Arlesienne," or in English [illegible] "The Woman of Arles." That the play [illegible] not a success does not signify. But it does signify that its frequent revivals are due almost entirely to the music which Bizet wrote for it. The suite is in four parts comprising a prelude, a minuetto, an adagietto and a carillon. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, Brahms; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for piano in G-minor, No. 2, Saint-Saens; suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 1, Bizet. Soloist, Laeta Hartley.

MONITOR, BOSTON

NOVEMBER 20,

SYMPHONY MEN WIN APPLAUSE IN BRUCKNER WORK

SYMPHONY HALL—Fifth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; Nov. 19. The program; Bruckner, seventh symphony, in E major; Mozart, concertante for violin and viola (Anton Witek, violin; Emil Ferir, viola).

Conductor and players gave every evidence of having prepared their reading of the vast symphony with care. And for their efforts they received the reward of vigorous applause. Nearly the full membership was required for the sonorous first number, only the player of some light-toned instrument like the harp having a holiday. The greatest praise of the occasion was doubtless to those who furnished the largest amount of tone. At all events the majority of the men in the brass and woodwind groups were allowed to rest on their Bruckner laurels. Only string players and oboe and horn pairs were required for the Mozart piece in the second part of the program.

Such a contrast as the conductor obtained by presenting these two numbers together may be esthetically justifiable and it may not. But the combination was impressive, if not wholly pleasing; and it brought up vividly the question as to the purpose and method of composers of the Bruckner type, who stand for orchestral assertion, or to put it in phraseology of the day, for musical egotism, as against the purpose and method of those, who, like Mozart, stand for contemplation. Every time one of the modern symphonies of large plan is performed, listeners are obliged to ask themselves what the bigness of it means, and to ask further; where it originated and what it is leading to. Now the assertion of the big idea they will find, if musical criticism and history have been correctly written, begins with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, or if not with that, then with his fifth symphony. It starts with that composer's discovering the availability of the development of short themes for expressive instead of for merely formal uses. And the most powerful representatives of the egotistical idea in music ever since have been those who knew best how to handle short themes. Berlioz is one of these. Liszt is the most resourceful of all. Bruckner is a diligent though not a profoundly inspired master in the number. Strauss is the most graphic and convincing. Mahler is the most fluent.

There have been composers who used the short theme in their writing but who are not of the egotists. Schubert and Schumann are of this number. The assertive quality does not necessarily inhere in the short theme, but it gets voiced chiefly thereby. It is forced to the front constantly in the seventh symphony of Bruckner, except in the beautiful lyrical passages of the slow movement. It is shouted in ascending scale by every brass instrument and echoed back in decending scale.

The Symphony orchestra has done its most magnificent work in the past decade in music of the assertive kind. It has made the doctrine of the short theme which Beethoven promulgated the rule of art. At this concert it summed up the points of that teaching with a mastery that left nothing unsaid. The program might have been more satisfactory as a whole if the second number had also represented the egotistical side of the argument. If contrast of epochs were wanted, Beethoven had been a more suitable classic than Mozart to go with Bruckner.

MUSIC NOTES

At the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 12, in Symphony hall Dr. Muck is going to present lighter works than have hitherto characterized his programs. These include the Straus "Blue Danube" waltzes, the Delibes "Silvia" ballet music and the Rossini "William Tell" overture. But the program will not all be light, for on it is found a symphony, the fifth of Tschaikowsky.

As a result of the interest shown in the trial of the singing class methods of the People's Choral Union at a concert last week in the Henry L. Pierce school, Dorchester, a regular class is to be started next Friday night in the Dorchester high school. The city is to provide the building with heat, light and other service.

HERALD
s: New York City
14 1915

ISINESS MAN RITES SEASON'S MUSIC NOVELTY

"Adventures in a Perambulator," the Work of John A. Carpenter, of Chicago, Makes a Hit.

THERE is an old story with the scene laid in Paris, or Berlin, or Milan, or some other old world musical centre of a young composer living in a garret, starving, struggling for fame, but always composing music by day and by night. He might beg, borrow or even steal, but go out and look for work—never.

In America it is different. Picture a large manufacturing concern with an office force running up into scores. Perhaps the manager, the president or even the office boy is an American composer. The writer of this article knows one native composer who is an antique dealer, and another who is an auctioneer, but he cannot recall a single composer of grand operas, of symphonic music or of serious songs who makes the latter work his means of livelihood. In this country music is written in spare hours or during vacations, but never during business hours.

No one in this country has attracted so much attention as a composer of serious music during the last three years as John [illegible] York he was a stranger until Mme. Julia Culp presented at one of her recitals season before last two of his songs, "The Sleep That Flits on Baby's Eyes" and "When I Bring You Colored Toys," both set to texts by Rabindranath Tagore, though during the season previous his violin sonata was played here at a private concert.

Last week, starting with a performance of his first and only orchestral work, "Adventures in a Perambulator," played last Sunday by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall under the direction of Walter Damrosch, more than a half a dozen of his works have been presented to local audiences. However, Mr. Carpenter is not a musician by profession, but is a business man. His line is railroad and marine supplies. He is vice president of George B. Carpenter & Co., his father's concern. At half-past eight every morning he is at his desk and does not leave until five. All of his musical studies since he was graduated from Harvard in 1897, except for a few months in England spent with Sir Edward Elgar, have been carried on outside of office hours. His music has been written evenings and holidays.

Mr. Carpenter is thirty-nine years old and is just beginning to establish a reputation for himself in musical matters. He has acquired an unusually fine command of the art of orchestration, but above all he has originality in musical ideas. Who knows what he might have accomplished had he made composing his profession and business!

Practically all American composers have composed only during spare moments. Many of them have been teachers. Edward MacDowell during his most prosperous years was the head of the school of music of Columbia University. Horatio Parker, composed of two ten thousand dollar prize operas, "Mona," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, and "Fairyland," produced in Los Angeles last summer, is the dean of music at Yale, and George Chadwick, the writer of some of the best American orchestra works, is the director of the New England Conservatory of Music. Rubin Goldmark, composer of a large orchestra work, "Samson," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra two seasons ago and soon to be repeated at a Philharmonic Society concert, teaches musical theory about ten hours a day. Conductors of orchestras often compose music. Walter Damrosch has written an opera, "Cyrano"; a song, "Danny Deever," and many other works, and Henry Hadley, formerly conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Ochestra, has written several symphonies. Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, also composes music.

Albert Spalding, writer of violin music, plays the violin, and John Powell, writer of violin and piano music, plays the piano. Many writers of choral music play the organ. Piano accompanists are often song writers. Singers, however, seldom write music.

In Chicago several music critics are composers, and here A. Walter Kramer, Clarence Lucas and Arthur Farwell not only write music but write articles about it. Victor Herbert did not make a fortune from his grand operas, "Natoma," and "Madelein," his sonata for 'cello and orchestra or his serious orchestra works, but has devoted most of his attention to writing light operettas. Manufacturing rag time is not an artistic profession, but it is sometimes a profitable business. Conversely, writing grand operas and symphonic poems is not a profitable business but it may be an artistic profession.

Moral:—If you would be a serious American composer first obtain a remunerative business position, and then pass your spare time, vacations, holidays, evenings Sundays and luncheon hours composing music.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 17 191

Establ

Major Higginson is Anti-Germ But He Cannot Do Witho Their "Kultur".

Referring to Major Higgi son's anti-German attitude, disclosed in his remarks printe yesterday, an old friend of th Morgen-Herold sends us the following communication: "Major Henry L. Higginson sponsor of the Boston Symphony— a non-Union orchestra—draws largely on Europe for its membership. Mr. Joseph Weber, President of the American Federation of Musicians is said to have recently issued a statement to the effect that the salaries paid by the Boston Symphony are generally under union rates. The predominant element in the Boston Symphony is Teutonic, and, as Mr. Higginson must know, because of their better musical 'Kultur'. This eminent philanthropist's recent proposition, made at the dinner of the Boston Credit Men's Association at Young's Hotel, wherein he admitted that he realized thatits adoption would prevent all German immigrants from becoming U. S. citizens, is naive to say the least. Perhaps such a condition might be best for him and his pet organization? Perhaps when these immigrants, heretofore, became American citizens they also looked for American wages? Then, perhaps, it might be best to play shuttlecock with them?

"Ever since the Boston Symphony became famous it has had none but Teutonic conductors. The present incumbent, Dr. Karl Muck, who bears the title of K. u. K. Hofopernkapellmeister, no doubt will gladly verify that, last year, at his solicitation the German government released 14 of its subjects, who were all fit for military service, so that they might come over here and inoculate us with some of the detested German 'Kultur' through the medium of Mr. Higginson's Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Higginson really ought to put this up to the Washington government. It certainly is unneutral and has the [illegible]

EVENING POST
: New York City
NOV 13 1915

STRANSKY TALKS OF THE PHILHARMONIC

WANTS NEW YORK TO TAKE PRIDE IN ITS GREAT ORCHESTRA.

Conductor Regards Organization as a Civic Institution and Would End Odious Comparisons with Boston Symphony—Says the Critics Should Guide and Educate the Public, Not Merely Point Out Artists' Flaws—Audiences Are Growing.

If Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society orchestra, had not entered upon a musical career, it is not a bad guess that he would have made a good diplomat. In an interview to-day, Mr. Stransky neatly put an end to the time-honored Boston Symphony-Philharmonic controversy—so far as he was concerned. The talk was of New York and its great orchestra and of the duty of New Yorkers—not forgetting the critics—toward their great orchestra. And, as is inevitable, apparently, whenever two or three music lovers are gathered together, the question of the orchestral rivalry between Boston and New York thrust itself into the discussion. In was unavoidable. The surprising thing was that Mr. Stransky seemed almost to welcome it. Boston Symphony or Philharmonic, which?

"Let this be my answer," said Mr. Stransky. "It is no reflection upon Julius Cæsar that Columbus discovered America."

"Remember," he went on, "what the student said when asked which was the greater, Goethe or Schiller: 'Don't bother me with such questions. Be glad we have two such great men with us.' It is so with our orchestras. Let us not draw comparisons. Let us rather enjoy them both to the full, and not spoil them by petty partisanships and prejudices. I repeat, it is no reflection upon Julius Cæsar that Columbus discovered America."

AUDIENCES HAVE GROWN.

This is the beginning of Mr. Stransky's fifth season with the Philharmonic. When he took charge in 1911, the orchestra's weekly concerts, though of a high order, enjoyed nothing like the patronage that they claim to-day.

"The increase in the size of our audiences," said Mr. Stransky, "has been far greater than could possibly have been foreseen by the directors or myself. Of all the changes that have taken place, this has been the most remarkable. People sometimes say, 'How is it that the Boston Symphony concerts are sold out in advance and yours are not?' At our last Thursday night's concert the attendance was exactly 2,670. Yesterday afternoon, the programme was repeated to an audience numbering 2,626. A total of 5,296 persons have heard the Philharmonic play this week. The attendance at the opening concerts last week was nearly as large. In the two weeks of the present season, therefore, more than 10,000 have come to hear us. Can the Boston orchestra equal this?

"We give fifty-four concerts a year in New York and Brooklyn. The Boston Symphony gives ten. We give the same programme twice each week, the Boston Symphony only once. Is it any wonder that one should be sold out in advance and the other not?

"As a matter of fact, our audiences to-day are four times as large as they were in 1911. Then, the Thursday boxes were only partly subscribed for. Now they are all sold out for the season. I am not permitted to give the exact number, but I can say that the subscriptions this year have increased over those of last season by five figures."

[illegible] Mr. Stransky [illegible] as a dis- tra which he considers [illegible] tinctly New York product—an institution as well as a collection of the best musicians the city can gather toge

NEED TO DEVELOP ART

"The Philharmonic," he c "should be a source of civic pr people of this city, just as th Philharmonic is to the people There the city maintains its Here the people themselves mu to it, and, in doing so, they take pride in contributing tow development of art—for the dev of art goes hand in hand with velopment of the soul. The A people have made tremendous the development of all technica but it remains for them to devote more attention to the education of the people as a whole in the arts, especially music, which is the most uplifting of the arts.

"When I call music the most uplifting of the arts, I do not wish to appear one-sided. No artist should be that. Personally, I am interested not only in music, but in literature and painting. The German and Austrian painters are my especial favorites, and my collection of their works is considered abroad of such importance that the director of the Munich Pinakothek, Prof. Dr. Braune, has edited a special catalogue of them."

With regard to the American public's attitude toward modern music, Mr. Stransky says he has found that the same rule applies here as on the other side. It is not with the public so much as with the critics that he has fault to find.

"The classics have a big following in this country," he continued. "Here, as in Europe, the public and the critics have always constituted the chief obstacle in the development of new art. Beethoven, Weber, Wagner, Brahms—all had a hell of a time with the critics, who uniformly declined to accept them. When 'Tristan and Isolde' had its first performance in Vienna, Hanslick, the foremost critic of the time, had this to say about the Vorspiel, now a favorite piece with the public and their majesties, the critics:

"'The prelude starts with a duo between the 'cellos and woodwinds which complain to each other about their indisposition.'

"Take the famous Leonore overture of Beethoven, in which, just before the presto starts, a certain phrase is quite often repeated. When he heard that for the first time, the foremost Viennese critic of his day pounded the floor with his cane and cried out, 'When does that ever stop?'

"All geniuses and minor composers will have the same experience that Wagner and Beethoven had with the critics. As soon as something out of the ordinary is done, the critics kick. That is the critics' way. They are like so many old mules when it comes to new music.

"But, fortunately, it is this very obstacle, I think, that serves most of all to increase the power of the producing and the reproducing artist. The very strain under which they must work stimulates their creative powers. It may be in a productive way or in the way of reproduction."

SHOWING UP THE CRITICS.

Mr. Stransky then turned to his own troubles with the critics.

"Last Thursday," he said, "I performed a symphony of Mozart. While in one paper the complaint was made that there was not enough sunshine in the performance, the statement appeared in another that the performance was bathed in sunshine.' Personally, I decline this praise. I wish here to state, that I do not consider the work in question a sunshiny symphony. Just the opposite in fact. It is a very sombre and deeply earnest work, one that shows that Mozart was able to express not only his optimism, but also his pessimism. The third movement—even the menuetto—is written in minor, and the finale also shows that there is everything but sunshine—more clouds and tears than some critics believe in.

"But you see how it is—the man who complained about the lack of sunshine just caught the spirit of my performance. But what to him seemed a defect, seemed to my understanding of the work an advantage. My interpretation was in accord with the Viennese tradition, as I learned it from Hans Richter.

"The chief trouble with the critics here is that they do not endeavor to guide and educate the public. And in this country there is a great need of musical education. Between the artist and the public there exists a wide gap. It is for the critics to span this gap, not to destroy the bridges."

Mr. Stransky explained that he did not include all critics in his arraignment. He was always careful to follow the criticisms of his performances, he said, and glad when he was able to find in them something that served as an inspiration and a help.

"For," he went on, "we are all liable to make mistakes, and when we do the critics are right in pointing them out. But critics are not here to call down the artists. They are here [illegible] our [illegible] er- [illegible]

From POST
Address: Washington, D.C.
Date NOV 14 1915
Established:

WASHINGTON enjoyed a feast of harmonies last week, one of the richest, musically, in the 1915-16 calendar.

Never before has Miss Geraldine Farrar won the hearts of Capital playgoers so completely as upon the occasion of her concert at the National Tuesday afternoon, when the theater housed the largest audience of the year. Not only was all the available room on the stage taken, and extra seats placed in the orchestra pit, but the management was forced to discontinue the sale of standing room a half hour before the concert began. And such an audience seemed to have inspired Miss Farrar to sing as she had never sung before in Washington.

The one unhappy feature of the afternoon was the fact that the management seemed to have underestimated Miss Farrar's popularity, and failed to provide sufficient programs, a shortcoming which is not an altogether unprecedented happening at these concerts.

While speaking of programs, it is not out of place to mention the unsatisfactory program of the Symphony Society of New York, which gave its first concert at the Belasco Wednesday, with Mischa Elman as the soloist. The programs of the Philadelphia, Philharmonic and the Minneapolis orchestras suffer by comparison with the literary excellence of the Boston Symphony, but none of these is as unsatisfactory as the mere title announcements of the Symphony Society. Symphony concerts are attended largely by music students in Washington, and the explanatory notes furnished by the Boston orchestra have been an important factor in popularizing this superb organization's concerts among the schools and seminaries of the Capital.

The appearance of Miss Anna Case, an associate of Miss Farrar in the Metropolitan Opera Company, in recital Friday, was another noteworthy event of the week. Miss Case is a rising star and her career is as promising today as was Miss Farrar's eight years ago.

R. G.

[illegible] and new mem-

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 27, 1915.

NOTABLY FINE CONCERT GIVEN BY THE SYMPHONY

An exceptionally attractive program given in the orchestra's best vein and a soloist in Fritz Kreisler, who has no peer, provided one of the best concerts of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major (K 543); Beethoven, Concerto for the violin; Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."

The Mozart symphony, while falling short of the composer's best, is ever interesting. Opinions differ as to the merits of the four movements, with the first movement carrying the weight of favor. All four gave noticeable pleasure, the audience recalling Dr. Muck at the close until he had the players stand in their places. It was evident, however, that the audience was chiefly interested in the soloist. All wanted to hear Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra in the great Beethoven work. Such playing as was enjoyed yesterday afternoon can only be heard where soloist, conductor and orchestra are peerless. It was simply wonderful. Naturally enough the soloist was forced to acknowledge the applause many times between the two movements and recalled at the close of the selection.

Great as was the Beethoven number it did not dwarf the grand Rachmaninoff symphonic poem. Dr. Muck left nothing to be desired in the reading of this masterpiece. It afforded such pleasure that the audience recalled the conductor to the stage at the close of the concert, a rather rare event.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

NOVEMBER 27.

RACHMANINOFF WORK REVIVED BY KARL MUCK

Music of Russian Composer on Program With Symphony of Mozart and Concerto of Beethoven—Fritz Kreisler Soloist

SYMPHONY HALL—Sixth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor; presented on the afternoon of Nov. 26: Mozart, symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition), K 543; Beethoven, concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, op. 61 Rachmaninoff, "Die Toteninsel," symphonic poem after picture by A. Böcklin. Soloist, Fritz or within a very few persons of the whole, sit through to the close of the concert. This beneficent something cannot easily be determined; but whatever it was, a great advance in the cause of music in the community will result if it can be made operative every time. Perhaps it was the legend inserted in the program book the week before, notifying the subscribers that the length of time required to perform the selections would be one hour and 45 minutes; for since people were enabled to fix their afternoon engagements with precision, they may have found staying in to the end just as convenient as going out early. Or it may have been the interest of the Rachmaninoff revival. Better still, it may have been a growing opinion in the Symphony public that the concerts are worth hearing from first note to last, together with a growing acceptance of the idea that the success of all orchestral interpretation depends on the effort the listening group intelligently and conscientiously united to that of the performing group. Another possibility is that the conductor here provided a type of program that better suits the temperament of the community than the kind he so often presents, with a small and not particularly important piece to conclude with. For who knows but that portion of the audience which has been taking penultimate leave, was glad of an opportunity to commend a program that developed the sonorities of the orchestra to a climax instead of leading them the other way? Criticism by exit is far less usual than it was two decades ago at the Symphony concerts. But it will still assert itself when programs are retrogressive—when, for example, a list of works conveying an impressive idea is selected and then is added to by a repertory overture which only serves a perfunctory purpose of contrast or merely gives good measure for ticket money.

If the unwonted devotion of the house to its task of listening was owing to curiosity about the symphonic poem on the Böcklin painting, "The Island of the Dead," it is good evidence that the composer has retained the influence which he established when he visited the city six years ago. Mr. Rachmaninoff was accepted at that time as a representative of the international idea in art, though of the Russian school of music; as a cosmopolite, though from Moscow. His work was almost regarded as a proof of the doctrine that art knows no political boundaries and recognizes no racial distinctions. But when his music, both under his own conducting and under that of Max Fiedler, was carefully considered, it was found to be bi-national rather than non-national.

It was found to be the writing of a Russian with strong leanings toward a German style. And this conclusion seems as valid today as ever, except that the bi-national might be extended to tri-national. For the "Island of the Dead," as read by Dr. Muck, had as much French as German admixture. It made acknowledgments to Debussy no less than to Strauss. It had a [illegible] kindred with the "Afternoon of a Faun" [illegible] "Death and Transfiguration." In its method of representing scenery it was as a work from Paris; in its manner of indicating character and action, it was as one from Berlin. The Russian of it appeared in its sentiment. As played at this concert, it was full of surprises and ironies that made its somberness seem at times very like good nature. It constantly let tendencies to melancholy assert themselves but suppressed them before they became extreme. And so, while in its formalities it contained reminders of western Europe, in feeling it was of the soil of the steppes.

The conductor had the attitude of one who is determined to set the music forth at its full value, just as he had the day when another Russian composer, Rimsky Korsakoff, was represented at the concerts. He took account of the depth and richness of the instrumental coloring in the "Island of the Dead" as shrewdly as he did of the external and lustrous coloring in the "Antar" symphony two weeks before. The responsibility he took in the case of Rachmaninoff indicated diligent preparation. But it in no way affected unfavorably his readings in the rest of the program. For as on the occasion when "Antar" was performed the whole afternoon's work was of surpassing excellence. The Mozart symphony was interpreted with a fine regard for its dignity as well as for its charm. The pace was moderate and all the players were accordingly expected to execute their notes with cleanness and strength. The tone of the orchestra was large for Mozart, no doubt, especially in the strings but it was so limpid and pure that everything was in proper balance. The light wind instruments had their correct value in relation to the violins.

The solo number was a great delight to the audience, but not in a way to overshadow the rest of the program. Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck gave a strictly symphonic presentation of the Beethoven work and listeners could hardly regard the soloist as a visitor but were compelled to think of him as only another member of the orchestral group. There was something fortunate in the placing of Mozart's E flat symphony and the Beethoven violin concerto together. They represent a moment when the two composers thought strikingly alike.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 27, 1915.

KREISLER STAR OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday's Symphony concert was of a character illustrating the great prestige enjoyed by the orchestra itself, by Dr. Muck and, incidentally, by Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist. The same highly artistic impressiveness may naturally be expected at tonight's concert.

The program is well calculated to bring out the pre-eminent characteristics of the orchestra and of the soloist both. The Mozart symphony in E flat major, which is counted as one of the composer's finest works, permits Dr. Muck to show the graceful poise and spirit of his leadership, his exquisite sense of euphony, his esthetic reverence for the old masterpieces. The demand for euphony, no matter how strict it may have been, was met by the orchestra. Here was a demonstration of the mellow tone and virtuosity for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been famous.

The same qualities distinguished the performance of the Beethoven concerto, with Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra vying one with the other to achieve perfection. This unsurpassed work for the violin is one of Kreisler's favorites. He selected it for his debut as a Symphony soloist, in 1901; but he plays it much more effectively today than he did then. Now he, perhaps alone, has the tone and the technic to do it complete justice. His performance yesterday reached sublime heights. The tone, as of spun gold; the absolute mastery of the mechanics of his art; the breadth and brilliancy marking the cadenza at the end of the first movement—these were salient points in an achievement that one can hardly expect to see excelled in a life-time.

The playing of the orchestra was of the same extremely artistic caliber.

These two performances by themselves would make the concert a memorable one. Yesterday there was one ovation after another.

The concert closed with a brilliant performance of the Rachmaninoff tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," a composition inspired by the Boecklin picture of the same name and characterized appropriately by a beauty at once gloomy and sublime.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. At the concerts on Dec. 10 and 11 it will play Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Smetana's "Vysehrad" and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody."

[50]

Mr. Stransky likes to have the orchestra which he conducts regarded as a distinctly New York product—an institution as well as a collection of the best musicians the city can gather toge

NEED TO DEVELOP ART

"The Philharmonic," he c
"should be a source of civic pri people of this city, just as th
Philharmonic is to the people o
There the city maintains its o
Here the people themselves mu to it, and, in doing so, they take pride in contributing tow development of art—for the deve of art goes hand in hand with velopment of the soul. The A people have made tremendous st the development of all technical but it remains for them to devote more attention to the education of the people as a whole in the arts, especially music, which is the most uplifting of the arts.

"When I call music the most uplifting of the arts, I do not wish to appear one-sided. No artist should be that. Personally, I am interested not only in music, but in literature and painting. The German and Austrian painters are my especial favorites, and my collection of their works is considered abroad of such importance that the director of the Munich Pinakothek, Prof. Dr. Braune, has edited a special catalogue of them."

With regard to the American public's attitude toward modern music, Mr. Stransky says he has found that the same rule applies here as on the other side. It is not with the public so much as with the critics that he has fault to find.

"The classics have a big following in this country," he continued. "Here, as in Europe, the public and the critics have always constituted the chief obstacle in the development of new art. Beethoven, Weber, Wagner, Brahms—all had a hell of a time with the critics, who uniformly declined to accept them. When 'Tristan and Isolde' had its first performance in Vienna, Hanslick, the foremost critic of the time, had this to say about the Vorspiel, now a favorite piece with the public and their majesties, the critics:

"'The prelude starts with a duo between the 'cellos and woodwinds which complain to each other about their indisposition.'

"Take the famous Leonore overture of Beethoven, in which, just before the presto starts, a certain phrase is quite often repeated. When he heard that for the first time, the foremost Viennese critic of his day pounded the floor with his cane and cried out, 'When does that ever stop?'

"All geniuses and minor composers will have the same experience that Wagner and Beethoven had with the critics. As soon as something out of the ordinary is done, the critics kick. That is the critics' way. They are like so many old mules when it comes to new music.

"But, fortunately, it is this very obstacle, I think, that serves most of all to increase the power of the producing and the reproducing artist. The very strain under which they must work stimulates their creative powers. It may be in a productive way or in the way of reproduction."

SHOWING UP THE CRITICS.

Mr. Stransky then turned to his own troubles with the critics.

"Last Thursday," he said, "I performed a symphony of Mozart. While in one paper the complaint was made that there was not enough sunshine in the performance, the statement appeared in another that the performance was bathed in sunshine.' Personally, I decline this praise. I wish here to state, that I do not consider the work in question a sunshiny symphony. Just the opposite in fact. It is a very sombre and deeply earnest work, one that shows that Mozart was able to express not only his optimism, but also his pessimism. The third movement—even the menuetto—is written in minor, and the finale also shows that there is everything but sunshine—more clouds and tears than some critics believe in.

"But you see how it is—the man who complained about the lack of sunshine just caught the spirit of my performance. But what to him seemed a defect, seemed to my understanding of the work an advantage. My interpretation was in accord with the Viennese tradition, as I learned it from Hans Richter.

"The chief trouble with the critics here is that they do not endeavor to guide and educate the public. And in this country there is a great need of musical education. Between the artist and the public there exists a wide gap. It is for the critics to span this gap, not to destroy the bridges."

Mr. Stransky explained that he did not include all critics in his arraignment. He was always careful to follow the criticisms of his performances, he said, and glad when he was able to find in them something that served as an inspiration and a help.

"For," he went on, "we are all liable to make mistakes, and when we do the critics are right in pointing them out. But critics are not here to call down the artists. They are here to show us our mistakes. However, ju [illegible] among ar-

---

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 1 4 1915
Established:

WASHINGTON enjoyed a feast of harmonies last week, one of the richest, musically, in the 1915-16 calendar.

Never before has Miss Geraldine Farrar won the hearts of Capital playgoers so completely as upon the occasion of her concert at the National Tuesday afternoon, when the theater housed the largest audience of the year. Not only was all the available room on the stage taken, and extra seats placed in the orchestra pit, but the management was forced to discontinue the sale of standing room a half hour before the concert began. And such an audience seemed to have inspired Miss Farrar to sing as she had never sung before in Washington.

The one unhappy feature of the afternoon was the fact that the management seemed to have underestimated Miss Farrar's popularity, and failed to provide sufficient programs, a shortcoming which is not an altogether unprecedented happening at these concerts.

While speaking of programs, it is not out of place to mention the unsatisfactory program of the Symphony Society of New York, which gave its first concert at the Belasco Wednesday, with Mischa Elman as the soloist. The programs of the Philadelphia, Philharmonic and the Minneapolis orchestras suffer by comparison with the literary excellence of the Boston Symphony, but none of these is as unsatisfactory as the mere title announcements of the Symphony Society. Symphony concerts are attended largely by music students in Washington, and the explanatory notes furnished by the Boston orchestra have been an important factor in popularizing this superb organization's concerts among the schools and seminaries of the Capital.

The appearance of Miss Anna Case, an associate of Miss Farrar in the Metropolitan Opera Company, in recital Friday, was another noteworthy event of the week. Miss Case is a rising star and her career is as promising today as was Miss Farrar's eight years ago.

R. G.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 27, 1915.

NOTABLY FINE CONCERT GIVEN BY THE SYMPHONY

An exceptionally attractive program given in the orchestra's best vein and a soloist in Fritz Kreisler, who has no peer, provided one of the best concerts of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major (K 543); Beethoven, Concerto for the violin; Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."

The Mozart symphony, while falling short of the composer's best, is ever interesting. Opinions differ as to the merits of the four movements, with the first movement carrying the weight of favor. All four gave noticeable pleasure, the audience recalling Dr. Muck at the close until he had the players stand in their places. It was evident, however, that the audience was chiefly interested in the soloist. All wanted to hear Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra in the great Beethoven work. Such playing as was enjoyed yesterday afternoon can only be heard where soloist, conductor and orchestra are peerless. It was simply wonderful. Naturally enough the soloist was forced to acknowledge the applause many times between the two movements and recalled at the close of the selection.

Great as was the Beethoven number it did not dwarf the grand Rachmaninoff symphonic poem. Dr. Muck left nothing to be desired in the reading of this masterpiece. It afforded such pleasure that the audience recalled the conductor to the stage at the close of the concert, a rather rare event.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

NOVEMBER 27,

RACHMANINOFF WORK REVIVED BY KARL MUCK

Music of Russian Composer on Program With Symphony of Mozart and Concerto of Beethoven—Fritz Kreisler Soloist

SYMPHONY HALL—Sixth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor; presented on the afternoon of Nov. 26; Mozart, symphony in E-flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition), K 543; Beethoven, concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, op. 61 Rachmaninoff, "Der Toteninsel," symphonic poem after the picture by A. Böcklin. Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

or within a very few persons of the whole, sit through to the close of the concert. This beneficent something cannot easily be determined; but whatever it was, a great advance in the cause of music in the community will result if it can be made operative every time. Perhaps it was the legend inserted in the program book the week before, notifying the subscribers that the length of time required to perform the selections would be one hour and 45 minutes; for since people were enabled to fix their afternoon engagements with precision, they may have found staying in to the end just as convenient as going out early. Or it may have been the interest of the Rachmaninoff revival. Better still, it may have been a growing opinion in the Symphony public that the concerts are worth hearing from first note to last, together with a growing acceptance of the idea that the success of all orchestral interpretation depends on the effort the listening group intelligently and conscientiously united to that of the performing group. Another possibility is that the conductor here provided a type of program that better suits the temperament of the community than the kind he so often presents, with a small and not particularly important piece to conclude with. For who knows but that portion of the audience which has been taking penultimate leave, was glad of an opportunity to commend a program that developed the sonorities of the orchestra to a climax instead of leading them the other way? Criticism by exit is far less usual than it was two decades ago at the Symphony concerts. But it will still assert itself when programs are retrogressive—when, for example, a list of works conveying an impressive idea is selected and then is added to by a repertory overture which only serves a perfunctory purpose of contrast or merely gives good measure for ticket money.

If the unwonted devotion of the house to its task of listening was owing to curiosity about the symphonic poem on the Böcklin painting, "The Island of the Dead," it is good evidence that the composer has retained the influence which he established when he visited the city six years ago. Mr. Rachmaninoff was accepted at that time as a representative of the international idea in art, though of the Russian school of music; as a cosmopolite, though from Moscow. His work was almost regarded as a proof of the doctrine that art knows no political boundaries and recognizes no racial distinctions. But when his music, both under his own conducting and under that of Max Fiedler, was carefully considered, it was found to be bi-national rather than non-national.

It was found to be the writing of a Russian with strong leanings toward a German style. And this conclusion seems as valid today as ever, except that the bi-national might be extended to tri-national. For the "Island of the Dead," as read by Dr. Muck, had as much French as German admixture. It made acknowledgments to Debussy no less than to Strauss. It had a [illegible] kindred with the "Afternoon of a Faun" as with "Death and Transfiguration." In its method of representing scenery it was as a work from Paris; in its manner of indicating character and action, it was as one from Berlin. The Russian of it appeared in its sentiment. As played at this concert, it was full of surprises and ironies that made its somberness seem at times very like good nature. It constantly let tendencies to melancholy assert themselves but suppressed them before they became extreme. And so, while in its formalities it contained reminders of western Europe, in feeling it was of the soil of the steppes.

The conductor had the attitude of one who is determined to set the music forth at its full value, just as he had the day when another Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, was represented at the concerts. He took account of the depth and richness of the instrumental coloring in the "Island of the Dead" as shrewdly as he did of the external and lustrous coloring in the "Antar" symphony two weeks before. The responsibility he took in the case of Rachmaninoff indicated diligent preparation. But it in no way affected unfavorably his readings in the rest of the program. For as on the occasion when "Antar" was performed the whole afternoon's work was of surpassing excellence. The Mozart symphony was interpreted with a fine regard for its dignity as well as for its charm. The pace was moderate and all the players were accordingly expected to execute their notes with cleanness and strength. The tone of the orchestra was large for Mozart, no doubt, especially in the strings but it was so limpid and pure that everything was in proper balance. The light wind instruments had their correct value in relation to the violins.

The solo number was a great delight to the audience, but not in a way to overshadow the rest of the program. Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck gave a strictly symphonic presentation of the Beethoven work and listeners could hardly regard the soloist as a visitor but were compelled to think of him as only another member of the orchestral group. There was something fortunate in the placing of Mozart's E flat symphony and the Beethoven violin concerto together. They represent a moment when the two composers thought strikingly alike.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

NOVEMBER 27, 1915.

KREISLER STAR OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday's Symphony concert was of a character illustrating the great prestige enjoyed by the orchestra itself, by Dr. Muck and, incidentally, by Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist. The same highly artistic impressiveness may naturally be expected at tonight's concert.

The program is well calculated to bring out the pre-eminent characteristics of the orchestra and of the soloist both. The Mozart symphony in E flat major, which is counted as one of the composer's finest works, permits Dr. Muck to show the graceful poise and spirit of his leadership, his exquisite sense of euphony, his esthetic reverence for the old masterpieces. The demand for euphony, no matter how strict it may have been, was met by the orchestra. Here was a demonstration of the mellow tone and virtuosity for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been famous.

The same qualities distinguished the performance of the Beethoven concerto, with Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra vying one with the other to achieve perfection. This unsurpassed work for the violin is one of Kreisler's favorites. He selected it for his debut as a Symphony soloist, in 1901; but he plays it much more effectively today than he did then. Now he, perhaps alone, has the tone and the technic to do it complete justice. His performance yesterday reached sublime heights. The tone, as of spun gold; the absolute mastery of the mechanics of his art; the breadth and brilliancy marking the cadenza at the end of the first movement—these were salient points in an achievement that one can hardly expect to see excelled in a life-time.

The playing of the orchestra was of the same extremely artistic caliber.

These two performances by themselves would make the concert a memorable one. Yesterday there was one ovation after another.

The concert closed with a brilliant performance of the Rachmaninoff tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," a composition inspired by the Boecklin picture of the same name and characterized appropriately by a beauty at once gloomy and sublime.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. At the concerts on Dec. 10 and 11 it will play Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Smetana's "Vysehrad" and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody."

Mr. Stransky likes to have the orchestra which he conducts regarded as a distinctly New York product—an institution as well as a collection of the best musicians the city can gather together.

NEED TO DEVELOP ART.

"The Philharmonic," he continued, "should be a source of civic pride to the people of this city, just as the Berlin Philharmonic is to the people of Berlin. There the city maintains its orchestra. Here the people themselves must attend to it, and, in doing so, they may well take pride in contributing toward the development of art—for the development of art goes hand in hand with the development of the soul. The American people have made tremendous strides in the development of all technical things, but it remains for them to devote more attention to the education of the people as a whole in the arts, especially music, which is the most uplifting of the arts.

"When I call music the most uplifting of the arts, I do not wish to appear one-sided. No artist should be that. Personally, I am interested not only in music, but in literature and painting. The German and Austrian painters are my especial favorites, and my collection of their works is considered abroad of such importance that the director of the Munich Pinakothek, Prof. Dr. Braune, has edited a special catalogue of them."

With regard to the American public's attitude toward modern music, Mr. Stransky says he has found that the same rule applies here as on the other side. It is not with the public so much as with the critics that he has fault to find.

"The classics have a big following in this country," he continued. "Here, as in Europe, the public and the critics have always constituted the chief obstacle in the development of new art. Beethoven, Weber, Wagner, Brahms—all had a hell of a time with the critics, who uniformly declined to accept them. When 'Tristan and Isolde' had its first performance in Vienna, Hanslick, the foremost critic of the time, had this to say about the Vorspiel, now a favorite piece with the public and their majesties, the critics:

"'The prelude starts with a duo between the 'cellos and woodwinds which complain to each other about their indisposition.'

"Take the famous Leonore overture of Beethoven, in which, just before the presto starts, a certain phrase is quite often repeated. When he heard that for the first time, the foremost Viennese critic of his day pounded the floor with his cane and cried out, 'When does that ever stop?'

"All geniuses and minor composers will have the same experience that Wagner and Beethoven had with the critics. As soon as something out of the ordinary is done, the critics kick. That is the critics' way. They are like so many old mules when it comes to new music.

"But, fortunately, it is this very obstacle, I think, that serves most of all to increase the power of the producing and the reproducing artist. The very strain under which they must work stimulates their creative powers. It may be in a productive way or in the way of reproduction."

SHOWING UP THE CRITICS.

Mr. Stransky then turned to his own troubles with the critics.

"Last Thursday," he said, "I performed a symphony of Mozart. While in one paper the complaint was made that there was not enough sunshine in the performance, the statement appeared in another that the performance was bathed in sunshine.' Personally, I decline this praise. I wish here to state, that I do not consider the work in question a sunshiny symphony. Just the opposite in fact. It is a very sombre and deeply earnest work, one that shows that Mozart was able to express not only his optimism, but also his pessimism. The third movement—even the menuetto—is written in minor, and the finale also shows that there is everything but sunshine—more clouds and tears than some critics believe in.

"But you see how it is—the man who complained about the lack of sunshine just caught the spirit of my performance. But what to him seemed a defect, seemed to my understanding of the work an advantage. My interpretation was in accord with the Viennese tradition, as I learned it from Hans Richter.

"The chief trouble with the critics here is that they do not endeavor to guide and educate the public. And in this country there is a great need of musical education. Between the artist and the public there exists a wide gap. It is for the critics to span this gap, not to destroy the bridges."

Mr. Stransky explained that he did not include all critics in his arraignment. He was always careful to follow the criticisms of his performances, he said, and glad when he was able to find in them something that served as an inspiration and a help.

"For," he went on, "we are all liable to make mistakes, and when we do the critics are right in pointing them out. But critics are not here to call down the artists. They are here to show us our mistakes. However, just as among ar-

---

, D.C.

NOV 1 4 1915

ASHINGTON enjoyed a feast of harmonies last week, one of the richest, musically, in the 1915-16 calendar.

Never before has Miss Geraldine Farrar won the hearts of Capital playgoers so completely as upon the occasion of her con- t the National Tuesday afternoon, when the theater housed the largest nce of the year. Not only was all the available room on the stage , and extra seats placed in the orchestra pit, but the management was forced to discontinue the sale of standing room a half hour before the concert began. And such an audience seemed to have inspired Miss Farrar to sing as she had never sung before in Washington.

The one unhappy feature of the afternoon was the fact that the management seemed to have underestimated Miss Farrar's popularity, and failed to provide sufficient programs, a shortcoming which is not an altogether unprecedented happening at these concerts.

While speaking of programs, it is not out of place to mention the unsatisfactory program of the Symphony Society of New York, which gave its first concert at the Belasco Wednesday, with Mischa Elman as the soloist. The programs of the Philadelphia, Philharmonic and the Minneapolis orchestras suffer by comparison with the literary excellence of the Boston Symphony, but none of these is as unsatisfactory as the mere title announcements of the Symphony Society. Symphony concerts are attended largely by music students in Washington, and the explanatory notes furnished by the Boston orchestra have been an important factor in popularizing this superb organization's concerts among the schools and seminaries of the Capital.

The appearance of Miss Anna Case, an associate of Miss Farrar in the Metropolitan Opera Company, in recital Friday, was another noteworthy event of the week. Miss Case is a rising star and her career is as promising today as was Miss Farrar's eight years ago.

R. G.

and new mem-

BOSTON TRAVELER,

NOVEMBER 27, 1915.

NOTABLY FINE CONCERT GIVEN BY THE SYMPHONY

An exceptionally attractive program given in the orchestra's best vein and a soloist in Fritz Kreisler, who has no peer, provided one of the best concerts of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major (K 543); Beethoven, Concerto for the violin; Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."

The Mozart symphony, while falling short of the composer's best, is ever interesting. Opinions differ as to the merits of the four movements, with the first movement carrying the weight of favor. All four gave noticeable pleasure, the audience recalling Dr. Muck at the close until he had the players stand in their places. It was evident, however, that the audience was chiefly interested in the soloist. All wanted to hear Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra in the great Beethoven work. Such playing as was enjoyed yesterday afternoon can only be heard where soloist, conductor and orchestra are peerless. It was simply wonderful. Naturally enough the soloist was forced to acknowledge the applause many times between the two movements and recalled at the close of the selection.

Great as was the Beethoven number it did not dwarf the grand Rachmaninoff symphonic poem. Dr. Muck left nothing to be desired in the reading of this masterpiece. It afforded such pleasure that the audience recalled the conductor to the stage at the close of the concert, a rather rare event.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

NOVEMBER 27,

RACHMANINOFF WORK REVIVED BY KARL MUCK

Music of Russian Composer on Program With Symphony of Mozart and Concerto of Beethoven—Fritz Kreisler Soloist

SYMPHONY HALL—Sixth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor; presented on the afternoon of Nov. 26; Mozart, symphony in E-flat (No. 8 of Breitkopf's edition), K 543; Beethoven, concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, op. 61 Rachmaninoff, "Der Toteninsel," symphonic poem after the picture by A. Böcklin. Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

or within a very few persons of the whole, sit through to the close of the concert. This beneficent something cannot easily be determined; but whatever it was, a great advance in the cause of music in the community will result if it can be made operative every time. Perhaps it was the legend inserted in the program book the week before, notifying the subscribers that the length of time required to perform the selections would be one hour and 45 minutes; for since people were enabled to fix their afternoon engagements with precision, they may have found staying in to the end just as convenient as going out early. Or it may have been the interest of the Rachmaninoff revival. Better still, it may have been a growing opinion in the Symphony public that the concerts are worth hearing from first note to last, together with a growing acceptance of the idea that the success of all orchestral interpretation depends on the effort the listening group intelligently and conscientiously united to that of the performing group. Another possibility is that the conductor here provided a type of program that better suits the temperament of the community than the kind he so often presents, with a small and not particularly important piece to conclude with. For who knows but that portion of the audience which has been taking penultimate leave, was glad of an opportunity to commend a program that developed the sonorities of the orchestra to a climax instead of leading them the other way? Criticism by exit is far less usual than it was two decades ago at the Symphony concerts. But it will still assert itself when programs are retrogressive—when, for example, a list of works conveying an impressive idea is selected and then is added to by a repertory overture which only serves a perfunctory purpose of contrast or merely gives good measure for ticket money.

If the unwonted devotion of the house to its task of listening was owing to curiosity about the symphonic poem on the Böcklin painting, "The Island of the Dead," it is good evidence that the composer has retained the influence which he established when he visited the city six years ago. Mr. Rachmaninoff was accepted at that time as a representative of the international idea in art, though of the Russian school of music; as a cosmopolite, though from Moscow. His work was almost regarded as a proof of the doctrine that art knows no political boundaries and recognizes no racial distinctions. But when his music, both under his own conducting and under that of Max Fiedler, was carefully considered, it was found to be bi-national rather than non-national.

It was found to be the writing of a Russian with strong leanings toward a German style. And this conclusion seems as valid today as ever, except that the bi-national might be extended to tri-national. For the "Island of the Dead," as read by Dr. Muck, had as much French as German admixture. It made acknowledgments to Debussy no less than to Strauss. It had a [illegible] kindred with the "Afternoon of a Faun" as with "Death and Transfiguration." In its method of representing scenery it was as a work from Paris; in its manner of indicating character and action, it was as one from Berlin. The Russian of it appeared in its sentiment. As played at this concert, it was full of surprises and ironies that made its somberness seem at times very like good nature. It constantly let tendencies to melancholy assert themselves but suppressed them before they became extreme. And so, while in its formalities it contained reminders of western Europe, in feeling it was of the soil of the steppes.

The conductor had the attitude of one who is determined to set the music forth at its full value, just as he had the day when another Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, was represented at the concerts. He took account of the depth and richness of the instrumental coloring in the "Island of the Dead" as shrewdly as he did of the external and lustrous coloring in the "Antar" symphony two weeks before. The responsibility he took in the case of Rachmaninoff indicated diligent preparation. But it in no way affected unfavorably his readings in the rest of the program. For as on the occasion when "Antar" was performed the whole afternoon's work was of surpassing excellence. The Mozart symphony was interpreted with a fine regard for its dignity as well as for its charm. The pace was moderate and all the players were accordingly expected to execute their notes with cleanness and strength. The tone of the orchestra was large for Mozart, no doubt, especially in the strings but it was so limpid and pure that everything was in proper balance. The light wind instruments had their correct value in relation to the violins.

The solo number was a great delight to the audience, but not in a way to overshadow the rest of the program. Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck gave a strictly symphonic presentation of the Beethoven work and listeners could hardly regard the soloist as a visitor but were compelled to think of him as only another member of the orchestral group. There was something fortunate in the placing of Mozart's E flat symphony and the Beethoven violin concerto together. They represent a moment when the two composers thought strikingly alike.

BOSTON JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 27, 1915.

KREISLER STAR OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday's Symphony concert was of a character illustrating the great prestige enjoyed by the orchestra itself, by Dr. Muck and, incidentally, by Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist. The same highly artistic impressiveness may naturally be expected at tonight's concert.

The program is well calculated to bring out the pre-eminent characteristics of the orchestra and of the soloist both. The Mozart symphony in E flat major, which is counted as one of the composer's finest works, permits Dr. Muck to show the graceful poise and spirit of his leadership, his exquisite sense of euphony, his esthetic reverence for the old masterpieces. The demand for euphony, no matter how strict it may have been, was met by the orchestra. Here was a demonstration of the mellow tone and virtuosity for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has long been famous.

The same qualities distinguished the performance of the Beethoven concerto, with Mr. Kreisler and the orchestra vying one with the other to achieve perfection. This unsurpassed work for the violin is one of Kreisler's favorites. He selected it for his debut as a Symphony soloist, in 1901; but he plays it much more effectively today than he did then. Now he, perhaps alone, has the tone and the technic to do it complete justice. His performance yesterday reached sublime heights. The tone, as of spun gold; the absolute mastery of the mechanics of his art; the breadth and brilliancy marking the cadenza at the end of the first movement—these were salient points in an achievement that one can hardly expect to see excelled in a life-time.

The playing of the orchestra was of the same extremely artistic caliber.

These two performances by themselves would make the concert a memorable one. Yesterday there was one ovation after another.

The concert closed with a brilliant performance of the Rachmaninoff tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," a composition inspired by the Boecklin picture of the same name and characterized appropriately by a beauty at once gloomy and sublime.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. At the concerts on Dec. 10 and 11 it will play Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Smetana's "Vysehrad" and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody."

MUSICAL COURIER

WHY THE HORNS ARE SILENT.

In a communication signed "A. K." (the writer gives his full name at the bottom of his letter), the MUSICAL COURIER is informed as follows:

New York, November 2, 1915.

DEAR SIR—You print the following in your recent issue:

> "The Boston Transcript says that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be unable to play Strauss' new 'Alpine' symphony, which requires twenty-four horns, twelve on the stage, and twelve in the middle distance, wherever that may be. ('Middle distance' presumably is off stage.) It should not be impossible in Boston to find twelve extra horns to perform off stage and within 'middle distance.' And if not, Boston will be shamed by Philadelphia, which purposes to give the Strauss work this winter."

The Transcript is perfectly correct if it made the statement above. The Boston Symphony Orchestra could not play the Strauss work if it called for one horn more than the eight they have under contract, as no hornist in Boston or any other city in the United States would play with them. It is about time the public should be "let in" to some of the secrets of this band of "kultur." It is, with the exception of the leading instruments, the poorest paid organization in the country, as I know from fifteen years' membership. I never received more than $28 per week, and most of the rank and file, some pretty rank, receive only $25. Light dawned on me finally and I came to New York, joined the union here and now play with the Philharmonic, where the minimum price is $40 per week, and you don't have to come to attention and salute if the name of Kaiser Wilhelm der Letzte is mentioned.

Why don't you tell the truth above this "scab" Boston Orchestra once in a while? We both know it does not compare to the Philharmonic in playing or in the quality of the individual members, and only the finest press agent work in the papers (which are under the spell of money from the Higginson banking interests) enables it to come to New York and draw houses which should properly go to home orchestras.

Apologizing for this outburst, I am,

Yours truly, "A. K."

Undoubtedly it is true that union musicians could not play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the organization is a non-union one. That circumstance, too, makes the matter of salaries one of local adjustment between the orchestra's players and its management, and there is no law compelling a poorly paid player to sign a contract with the B. S. O. if he is able to get more money elsewhere. The MUSICAL COURIER tells the truth about all orchestras, whether union or "scab" (as our correspondent puts it more colloquially than elegantly), and therefore we do not think that New York papers are under the pay of Mr. Higginson, the B. S. O.'s financial backer, to praise the musical body from the Hub. The Boston Symphony is not interfering with the size of Philharmonic audiences, which are large and satisfactory to the directors and management of that enterprise. In Chicago and at other points on their recent tour the Boston players did not draw full houses and the newspaper praise was not always the most enthusiastic. Would A. K. infer from those facts that Mr. Higginson forgot to subvention the press of the inland?

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 27,

KREISLER HEARD WITH SYMPHONY

Memorable Performance of Beethoven's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The plain statement is equivalent to a great deal, especially to those who heard Mr. Kreisler's memorable performance of the same work, three seasons ago in the same place.

The nobility of the performance yesterday [illegible] was not dimmed b

[51]

[illegible] solo on a [illegible] music was neither incongruous nor distasteful to the most serious musicians present.

BEETHOVEN'S SPIRIT FELT

The greatness of the Beethoven concerto itself gives it precedence over nearly every other work of which we know, in this form. The violinist of yesterday in interpreting it stood at the right hand of the composer, and Dr. Muck, who conducted a remarkable accompaniment, was certainly stationed on the other. Orchestra, conductor and soloist co-operated in a wonderful ensemble, and once more there was felt the presence of the spirit of Beethoven.

Other details of an engrossing concert were the familiar symphony in E flat of Mozart, and Rachmaninoff's singular tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," after the well-known picture of Boecklin. The performance of the symphony was as nearly ideal as the performance of any symphony of Mozart could be when given by a modern orchestra of symphonic proportions. In technical finish, beauty of coloring and an emotional quality not denied to the Mozart of the symphonies, any more than to the composer of "Don Giovanni" or "The Marriage of Figaro," this performance was a beacon light of what a performance of a Mozart symphony should be. The audience appreciated the character of the performance, and finally the orchestra was called to its feet to bow with the conductor.

Mr. Kreisler's Eloquence

Mr. Kreisler's playing of the concerto was as remarkable for its classic line and its purity of style as for its searching eloquence and mastery. This violinist has been accused in some quarters of a tendency to sentimentalize. To such a charge the performance of yesterday would have been all the answer necessary. Nothing could have been warmer and yet more restrained, nothing more filled with inner fire, but symphonic in its manner, and as relentless as a good symphony or a fugue in its march toward completion. Noteworthy, too, were the cadenzas, which are superb examples of a composer's skill. The walk of the motives in the cadenza for the first movement, the Beethovenish spirit of the violinist's contribution, completed the effect.

The performance of Rachmaninoff's tone poem again demonstrated the fact that a piece of music, well composed, will stand on its own legs pretty firmly, for Dr. Muck's reading, effective as it was, was in many respects directly responsible to the intention of the composer. Not that it lacked coherence or effect, not that it failed to move the audience. It was an exceptionally dramatic reading, and a perfectly coherent presentation of the music. Nor does one's reservation lie in the fact that the conductor's tempi were faster than those taken by the composer when he was in Boston, and also faster, in many places, than the score indicated.

A Subtle Difference

No! The difference was far more subtle, and lay in the different outlooks of two wholly different personalities, which may never hope to be reconciled.

First, the spirit of this music, one is fain to believe, is far more contemplative, introspective than dramatic or in any way theatrical. It is not more Tschaikowskian gloom which fills this music. It is music rather of mysticism and resignation, rather the expression of one who stands a little to one side on the highway of life, and understands and pities, rather than one still in the grip of the passions.

When the composer conducted this piece in Boston some seasons ago, it was discovered that the scoring was intended for purpose of subdued coloring rather than for brilliant climaxes, and instead of three climaxes, as yesterday, there was one great climax.

Dr. Muck's conception was dramatic and concrete. This music is music of reflection rather than action, suggestion rather than assertion. It was too effective a performance! It thus left something to be desired!

NOVEMBER 27,

DAILY ADVERTISER,

FRITZ KREISLER'S GREAT SUCCESS

Symphony Concert Shows Sharp Contrasts of Orchestral Works

MOZART'S SYMPHONY AND RACHMANINOFF

Dr. Muck Reads Work With Impressive Power—Sombre Ending

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Mozart—Clarinette Symphony. E-flat.
Beethoven—Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.
Rachmaninoff—"The Isle of the Dead." Symphonic Poem.

Dr. Muck delights in sharp contrasts. Almost invariably, if he gives a modern work, he also gives, immediately before or after it, an ultraclassical, extremely conservative composition. Yesterday afternoon this wide contrast existed between Mozart's [illegible] Rachmaninoff's [illegible] Richard [illegible] Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher," in literature. Yet Mozart's E-flat symphony was considered a very advanced work in its day. It introduced the clarinette into the symphonic orchestra for the first time.

The clarinette, rather crude and undeveloped, and known in England as the "Shawm," was experimented with by Handel (the Richard Strauss of the 18th century) just once, in his "Richard I", and then dismissed as useless. All the clarinette passages that one nears in the works of Bach and Handel, with this single exception, have been written by later composers. The beautiful clarinette passages in "The Messiah" are by Mozart. In his day the instrument was somewhat improved and he determined to use it in symphony also.

At that time the wood-wind was always in three parts—flutes, oboes and bassoons. Holding to this three-part arrangement in this symphony, Mozart banishes the oboes and gives the middle part to the then new instrument. But he does not yet completely understand the clarinette. The glory and the weird character of its lower register (called the Chalumeau) was only fully revealed later on, in the works of Mendelssohn and Weber, and their comprehension of the instrument was chiefly due to their friendship with Heinrich Joseph Baermann (grandfather of the late Prof. Carl Baermann), who was the first great performer upon the instrument. Even Beethoven did not understand the possibilities of this instrument, the king of the woodwind.

Of the performance of the work there is nothing new to be said. To perform a Mozart symphony interestingly is not so easy as one may imagine. In such simplicity there must be perfection of shading, perfect phrasing, the best of ensemble, for little faults stand out more clearly here than in an over-swollen modern work. There were no faults to condone in the interpretation of yesterday afternoon, and the work was made virile and forcible instead of presenting a sweet and effeminate Mozart, as lesser conductors sometimes do. Yet we do not warm to the Mozart Symphonies (always excepting the G minor and "Jupiter") as we do to the more jovial, light and prattling works of Haydn. The first and last movements, however, were very effective in this performance, and there was great applause at the end. In this concert, for once the tail wagged the dog, the soloist was a greater attraction than the orchestra. The symphonic character was, however, not disturbed by this, since Beethoven's violin concerto is really a symphony with a thread of violin obbligato interwoven. It is by far the greatest of all violin concertos, and to hear it played, as this greatest of all living violinists plays it, was something really inspiring.

It demands breadth and power which with any but a full-fledged artist easily descends into vehemence. How those four repeated notes of the first movement resounded in the orchestra and solo part! They are more impressive even than the four-noted figure of the fifth symphony, of which Beethoven said—"That's the way that Destiny knocks at the door!" And yet, they tell the story in Vienna, that Beethoven got the idea of this figure from a drunken man who was pounding at a door in his street, having been locked out at a late hour; the same four knocks were afterwards used by Schubert in his C major symphony.

The first movement is the hub of the work. The final Rondo is a falling off, even when it is as brilliantly played as Mr. Kreisler gave it at this concert. This is the case also with the finale of Beethoven's "Emperor" piano-concerto, and with his Heroic Symphony. He seems often to play his trump card first, in his cycle forms. But even with this reservation the work was gloriously effective from beginning to end; Beethoven's second best is better than any other concerto-writer's very best, and Kreisler's abandon, elasticity and power, were seconded by Dr. Muck and the orchestra in an ensemble that was altogether commendable. It was true music again, in the days when we are getting a great deal of false music. Naturally the solo artist awakened great enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again, and the spontaneous tribute was fully deserved. We were sorry, however, to see a few uninformed auditors in the second gallery try to force an encore, which is entirely against the rule of these dignified concerts.

A word must be added regarding the cadenza of the first movement. It was an excellently constructed one and was played with incomparable beauty and delicacy.

The final number of this enjoyable programme was also something to grow enthusiastic over. Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead" is one of the most worthy of modern compositions. Familiarity here by no means breeds contempt, but reveals new beauties at each hearing. Such a work as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" reveals all that it has to say at the first audition and grows somewhat weaker thereafter, but such works as Bruckner's seventh symphony, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" or this "Isle of the Dead," only grow [illegible] with repetitions.

[illegible] have in his [illegible] Boecklin's [illegible] the music inspired by it, [illegible] loneliness and the solemn gloom suggested in the painting are well translated into tones. That impressive ground-bass, which is carried on so long in picturesque monotony, does not suggest the splash of waves so much as the sweep of the oars, and one thinks of Tennyson's lines in "Elaine,"

"And the dead, steered by the dumb,
Went upwards with the flood."

But Rosenthal's painting, which grew out of these lines, is not as impressive as Boecklin's work. There is simplicity, too, in some of the construction of Rachmaninoff's music, and the ground-bass alluded to above can almost be reduced to tonic and dominant chords. The control of rhythm which the composer displays might be a lesson to some of his contemporaries.

Dr. Muck read the work with impressive power. It made rather a sombre ending to the concert, especially for the Thanksgiving time, but it was well worth hearing again. It is so seldom that one can welcome something genuine and lofty in the music of most recent days that "The Isle of the Dead" should always be welcome.

BOSTON HERALD.

NOVEMBER 27.

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" a Feature of the Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major (K 543); Beethoven, Concerto for the violin (Mr. Kreisler, violinist); Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."

If Arnold Boecklin's picture, "The Island of the Dead," had been in full view of the audience, many would have wondered how the composer of the symphonic poem written to it could have found in this picture some of the thoughts that he expressed in tones.

To most of us this sombre painting suggests infinite quiet, eternal rest.

Then star nor sun shall waken,
  Nor any change of light:
Nor sounds of water shaken,
  Nor any sound or sight:
Nor wintry leaves nor vernal
  Nor days nor things diurnal;
Only the sleep eternal
  In an eternal night.

The symphonic poem opens in a spirit all in harmony with the painter's expression. There is the "tranquil lapping of the water"; there is the thought of the island with its funereal trees and awful rocks; there is the mysterious figure near the coffin, standing as the ferryman rows as with muffled oars. This symphonic poem has been conducted here by the composer, Mr. Fiedler, and now Dr. Muck. When the composer conducted, the scene as painted by Boecklin was brought marvellously to the mind of the hearer. The mood was one of melancholy monotony sustained, impressive, but never tiresome. Neither Mr. Fiedler nor Dr. Muck succeeded in giving this strange, indescribable impression of death, its quiet and loneliness.

This mood passes. There is not only a lament that rises to a frantic pitch; there is apparently the picture of the Last Great Day, with music that Puccini might have found for the torture chamber in "Tosca"; there is the sound of the dread hymn for the dead, the plain song, "Dies Irae" of the Holy Church. The music is powerful, dramatic if you please; but what has it to do with the moody Boecklin's picture?

It would be interesting to know how Rachmaninoff saw "The Island of the Dead." No two persons see a picture, a landscape, a seascape in exactly the same way. No two persons hear music in precisely the same manner. Yet two ordinary men would feel that Boecklin expressed the thought

That no life lives forever;
  That dead men rise up never;
That even the weariest river
  Winds somewhere safe to sea.

If there were to be a theme from the service for the dead, it should be the "Requiem Aeternam," not the "Dies Irae"; for what have wrath and terror to do with Boecklin's picture?

Behold, here is a mystery. Did Rachmaninoff conjure up thoughts of a frightful afterlife awaiting the passenger making the last journey? Was he obsessed by Poe's terrible tale "Silence"? What fired his imagination? He is a man of brains, and not merely musical brains. He is also a Russian. He gives no explanation. He simply points to the picture, in which he sees things not visible to the great majority.

This symphonic poem was played dramatically. While the symphony of Mozart had the serene beauty of a Grecian frieze. The last [illegible] performed with great [illegible] treatment [illegible] might have [illegible]

MUSICAL COURIER

WHY THE HORNS ARE SILENT.

In a communication signed "A. K." (the writer gives his full name at the bottom of his letter), the MUSICAL COURIER is informed as follows:

New York, November 2, 1915.

DEAR SIR—You print the following in your recent issue:

> "The Boston Transcript says that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be unable to play Strauss' new 'Alpine' symphony, which requires twenty-four horns, twelve on the stage, and twelve in the middle distance, wherever that may be. ('Middle distance' presumably is off stage.) It should not be impossible in Boston to find twelve extra horns to perform off stage and within 'middle distance.' And if not, Boston will be shamed by Philadelphia, which purposes to give the Strauss work this winter."

The Transcript is perfectly correct if it made the statement above. The Boston Symphony Orchestra could not play the Strauss work if it called for one horn more than the eight they have under contract, as no hornist in Boston or any other city in the United States would play with them. It is about time the public should be "let in" to some of the secrets of this band of "kultur." It is, with the exception of the leading instruments, the poorest paid organization in the country, as I know from fifteen years' membership. I never received more than $28 per week, and most of the rank and file, some pretty rank, receive only $25. Light dawned on me finally and I came to New York, joined the union here and now play with the Philharmonic, where the minimum price is $40 per week, and you don't have to come to attention and salute if the name of Kaiser Wilhelm der Letzte is mentioned.

Why don't you tell the truth above this "scab" Boston Orchestra once in a while? We both know it does not compare to the Philharmonic in playing or in the quality of the individual members, and only the finest press agent work in the papers (which are under the spell of money from the Higginson banking interests) enables it to come to New York and draw houses which should properly go to home orchestras.

Apologizing for this outburst, I am,

Yours truly, "A. K."

Undoubtedly it is true that union musicians could not play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the organization is a non-union one. That circumstance, too, makes the matter of salaries one of local adjustment between the orchestra's players and its management, and there is no law compelling a poorly paid player to sign a contract with the B. S. O. if he is able to get more money elsewhere. The MUSICAL COURIER tells the truth about all orchestras, whether union or "scab" (as our correspondent puts it more colloquially than elegantly), and therefore we do not think that New York papers are under the pay of Mr. Higginson, the B. S. O.'s financial backer, to praise the musical body from the Hub. The Boston Symphony is not interfering with the size of Philharmonic audiences, which are large and satisfactory to the directors and management of that enterprise. In Chicago and at other points on their recent tour the Boston players did not draw full houses and the newspaper praise was not always the most enthusiastic. Would A. K. infer from those facts that Mr. Higginson forgot to subvention the press of the inland?

◆

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 27,

KREISLER HEARD WITH SYMPHONY

Memorable Performance of Beethoven's Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall. The plain statement is equivalent to a great deal, especially to those who heard Mr. Kreisler's memorable performance of the same work, three seasons ago, in the same place.

The nobility of the performance yesterday afternoon was not dimmed by the memory of the previous interpresation, and for once the presence of a solo on a programme of orchestral music was neither incongruous nor distasteful to the most serious musicians present.

BEETHOVEN'S SPIRIT FELT

The greatness of the Beethoven concerto itself gives it precedence over nearly every other work of which we know, in this form. The violinist of yesterday in interpreting it stood at the right hand of the composer, and Dr. Muck, who conducted a remarkable accompaniment, was certainly stationed on the other. Orchestra, conductor and soloist co-operated in a wonderful ensemble, and once more there was felt the presence of the spirit of Beethoven.

Other details of an engrossing concert were the familiar symphony in E flat of Mozart, and Rachmaninoff's singular tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," after the well-known picture of Boecklin. The performance of the symphony was as nearly ideal as the performance of any symphony of Mozart could be when given by a modern orchestra of symphonic proportions. In technical finish, beauty of coloring and an emotional quality not denied to the Mozart of the symphonies, any more than to the composer of "Don Giovanni" or "The Marriage of Figaro," this performance was a beacon light of what a performance of a Mozart symphony should be. The audience appreciated the character of the performance, and finally the orchestra was called to its feet to bow with the conductor.

Mr. Kreisler's Eloquence

Mr. Kreisler's playing of the concerto was as remarkable for its classic line and its purity of style as for its searching eloquence and mastery. This violinist has been accused in some quarters of a tendency to sentimentalize. To such a charge the performance of yesterday would have been all the answer necessary. Nothing could have been warmer and yet more restrained, nothing more filled with inner fire, but symphonic in its manner, and as relentless as a good symphony or a fugue in its march toward completion. Noteworthy, too, were the cadenzas, which are superb examples of a composer's skill. The walk of the motives in the cadenza for the first movement, the Beethovenish spirit of the violinist's contribution, completed the effect.

The performance of Rachmaninoff's tone poem again demonstrated the fact that a piece of music, well composed, will stand on its own legs pretty firmly, for Dr. Muck's reading, effective as it was, was in many respects directly responsible to the intention of the composer. Not that it lacked coherence or effect, not that it failed to move the audience. It was an exceptionally dramatic reading, and a perfectly coherent presentation of the music. Nor does one's reservation lie in the fact that the conductor's tempi were faster than those taken by the composer when he was in Boston, and also faster, in many places, than the score indicated.

A Subtle Difference

No! The difference was far more subtle, and lay in the different outlooks of two wholly different personalities, which may never hope to be reconciled.

First, the spirit of this music, one is fain to believe, is far more contemplative, introspective than dramatic or in any way theatrical. It is not more Tschaikowskian gloom which fills this music. It is music rather of mysticism and resignation, rather the expression of one who stands a little to one side on the highway of life, and understands and pities, rather than one still in the grip of the passions.

When the composer conducted this piece in Boston some seasons ago, it was discovered that the scoring was intended for purpose of subdued coloring rather than for brilliant climaxes, and instead of three climaxes, as yesterday, there was one great climax.

Dr. Muck's conception was dramatic and concrete. This music is music of reflection rather than action, suggestion rather than assertion. It was too effective a performance! It thus left something to be desired!

NOVEMBER 27,

DAILY ADVERTISER,

FRITZ KREISLER'S GREAT SUCCESS

Symphony Concert Shows Sharp Contrasts of Orchestral Works

MOZART'S SYMPHONY AND RACHMANINOFF

Dr. Muck Reads Work With Impressive Power—Sombre Ending

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Mozart—Clarinette Symphony. E-flat.
Beethoven—Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.
Rachmaninoff—"The Isle of the Dead," Symphonic Poem.

Dr. Muck delights in sharp contrasts. Almost invariably, if he gives a modern work, he also gives, immediately before or after it, an ultra-classical, extremely conservative composition. Yesterday afternoon this wide contrast existed between Mozart's symphony and Rachmaninoff's times was as great as that between Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe," and Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher," in literature. Yet Mozart's E-flat symphony was considered a very advanced work in its day. It introduced the clarinette into the symphonic orchestra for the first time.

The clarinette, rather crude and undeveloped, and known in England as the "Shawm," was experimented with by Handel (the Richard Strauss of the 18th century) just once, in his "Richard I", and then dismissed as useless. All the clarinette passages that one nears in the works of Bach and Handel, with this single exception, have been written by later composers. The beautiful clarinette passages in "The Messiah" are by Mozart. In his day the instrument was somewhat improved and he determined to use it in symphony also.

At that time the wood-wind was always in three parts—flutes, oboes and bassoons. Holding to this three-part arrangement in this symphony, Mozart banishes the oboes and gives the middle part to the then new instrument. But he does not yet completely understand the clarinette. The glory and the weird character of its lower register (called the Chalumeau) was only fully revealed later on, in the works of Mendelssohn and Weber, and their comprehension of the instrument was chiefly due to their friendship with Heinrich Joseph Baermann (grandfather of the late Prof. Carl Baermann), who was the first great performer upon the instrument. Even Beethoven did not understand the possibilities of this instrument, the king of the woodwind.

Of the performance of the work there is nothing new to be said. To perform a Mozart symphony interestingly is not so easy as one may imagine. In such simplicity there must be perfection of shading, perfect phrasing, the best of ensemble, for little faults stand out more clearly here than in an over-swollen modern work. There were no faults to condone in the interpretation of yesterday afternoon, and the work was made virile and forcible instead of presenting a sweet and effeminate Mozart, as lesser conductors sometimes do. Yet we do not warm to the Mozart Symphonies (always excepting the G minor and "Jupiter") as we do to the more jovial, light and prattling works of Haydn. The first and last movements, however, were very effective in this performance, and there was great applause at the end. In this concert, for once the tail wagged the dog, the soloist was a greater attraction than the orchestra. The symphonic character was, however, not disturbed by this, since Beethoven's violin concerto is really a symphony with a thread of violin obbligato interwoven. It is by far the greatest of all violin concertos, and to hear it played, as this greatest of all living violinists plays it, was something really inspiring.

It demands breadth and power which with any but a full-fledged artist easily descends into vehemence. How those four repeated notes of the first movement resounded in the orchestra and solo part! They are more impressive even than the four-noted figure of the fifth symphony, of which Beethoven said—"That's the way that Destiny knocks at the door!" And yet, they tell the story in Vienna, that Beethoven got the idea of this figure from a drunken man who was pounding at a door in his street, having been locked out at a late hour; the same four knocks were afterwards used by Schubert in his C major symphony.

The first movement is the nub of the work. The final Rondo is a falling off, even when it is as brilliantly played as Mr. Kreisler gave it at this concert. This is the case also with the finale of Beethoven's "Emperor" piano-concerto, and with his Heroic Symphony. He seems often to play his trump card first, in his cycle forms. But even with this reservation the work was gloriously effective from beginning to end; Beethoven's second best is better than any other concerto-writer's very best, and Kreisler's abandon, elasticity and power, were seconded by Dr. Muck and the orchestra in an ensemble that was altogether commendable. It was true music again, in the days when we are getting a great deal of false music. Naturally the solo artist awakened great enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again, and the spontaneous tribute was fully deserved. We were sorry, however, to see a few uninformed auditors in the second gallery try to force an encore, which is entirely against the rule of these dignified concerts.

A word must be added regarding the cadenza of the first movement. It was an excellently constructed one and was played with incomparable beauty and delicacy.

The final number of this enjoyable programme was also something to grow enthusiastic over. Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead" is one of the most worthy of modern compositions. Familiarity here by no means breeds contempt, but reveals new beauties at each hearing. Such a work as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" reveals all that it has to say at the first audition and grows somewhat weaker thereafter, but such works as Bruckner's seventh symphony, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" or this "Isle of the Dead," only grow stronger with repetitions.

We wish that the auditor might have in his hand a photograph of Boecklin's picture, when listening to the music inspired by it. The utter loneliness and the solemn gloom suggested in the painting are well translated into tones. That impressive ground-bass, which is carried on so long in picturesque monotony, does not suggest the splash of waves so much as the sweep of the oars, and one thinks of Tennyson's lines in "Elaine,"

"And the dead, steered by the dumb,
Went upwards with the flood."

But Rosenthal's painting, which grew out of these lines, is not as impressive as Boecklin's work. There is simplicity, too, in some of the construction of Rachmaninoff's music, and the ground-bass alluded to above can almost be reduced to tonic and dominant chords. The control of rhythm which the composer displays might be a lesson to some of his contemporaries.

Dr. Muck read the work with impressive power. It made rather a sombre ending to the concert, especially for the Thanksgiving time, but it was well worth hearing again. It is so seldom that one can welcome something genuine and lofty in the music of most recent days that "The Isle of the Dead" should always be welcome.

BOSTON HERALD,

NOVEMBER 27.

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" a Feature of the Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The sixth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major (K 543); Beethoven, Concerto for the violin (Mr. Kreisler, violinist); Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."

If Arnold Boecklin's picture, "The Island of the Dead," had been in full view of the audience, many would have wondered how the composer of the symphonic poem written to it could have found in this picture some of the thoughts that he expressed in tones.

To most of us this sombre painting suggests infinite quiet, eternal rest.

Then star nor sun shall waken,
  Nor any change of light;
Nor sounds of water shaken,
  Nor any sound or sight:
Nor wintry leaves nor vernal
  Nor days nor things diurnal;
Only the sleep eternal
  In an eternal night.

The symphonic poem opens in a spirit all in harmony with the painter's expression. There is the "tranquil lapping of the water"; there is the thought of the island with its funereal trees and awful rocks; there is the mysterious figure near the coffin, standing as the ferryman rows as with muffled oars. This symphonic poem has been conducted here by the composer, Mr. Fiedler, and now Dr. Muck. When the composer conducted, the scene as painted by Boecklin was brought marvellously to the mind of the hearer. The mood was one of melancholy monotony, sustained, impressive, but never tiresome. Neither Mr. Fiedler nor Dr. Muck succeeded in giving this strange, indescribable impression of death, its quiet and loneliness.

This mood passes. There is not only a lament that rises to a frantic pitch; there is apparently the picture of the Last Great Day, with music that Puccini might have found for the torture chamber in "Tosca"; there is the sound of the dread hymn for the dead, the plain song, "Dies Irae" of the Holy Church. The music is powerful, dramatic if you please; but what has it to do with the moody Boecklin's picture?

It would be interesting to know how Rachmaninoff saw "The Island of the Dead." No two persons see a picture, a landscape, a seascape in exactly the same way. No two persons hear music in precisely the same manner. Yet two ordinary men would feel that Boecklin expressed the thought

That no life lives forever;
  That dead men rise up never;
That even the weariest river
  Winds somewhere safe to sea.

If there were to be a theme from the service for the dead, it should be the "Requiem Aeternam," not the "Dies Irae"; for what have wrath and terror to do with Boecklin's picture?

Behold, here is a mystery. Did Rachmaninoff conjure up thoughts of a frightful afterlife awaiting the passenger making the last journey? Was he obsessed by Poe's terrible tale "Silence"? What fired his imagination? He is a man of brains, and not merely musical brains. He is also a Russian. He gives no explanation. He simply points to the picture, in which he sees things not visible to the great majority.

This symphonic poem was played dramatically. While the symphony of Mozart had the serene beauty of a Grecian frieze. The last movement performed with great spirit and with a fine treatment of the charming chattering might have been written by Mozart for

Mr. Kreisler, stormily applauded, repeated the remarkable performance of Beethoven's concerto which he gave three years ago this week. Yesterday, as then, the orchestral accompaniment, as led by Dr. Muck, was as remarkable as Mr. Kreisler's interpretation, upon which it is not necessary to dwell; an interpretation conspicuous for triumphant technic, and for an appreciation of the music that rose to devotion, which, however, was not slavish, but as if one master recognized another.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in F major, "Pastoral"; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Smetana, symphonic poem "Vysehrad"; Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 27,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM MOZART BY BEETHOVEN TO RACHMANINOV

Dr. Muck Revives the Russian's Tone-Poem, "The Isle of the Dead"—The Riddles and the Power of Music and Performance — Mr. Kreisler Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and Orchestra, Conductor and Virtuoso Are as One—Mozart as Fore-Runner

DEEP in human nature lies the child-like or the dog-like impulse to believe that, however often a thing is refused, at last it will be granted. From the earliest times extra pieces for the "assisting artists" or the repetition of a purely orchestral number have been forbidden at the Symphony Concerts, except in the case of Mr. Paderewski. There is not a reason in the world why he should be permitted to play additional numbers that is not equally applicable to Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Miss Farrar or any other "soloist" of the first rank. But in some bad old way the precedent became fixed and a management that waited twenty-five years before it struck the absurd word "rehearsal" from the designation of the afternoon concerts is not likely to abate Mr. Paderewski's privilege. He may pass for the exception that proves the rule, even though the applause of the audience yesterday showed clearly that no small part of it would have Mr. Kreisler also excepted. Time and again, after the violinist had played Beethoven's concerto, plaudits recalled him; time and again they subsided only to renew themselves now from one corner of the house and now from another in the fashion that every practiced concert-goer knows is the way of an audience when it obstinately wishes an extra piece. Of course it received none; and it is safe to say that Mr. Kreisler, being of discreet and modest temper, had no desire to thrust himself through rule and custom of the concerts. The insistence of the listeners, however, was curious and interesting to watch and there has been no parallel for it since the day in which another audience demanded a repetition of Chabrier's "España," and Dr. Muck, seemingly almost persuaded, actually turned back the pages of the score. He went no further, however, and the concert ran the orthodox course. Yesterday neither he nor Mr. Kreisler so much as faltered.

Both deserved the applause that the audience heaped upon them and still more the intentness with which it listened throughout a long piece to violinist, conductor and band almost inextricably woven into the mutually containing web of Beethoven's music. For when Dr. Muck, Mr. Kreisler and the Symphony Orchestra play the concerto there is no thought—till long afterwards—of the constituent elements in the performance. Whether the conductor or the violinist chose the pace, for example, at which the movements were severally taken, no one hearing may say. The probabilities are that conductor and violinist, being alike finely-tempered, were at one in their notion of that which most fully and characteristically disclosed the music. Whether the ear of the conductor or the violinist was quickest with the perfect euphonies between the solo instrument and the other orchestral voices, is no more to be determined by any listener. A like instinct and skill with such refinements of tone probably prompted both, with the men of the orchestra adding their command of their particular instruments and their aptitude for such delicate beauty. All three, again, were at one in the exquisite body and the exquisite undulations of the tone that they made the voice of the music and all three were of like unity in every shading and every emphasis. The lightest detail of the concerto touched the ear; yet it moved throughout in flowing line and unbroken surface.

The plasticity and the coloring of Mr. Kreisler's tone, now light and bright and again deep and full, were hardly more moving to the ear than the lovely backgrounds that the wood-winds and the horns wrought for it. The embroidery of the string choir, when the music bade it so adorn the melody, was only a less beautiful tracery than the violinist's own. When there was transition, hardly an ear might say whether Dr. Muck or Mr. Kreisler was spinning it the more adroitly or whether it was conductor or virtuoso that was so artfully advancing a long crescendo or so alertly heightening the whole rhythm and motion of the music. Best of all, the twain were of one mind as to the substance and the style of the concerto. It is music that has charmed the ears and the sensibilities of men for a century and more by the happy invention of the melodies; the fancy with which they are developed and transformed; the diverse grace with which they are ornamented, the apt and unflagging ingenuity with which they display—to use a [illegible] word for what is really in the concerto a delicate process—the finer capacities of the virtuoso and of the conductor and the finer qualities of the violin and the orchestra that are their instruments. The concerto is not of the greater, the nobler, the heroic Beethoven; it is of Beethoven happy, fertile, lyric with a light, ingratiating and almost playful task. Scarcely any other of his surviving music so overflows with the charm that he could command no less than majesty.

Mozart, with the symphony in E-flat of his final years, seemed to lead the way into Beethoven's concerto in more senses than the mere relative position of the two pieces on the programme implied. Half the symphony at least is quick with a like mingling of charm and élan to that which flows out of the concerto. Mozart's minuet and trio are no more from one point of view than the conventional movement that orthodox procedure prescribed for the symphonies of the end of the eighteenth century. Yet how adroitly he distributes tonal light and shade in it—when there is the ear of a Muck to hear him—and how the abiding charm and the insinuating sentiment that set him apart from the rank and file of the composers of his day suffuse it. Is there not a like charm and sentiment, albeit scaled to a larger temperament and freer hand, in the Larghetto of the concerto? The finale to Mozart's symphony is all bright invention and light rhythmic energy and agility. The musical ideas return in cumulating repetitions; there are swirls of figures and foam of filigree. Here written fine is the pattern of the finale of the concerto written large.

Moreover, if the first two movements of the symphony—especially as Dr. Muck "read" them yesterday—were no preluding to the concerto, they foretold no less much that many another piece of Beethoven contains. Dr. Muck would have them no mere pattern-weaving in tones with charm and sentiment for their vesture and light energy for their propulsive power. The ear of Mozart himself might have rejoiced in the conductor's and the orchestra's distribution of tonal shadings and adroit emphasis through the slow movement; yet so doing by pace and accent and pervading and emanating mood Dr. Muck kept the Andante a brooding and troubled music—forerunner in its kind of the gravely contemplative slow movements that Beethoven was to write, discovering, almost, and then fulfilling the power of music to enchain the deeper and soberer emotions of men. Again, under Dr. Muck's vivid and vigorous hand, the first Allegro of the symphony moved with exciting energy of pace and rhythm, in bold contrasts, in incisive accents, in sweeps of full and ardent tone. It is hard to remember when it has been so intensified, when interplay of theme and counter-theme has had such emotional suggestion. Once again, there was clear foretaste of the expressive force and the passion of mood with which Beethoven was to make symphonic music puissant.

By no process that the music suggested was there any linking of Rachmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," to Beethoven's concerto. It sufficed and more as the contrasting and the relatively novel piece of a pleasurable programme. Once more, too, music and performance raised anew the old riddles and left them quite as unanswered. Usually, a composer who is conductor, too, is less vivid and impressive with his own music than are other able and eloquent leaders. Strauss himself—a conductor of no mean parts—cheerfully admits that more than one director excels him in imaginative power and revealing force with his tone-poems and music-dramas. Yet Rachmaninov, conducting in "The Isle of the Dead," when the piece was first heard at the Symphony Concerts six years ago, made the music haunt ear and imagination as has none that has come after him with it. True, it was wholly new then; and the composer as a writer for orchestra was almost unknown to Bostonian ears. Yet even so he wrought his tone-picture at the beginning and at the end as has no other conductor hereabouts who has essayed the poem. Nobody expected that Mr. Fiedler would do much with such exacting music; everybody anticipated that Dr. Muck would rise high with it. He did; but not to the heights of pictorial and atmospheric suggestion that the composer himself attained in his tonal visioning of the isle that was sanctuary of solitude and stillness, and where dead spirits lay at rest or walked ghostly.

Did not Dr. Muck take this delineative music of the opening and the closing of the tone-poem at a little too quick a pace to preserve quite the long, slow, unfolding and sea-like movement of it? Was he a shade too preoccupied with the vivid details of instrumental and harmonic color that Rachmaninov has wrought upon it, like the lap-lap-lap of the little wavelets upon the silent shore, to deepen the uncanny atmosphere that exhales from this beginning and this end a gray and hidden place where neither light nor air nor leaf does ever stir, where nothing is that has life within it? Perhaps and perhaps. As of old, the conductor lacked neither the picturing imagination nor the heightening and the imparting resource that he has proved time and again with delineative music. Yet Rachmaninov invested it with a penetrating and haunting quality that he did not summon.

No more did Dr. Muck—or for that matter—Rachmaninov himself—read the riddle of all that fills the tone-poem between picture and picture. Admittedly, it is thrilling music to hear—music that pierces ear and heart with its voice of longing, music that harries the listening spirit with the voice of tortured struggle, music that summons the old hymn of the end of all things, music that rises to heights and lays open depths of poignantly human feeling with poignantly human eloquence. But what has the Dies Iræ and the visions that it evokes of the Christian heaven and the Christian hell to do with this pagan place where the dead abide in the eternal calm of solitude and stillness in chamber that no Judgment-Day as it seems, shall ever unlock? The isle of Boecklin's picture with its Charon-like ferryman is of no world of churches and sects.

Longing, that mounts in intenser and intenser accents cries out of the music. Do the souls of these pagan dead, taught to love life more dearly than aught that comes afterward, moan and pine for it in ghostly voices? Do they stir at last with the torture of the longing until they struggle with the stillness and solitude of their lifeless land? At the beginning of the tone-poem they are so encompassed; at the end such oblivion again descends upon them. A Dresdener, who knew Rachmaninov well when he dwelt in the Saxon capital, has so read the riddle of the tone-poem; but the composer, as the French say, guards a silence. "We can all praise the players" observes the disconcerted host at the end of "Fanny's First Play," when the reviewers are variously "interpreting" Shaw's comedy. So we who listened yesterday with a hundred varying impressions may all praise the graphic beauty, the poignant power, the sustained eloquence, the high imagination and the instant illusion of Rachmaninov's tone-poem. Not too much music written in our time may stand beside it.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT. DECEMBER 10,

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

JOHN POWELL NEW AND NOTABLE PIANIST

His Playing of Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia with Dr. Muck in Cambridge—The Virtues of the Zoellner Quartet—Mr. Gebhard in New Pieces of His Own

BETWEEN a repetition of Rimsky Korsakov's suite "Antar" and another of Rachmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck played in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening a piece unheard hereabouts for many years in which an uncommonly interesting and able pianist was heard for the first time by Bostonian ears. The piece was the Hungarian Fantasia that Liszt translated and expanded for pianoforte and orchestra from the fourteenth of his rhapsodies; the pianist was Mr. John Powell, Virginian by birth, European by training; composer and virtuoso both, who has dwelt long in Europe and who has now returned, scarcely heralded, to make his way in concerts on this side of the sea. As a composer he is already known to them by the individually imagined and resourcefully accomplished concerto for violin that Mr. Zimbalist played a few years ago; as a virtuoso, by the testimony of his playing last evening, he will soon find as deserved a place, even as he has in London and other more distant capitals.

The fantasia itself is a pleasurable and characteristic music, utilizing the motives and following the general lines of the rhapsody whence it came. It begins in grave and sonorous preluding; it proceeds in ornate passage-work and cadenza for the pianoforte; it mounts into an ardent and eloquent "Allegro Eroico," and it culminates in an extended, excited, and multifariously quickened and colored finale in the gypsy manner. It runs in the usual contrasts — languorous or wild — of such Hungarian music as Liszt wrote in his "national idiom"; it teems with even or syncopated Hungarian rhythms; it is fertile with the ornament that Liszt could invent to tax the skill and resource of the pianist and yet accord with the characteristics and the moods of these Hungarian pieces; and, again after his fashion, it has moments of sensuous beauty, declamatory force and tonal tumult that cloak workmanship with emotion, illusion and excitement. As it was written, so Mr. Powell played it—with no little command of broad sweeps of large and deep tone; of glinting and seemingly improvised ornament; of significant and stirring modulation in pace and rhythm; of the pervading moods and the momentary temper of the music. At every turn ready resource served him; his tone had clarity, body, warmth and eloquence; he answered to instrumental song; he struck rhythmic fire. There was individuality in his playing and power and beauty. In its own voice and image the music glowed under his hand. Piece and pianist alike deserved the Symphony Concerts at home.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST, DECEMBER 11,

DUKAS' WORK BY SYMPHONY

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" Given Hearing

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was no soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra played Beethoven's sixth symphony, Dukas' orchestral scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Smetana's symphonic poem, from the cycle, "My Fatherland," "Vyrserhad," and Enesco's First Roumanian Rhapsody in A major.

No doubt the performance of Beethoven's symphony was eloquent, whatever one's opinion of the symphony itself may be. The performance of Dukas' amazingly witty scherzo was heavy handed. The instrumentation of Dukas, which should sparkle and flash like [illegible], sounded at times heavy [illegible]

[illegible] extreme acceleration toward the end. The noble work of Smetana made again a profound impression, and it was well performed. Enesco's rhapsody is not, frankly speaking, worth the paper it is printed on, in a heroic spirit. The music, which in the time of Dvorak's youth would have been called fresh and pleasing is now "old hat." The reiteration of Roumanian dance tunes becomes monotonous. The audience was cordial and applauded for a long time.

BOSTON GLOBE—DECEMBER 11.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven "Pastoral" Is Played Dramatically.

Music by Dukas and Enesco Add Color to Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the seventh Friday afternoon concert yesterday. The "pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, who died in 1827, followed by "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas, who was born 38 years later, prompts its own observations in "program" music.

With the four movements of the symphony were printed the scenes of nature's serenity, bucolic mirth, the storm, and the song of praise. A condensed English version of Goeth's ballad, which inspired Dukas was printed elsewhere in the program book.

Music which becomes baldly photographic in its realism is not among the finest examples of that written to a "program." Beethoven discouraged too literal a basis of fact for the symphony. His love for the country was at all times intense within him. Nature was healer and companion to him, a creature of varied moods, as she was to Wordsworth, and is no less mirrored here than in pages of the piano sonatas and quartets.

The first two movements whatever the programatic suggestion, are replete with that calm and tranquility to be found in the bosom of nature. There is serenity and no hint of petty circumstance or artifice, while this is characterizing with imagination, the third movement possesses even to modern ears a strikingly dramatic moment. The sudden hush, the sharp intrusion in a remote key of the muttering thunder in double basses and the ensuing down pour is all pictorial and stimulating, and with comparatively what simple means. The performance was one of euphony and dramatic beauty.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," an admirable type of modern program music in which there is symbolism and suggestion rather than attempt at too literal reproduction, is always pleasurable. Dr Muck's feeling for this also is one of satirical, at times sardonic, humor and was pointed yesterday.

Smetana is boresome in his patriotism in "Vysehrad," the first symphonic poem of his cycle, "My Country." The ideas are not striking and there is much scattered treatment. Many with reason left the hall at its conclusion. In so doing they missed Enesco's first Rumanian Rhapsody in A major, a potpourri of Rumanian National airs. There is vivacity, but little development, little variety or enrichment of expression. Noise often passes for weightier matter.

BOSTON JOURNAL—DECEMBER 11.

BEETHOVEN WORK IDEALLY PLAYED

Dr. Muck Gives a Poetical Reading of "Pastoral" Symphony.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, the andante of which Vincent d'Indy has called the most beautiful picture of true nature to be found in musical literature, has the place of honor on this week's Symphony program. It was performed at yesterday's concert with appropriately beautiful effects.

Beethoven found in nature "a friend with whom he took pleasure in familiar talk"—on the whole, a simple, gentle, rustic friend. So he expressed himself in this sixth symphony. Dr. Muck's interpretation was graceful, sympathetic; so perfect, in fact, that the art of it was completely concealed.

No doubt, to many the "Pastoral" symphony nowadays seems tame. It was written by a nature lover who did not believe in tone painting to any great extent. The subject would be treated much more realistically today. The audience yesterday took the charming performance rather coolly.

Modern works make up the remainder of the program. Dukas' ingenious scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," "Vysehrad," the symphonic poem in which Smetana decribes a dream of the ancient glories of Bohemia, and Enesco's "Rumainian Rhapsody," written around traditional airs of the composer's native land, are picturesque and pleasing examples of the lesser classics. Besides, they could hardly be played better than they were played yesterday.

There will be a soloist at next week's concerts, Miss Ruth Deyo, the pianist, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor. The pure[illegible] orchestral pieces will be [illegible] Mer" sketches and [illegible]

Mr. Kreisler, stormily applauded, repeated the remarkable performance of Beethoven's concerto which he gave three years ago this week. Yesterday, as then, the orchestral accompaniment, as led by Dr. Muck, was as remarkable as Mr. Kreisler's interpretation, upon which it is not necessary to dwell; an interpretation conspicuous for triumphant technic, and for an appreciation of the music that rose to devotion, which, however, was not slavish, but as if one master recognized another.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in F major, "Pastoral"; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Smetana, symphonic poem "Vysehrad"; Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 27,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM MOZART BY BEETHOVEN TO RACHMANINOV

Dr. Muck Revives the Russian's Tone-Poem, "The Isle of the Dead"—The Riddles and the Power of Music and Performance — Mr. Kreisler Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and Orchestra, Conductor and Virtuoso Are as One—Mozart as Fore-Runner

DEEP in human nature lies the child-like or the dog-like impulse to believe that, however often a thing is refused, at last it will be granted. From the earliest times extra pieces for the "assisting artists" or the repetition of a purely orchestral number have been forbidden at the Symphony Concerts, except in the case of Mr. Paderewski. There is not a reason in the world why he should be permitted to play additional numbers that is not equally applicable to Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Miss Farrar or any other "soloist" of the first rank. But in some bad old way the precedent became fixed and a management that waited twenty-five years before it struck the absurd word "rehearsal" from the designation of the afternoon concerts is not likely to abate Mr. Paderewski's privilege. He may pass for the exception that proves the rule, even though the applause of the audience yesterday showed clearly that no small part of it would have Mr. Kreisler also excepted. Time and again, after the violinist had played Beethoven's concerto, plaudits recalled him; time and again they subsided only to renew themselves now from one corner of the house and now from another in the fashion that every practiced concert-goer knows is the way of an audience when it obstinately wishes an extra piece. Of course it received none; and it is safe to say that Mr. Kreisler, being of discreet and modest temper, had no desire to thrust himself through rule and custom of the concerts. The insistence of the listeners, however, was curious and interesting to watch and there has been no parallel for it since the day in which another audience demanded a repetition of Chabrier's "España," and Dr. Muck, seemingly almost persuaded, actually turned back the pages of the score. He went no further, however, and the concert ran the orthodox course. Yesterday neither he nor Mr. Kreisler so much as faltered.

Both deserved the applause that the audience heaped upon them and still more the intentness with which it listened throughout a long piece to violinist, conductor and band almost inextricably woven into the mutually containing web of Beethoven's music. For when Dr. Muck, Mr. Kreisler and the Symphony Orchestra play the concerto there is no thought—till long afterwards—of the constituent elements in the performance. Whether the conductor or the violinist chose the pace, for example, at which the movements were severally taken, no one hearing may say. The probabilities are that conductor and violinist, being alike finely-tempered, were at one in their notion of that which most fully and characteristically disclosed the music. Whether the ear of the conductor or the violinist was quickest with the perfect euphonies between the solo instrument and the other orchestral voices, is no more to be determined by any listener. A like instinct and skill with such refinements of tone probably prompted both, with the men of the orchestra adding their command of their particular instruments and their aptitude for such delicate beauty. All three, again, were at one in the exquisite body and the exquisite undulations of the tone that they made the voice of the music and all three were of like unity in every shading and every emphasis. The lightest detail of the concerto touched the ear; yet it moved throughout in flowing line and unbroken surface.

The plasticity and the coloring of Mr. Kreisler's tone, now light and bright and again deep and full, were hardly more moving to the ear than the lovely backgrounds that the wood-winds and the horns wrought for it. The embroidery of the string choir, when the music bade it so adorn the melody, was only a less beautiful tracery than the violinist's own. When there was transition, hardly an ear might say whether Dr. Muck or Mr. Kreisler was spinning it the more adroitly or whether it was conductor or virtuoso that was so artfully advancing a long crescendo or so alertly heightening the whole rhythm and motion of the music. Best of all, the twain were of one mind as to the substance and the style of the concerto. It is music that has charmed the ears and the sensibilities of men for a century and more by the happy invention of the melodies; the fancy with which they are developed and transformed; the diverse grace with which they are ornamented, the apt and unflagging ingenuity with which they display—to use a harsh word for what is really in the concerto a delicate process—the finer capacities of the virtuoso and of the conductor and the finer qualities of the violin and the orchestra that are their instruments. The concerto is not of the greater, the nobler, the heroic Beethoven; it is of Beethoven happy, fertile, lyric with a light, ingratiating and almost playful task. Scarcely any other of his surviving music so overflows with the charm that he could command no less than majesty.

Mozart, with the symphony in E-flat of his final years, seemed to lead the way into Beethoven's concerto in more senses than the mere relative position of the two pieces on the programme implied. Half the symphony at least is quick with a like mingling of charm and élan to that which flows out of the concerto. Mozart's minuet and trio are no more from one point of view than the conventional movement that orthodox procedure prescribed for the symphonies of the end of the eighteenth century. Yet how adroitly he distributes tonal light and shade in it—when there is the ear of a Muck to hear him—and how the abiding charm and the insinuating sentiment that set him apart from the rank and file of the composers of his day suffuse it. Is there not a like charm and sentiment, albeit scaled to a larger temperament and freer hand, in the Larghetto of the concerto? The finale to Mozart's symphony is all bright invention and light rhythmic energy and agility. The musical ideas return in cumulating repetitions; there are swirls of figures and foam of filigree. Here written fine is the pattern of the finale of the concerto written large.

Moreover, if the first two movements of the symphony—especially as Dr. Muck "read" them yesterday—were no preluding to the concerto, they foretold no less much that many another piece of Beethoven contains. Dr. Muck would have them no mere pattern-weaving in tones with charm and sentiment for their vesture and light energy for their propulsive power. The ear of Mozart himself might have rejoiced in the conductor's and the orchestra's distribution of tonal shadings and adroit emphasis through the slow movement; yet so doing by pace and accent and pervading and emanating mood Dr. Muck kept the Andante a brooding and troubled music—forerunner in its kind of the gravely contemplative slow movements that Beethoven was to write, discovering, almost, and then fulfilling the power of music to enchain the deeper and soberer emotions of men. Again, under Dr. Muck's vivid and vigorous hand, the first Allegro of the symphony moved with exciting energy of pace and rhythm, in bold contrasts, in incisive accents, in sweeps of full and ardent tone. It is hard to remember when it has been so intensified, when interplay of theme and counter-theme has had such emotional suggestion. Once again, there was clear foretaste of the expressive force and the passion of mood with which Beethoven was to make symphonic music puissant.

By no process that the music suggested was there any linking of Rachmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," to Beethoven's concerto. It sufficed and more as the contrasting and the relatively novel piece of a pleasurable programme. Once more, too, music and performance raised anew the old riddles and left them quite as unanswered. Usually, a composer who is conductor, too, is less vivid and impressive with his own music than are other able and eloquent leaders. Strauss himself—a conductor of no mean parts—cheerfully admits that more than one director excels him in imaginative power and revealing force with his tone-poems and music-dramas. Yet Rachmaninov, conducting in "The Isle of the Dead," when the piece was first heard at the Symphony Concerts six years ago, made the music haunt ear and imagination as has none that has come after him with it. True, it was wholly new then; and the composer as a writer for orchestra was almost unknown to Bostonian ears. Yet even so he wrought his tone-picture at the beginning and at the end as has no other conductor hereabouts who has essayed the poem. Nobody expected that Mr. Fiedler would do much with such exacting music; everybody anticipated that Dr. Muck would rise high with it. He did; but not to the heights of pictorial and atmospheric suggestion that the composer himself attained in his tonal visioning of the isle that was sanctuary of solitude and stillness, and where dead spirits lay at rest or walked ghostly.

Did not Dr. Muck take this delineative music of the opening and the closing of the tone-poem at a little too quick a pace to preserve quite the long, slow, unfolding and sea-like movement of it? Was he a shade too preoccupied with the vivid details of instrumental and harmonic color that Rachmaninov has wrought upon it, like the lap-lap-lap of the little wavelets upon the silent shore, to deepen the uncanny atmosphere that exhales from this beginning and this end a gray and hidden place where neither light nor air nor leaf does ever stir, where nothing is that has life within it? Perhaps and perhaps. As of old, the conductor lacked neither the picturing imagination nor the heightening and the imparting resource that he has proved time and again with delineative music. Yet Rachmaninov invested it with a penetrating and haunting quality that he did not summon.

No more did Dr. Muck—or for that matter—Rachmaninov himself—read the riddle of all that fills the tone-poem between picture and picture. Admittedly, it is thrilling music to hear—music that pierces ear and heart with its voice of longing, music that harries the listening spirit with the voice of tortured struggle, music that summons the old hymn of the end of all things, music that rises to heights and lays open depths of poignantly human feeling with poignantly human eloquence. But what has the Dies Iræ and the visions that it evokes of the Christian heaven and the Christian hell to do with this pagan place where the dead abide in the eternal calm of solitude and stillness in chamber that no Judgment-Day as it seems, shall ever unlock? The isle of Boecklin's picture with its Charon-like ferryman is of no world of churches and sects.

Longing, that mounts in intenser and intenser accents cries out of the music. Do the souls of these pagan dead, taught to love life more dearly than aught that comes afterward, moan and pine for it in ghostly voices? Do they stir at last with the torture of the longing until they struggle with the stillness and solitude of their lifeless land? At the beginning of the tone-poem they are so encompassed; at the end such oblivion again descends upon them. A Dresdener, who knew Rachmaninov well when he dwelt in the Saxon capital, has so read the riddle of the tone-poem; but the composer, as the French say, guards a silence. "We can all praise the players" observes the disconcerted host at the end of "Fanny's First Play," when the reviewers are variously "interpreting" Shaw's comedy. So we who listened yesterday with a hundred varying impressions may all praise the graphic beauty, the poignant power, the sustained eloquence, the high imagination and the instant illusion of Rachmaninov's tone-poem. Not too much music written in our time may stand beside it.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT. DECEMBER 10,

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

JOHN POWELL NEW AND NOTABLE PIANIST

His Playing of Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia with Dr. Muck in Cambridge—The Virtues of the Zoellner Quartet—Mr. Gebhard in New Pieces of His Own

BETWEEN a repetition of Rimsky Korsakov's suite "Antar" and another of Rachmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck played in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening a piece unheard hereabouts for many years in which an uncommonly interesting and able pianist was heard for the first time by Bostonian ears. The piece was the Hungarian Fantasia that Liszt translated and expanded for pianoforte and orchestra from the fourteenth of his rhapsodies; the pianist was Mr. John Powell, Virginian by birth, European by training; composer and virtuoso both, who has dwelt long in Europe and who has now returned, scarcely heralded, to make his way in concerts on this side of the sea. As a composer he is already known to them by the individually imagined and resourcefully accomplished concerto for violin that Mr. Zimbalist played a few years ago; as a virtuoso, by the testimony of his playing last evening, he will soon find as deserved a place, even as he has in London and other more distant capitals.

The fantasia itself is a pleasurable and characteristic music, utilizing the motives and following the general lines of the rhapsody whence it came. It begins in grave and sonorous preluding; it proceeds in ornate passage-work and cadenza for the pianoforte; it mounts into an ardent and eloquent "Allegro Eroico," and it culminates in an extended, excited, and multifariously quickened and colored finale in the gypsy manner. It runs in the usual contrasts — languorous or wild — of such Hungarian music as Liszt wrote in his "national idiom"; it teems with even or syncopated Hungarian rhythms; it is fertile with the ornament that Liszt could invent to tax the skill and resource of the pianist and yet accord with the characteristics and the moods of these Hungarian pieces; and, again after his fashion, it has moments of sensuous beauty, declamatory force and tonal tumult that cloak workmanship with emotion, illusion and excitement. As it was written, so Mr. Powell played it—with no little command of broad sweeps of large and deep tone; of glinting and seemingly improvised ornament; of significant and stirring modulation in pace and rhythm; of the pervading moods and the momentary temper of the music. At every turn ready resource served him; his tone had clarity, body, warmth and eloquence; he answered to instrumental song; he struck rhythmic fire. There was individuality in his playing and power and beauty. In its own voice and image the music glowed under his hand. Piece and pianist alike deserved the Symphony Concerts at home.

H. T. P.

BOSTON POST, DECEMBER 11,

DUKAS' WORK BY SYMPHONY

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" Given Hearing

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was no soloist at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra played Beethoven's sixth symphony, Dukas' orchestral scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Smetana's symphonic poem, from the cycle, "My Fatherland," "Vyrserhad," and Enesco's First Roumanian Rhapsody in A major.

No doubt the performance of Beethoven's symphony was eloquent, whatever one's opinion of the symphony itself may be. The performance of Dukas' amazingly witty scherzo was heavy handed. The instrumentation of Dukas, which should sparkle and flash like electricity, sounded at times heavy seemed despotically regular until an extreme acceleration toward the end. The noble work of Smetana made again a profound impression, and it was well performed. Enesco's rhapsody is not, frankly speaking, worth the paper it is printed on, in a heroic spirit. The music, which in the time of Dvorak's youth would have been called fresh and pleasing is now "old hat." The reiteration of Roumanian dance tunes becomes monotonous. The audience was cordial and applauded for a long time.

BOSTON GLOBE- DECEMBER 11.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven "Pastoral" Is Played Dramatically.

Music by Dukas and Enesco Add Color to Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the seventh Friday afternoon concert yesterday. The "pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, who died in 1827, followed by "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas, who was born 38 years later, prompts its own observations in "program" music.

With the four movements of the symphony were printed the scenes of nature's serenity, bucolic mirth, the storm, and the song of praise. A condensed English version of Goeth's ballad, which inspired Dukas was printed elsewhere in the program book.

Music which becomes baldly photographic in its realism is not among the finest examples of that written to a "program." Beethoven discouraged too literal a basis of fact for the symphony. His love for the country was at all times intense within him. Nature was healer and companion to him, a creature of varied moods, as she was to Wordsworth, and is no less mirrored here than in pages of the piano sonatas and quartets.

The first two movements whatever the programatic suggestion, are replete with that calm and tranquility to be found in the bosom of nature. There is serenity and no hint of petty circumstance or artifice, while this is characterizing with imagination, the third movement possesses even to modern ears a strikingly dramatic moment. The sudden hush, the sharp intrusion in a remote key of the muttering thunder in double basses and the ensuing down pour is all pictorial and stimulating, and with comparatively what simple means. The performance was one of euphony and dramatic beauty.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," an admirable type of modern program music in which there is symbolism and suggestion rather than attempt at too literal reproduction, is always pleasurable. Dr Muck's feeling for this also is one of satirical, at times sardonic, humor and was pointed yesterday.

Smetana is boresome in his patriotism in "Vysehrad," the first symphonic poem of his cycle, "My Country." The ideas are not striking and there is much scattered treatment. Many with reason left the hall at its conclusion. In so doing they missed Enesco's first Rumanian Rhapsody in A major, a potpourri of Rumanian National airs. There is vivacity, but little development, little variety or enrichment of expression. Noise often passes for weightier matter.

BOSTON JOURNAL- DECEMBER 11,

BEETHOVEN WORK IDEALLY PLAYED

Dr. Muck Gives a Poetical Reading of "Pastoral" Symphony.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, the andante of which Vincent d'Indy has called the most beautiful picture of true nature to be found in musical literature, has the place of honor on this week's Symphony program. It was performed at yesterday's concert with appropriately beautiful effects.

Beethoven found in nature "a friend with whom he took pleasure in familiar talk"—on the whole, a simple, gentle, rustic friend. So he expressed himself in this sixth symphony. Dr. Muck's interpretation was graceful, sympathetic; so perfect, in fact, that the art of it was completely concealed.

No doubt, to many the "Pastoral" symphony nowadays seems tame. It was written by a nature lover who did not believe in tone painting to any great extent. The subject would be treated much more realistically today. The audience yesterday took the charming performance rather coolly.

Modern works make up the remainder of the program. Dukas' ingenious scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," "Vysehrad," the symphonic poem in which Smetana decribes a dream of the ancient glories of Bohemia, and Enesco's "Rumainian Rhapsody," written around traditional airs of the composer's native land, are picturesque and pleasing examples of the lesser classics. Besides, they could hardly be played better than they were played yesterday.

There will be a soloist at next week's concerts, Miss Ruth Deyo, the pianist, who will play the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor. The purely orchestral pieces will be Debussy's "La Mer" sketches and Haydn's symphony

BOSTON HERALD,
DECEMBER 11.

SYMPHONY GIVES 7TH CONCERT

Attains Full Expression of Beethoven's Message in His "Pastoral."

By PHILIP HALE.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert will be repeated this evening. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"	Beethoven
The Sorcerer's Apprentice	Dukas
Vysehrad	Smetana
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1	Enesco

This program of familiar pieces was well arranged. There was variety; there were contrasts; there was brilliant and poetical orchestral performance; there was no "soloist" to disturb the occasion.

Those accustomed to unimaginative interpretations, who had come to the conclusion that the pastoral symphony is a good deal of a bore and nodded by the side of the brook until aroused by the merry peasants with their heavy feet in the dance and by the village musicians, should have been in Symphony Hall yesterday. We have never heard the first movement played with such clarity, such June-like freshness, with coloring that brought to mind the sky with clouds like cotton bales, the grass that is "the handkerchief of the Lord," and the dreams and visions of a summer day. Here was the full expression of Beethoven's own indication: "Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country." The following Andante, often unbearable because the conductor chooses a sluggish pace for the sake of "great expression," was for once not too long. There was uncommon vitality in the Scherzo. The Thunder storm was admirably managed and the shepherd's song of thanksgiving did not sound as though it were written for chorus and cabinet organ.

Some think that "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" has sadly aged. True, it is nearly twenty years old, and a mass of music composed within this period of time and once thought important, if not epoch-making, has been buried, and the efforts of excavators and resurrectionists have been in vain; no one wishes the corpses. To us this Scherzo is still fresh and brilliant, but as absolute, not program music. We can find little portrayal of the incidents in Goethe's poem, nor unless we were informed beforehand would we, listening to the music, think for a moment of Goethe's ballad or Lucian's prose. Over a hundred years ago one Boye wrote a little book entitled "Musical Expression Put in the Class of Chimeras." He maintained, for example, that if the words "I have found my Eurydice" were sung to Gluck's famous air, the expression of the music would be the same; and he also argued that the music characterized as most expressive is the most wearisome. This book was answered by one Le Febvre. We have not read his reply. Replies are generally slow in arriving and are often unconvincing, especially to those who do not wish to be convinced. There is sense in Boye's book, which is worth a translation and the publication, if only as a curiosity.

Will any one who has heard this Scherzo several times put his hand on his heart and swear that the introductory measures transport him to the Sorecerer's room, that he afterwards sees and hears the magic broom at work, the flood of water pouring in?

The intrinsic merits of this music are not affected by the absence or the presence of the title. The Pastoral symphony would suggest to the sensitive pleasant thoughts, probably of country scenes and life, if it were not dubbed "pastoral," nor is there need of a printed program to persuade the hearer that certain pages portray a thunder storm. But to show a magic broom set in motion with dire results by a sorcerer's apprentice is another matter. Fortunately we can enjoy the music of Dukas as a scherzo without invoking the magic name and the Olympian presence of Goethe.

Smetana's symphonic poem inspired by the thought of past glory and present downfall is still bardic in its simplicity, noble in its mournfulness.

Solomon! where is thy throne? It is gone
in the wind.
Babylon! where is thy night? It is gone
in the wind.
Like the swift shadows of Noon, like the dreams of the Blind
Vanish the glories and pomps of the earth
in the wind.

This verse of Rueckert's might stand below the printed preface in Smetana's score.

The Philharmonic Society of New York will play next week the whole of Smetana's cycle, "My Country," of which "Vysehrad" is the first tone poem. "Tabor" and "Blanik" have not been performed in Boston, and "Sarka" has not been heard for 20 years. The performance of the whole cycle at one concert may be too much of a good thing, except to hearers of Bohemian birth or ancestry.

Enesco's Rhapsody has been played here at least three times. Are the other two rhapsodies equally interesting by their effects of rhythm and color?

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Debussy, La Mer; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Piano No. 1 (Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist); Haydn, Symphony in E-flat (B. and H. No. 1).

At the concerts of Dec. 24 and 25, Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," and an organ concerto by Rheinberger will be performed.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY
DECEMBER 11.

SYMPHONY CONCERT CONSERVATIVE

BEETHOVEN'S "PASTORAL" BEGINNING OF SCHOOL

Orchestral Humor Followed by Majesty of Smetana and Enesco's Turbulence

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME

Beethoven—"Pastoral" Symphony.
Dukas—"The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Smetana—"Vysehrad." Symphonic Poem.
Enesco—Rumanian Rhapsody.

Not so long ago a battle was going on between programme music and absolute music. The victory has been won, in the present generation, by programme music, possibly because of the influence of Richard Strauss and Debussy. Programme music is instrumental music, which, by means of its title, or by printed notes upon the programme, gives a definite picture. Absolute music is that which deals with emotions and attempts nothing definitely pictorial. Richard Strauss once told the son of the present reviewer that he believed that every composer had a definite picture in his mind when he was creating a work, in which case we would like to know what pictures were in Bach's cranium when he wrote his fugues or his two-part inventions!

In spite of the fact that programme-music existed in ancient Greece, we may consider Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the beginning of the school, the first large classical instrumental form which tried for pictorial effects, although Berlioz soon after evolved the broad modern vein of instrumental picture-painting. It was interesting therefore to hear the beginning of a school that has captured the entire modern musical camp. It was interesting also to note that Beethoven distrusted the new idea, as he proved by labelling his first movement—"More a picture of emotions than picture-painting." But he seems to have gotten entirely over his doubts by the time he arrived at the second movement, for from the Andante to the end of the symphony the picture-painting is as definite as he can make it, even the poultry by the brook ("Quail, Cuckoo and Nightingale") being definitely labelled, while the village dance, with a country band playing, the subsequent row among the dancers, the thunder-storm and the Thanksgiving after it, are realistic touches of the most vivid character.

One or two points may be especially noted. Beethoven gives the jolliest practical joke, in the third movement, that was ever practiced in symphony, when he portrays a poor musician whose instrument has only three notes left on it, and who plays those three notes (F, C, F,) whenever he can squeeze them into the harmony of the village band. We always feel that it would be a bit of added humor to emphasize these notes more than is done, since the player would undoubtedly make the most of them.

Boston can generally furnish any possible kind of weather, but the thunder storm of this work, with the lightning coming after the thunder is beyond any variety we have experienced here. It was interesting also to hear the shepherd piping on a clarinette after the storm. Wagner, Schumann, Rossini, Berloiz, in short, every 19th century composer, causes the shepherd to use an English horn, but Beethoven never used this instrument in an orchestral score.

The work was played with loving care, and was received with much enthusiasm. It deserved the appreciation, but for all that we find the brook (second movement) too extended for good effect. It possibly tried to emulate Tennyson's stream:

> "Men may come and men may go,
> But I go on forever," and the symphony as a whole has faded more than any of its eight sisters. It was soon evident that this concert was to be devoted to tonal pictures, for Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" was another very definite tional sketch, and, if Beethoven made his joke with one bassoon, Dukas made his fun with three. Therefore the bassoons had their innings in this concert. The work has been heard so often in Boston that the story is familiar even to non-musicians, but we can say that every detail, the coming to life of the broomstick, its going and coming with water, the sawing of it in two, the two broomsticks then becoming water-carriers, the return of the magician and the restoring of matters to their more normal state, all this was portrayed with great clearness and with delicate humor. The work has never received so graphic a performance in Boston.

After all this orchestral humor, Dr. Muck inverted the old French saying into—"From the ridiculous to the sublime is but a step,"—and gave the majesty of Smetana. We firmly believe that Smetana will wear better than his pupil, Dvorak, who for so long a time outshone him. He had not the routine knowledge of Dvorak, nor his contrapuntal skill, but he was well enough equipped in this and in orchestration, and he was terribly in earnest, and that counts for ever so much in music.

Bohemian Art was crushed altogether in the 30-years' war, and even in the time of Maria Theresa there was an effort made to stamp out the language. It failed, and such poets as Puchmayer, Wocel, Czelakowsky, and others have lifted the poetry from the dust in which it was laid while Smetana and Dvorak did something of the same kind for music. Some plants become more fragrant when bruised, and it is so with the Bohemian music. It has a mediaeval flavor that is glorious.

Nevertheless it was rather too sudden a transition to go from Dukas' comical bassoons to Smetana's bardic harp, with which "Vysehrad" began. Mr. Holy and Mr. Cella, however, played the beautiful preluding excellently, and we were soon in the atmosphere of the Middle Ages, as the composition worked up from its solo beginning to military grandeur with stirring trumpet calls and brass effects. The sadness of the ending of the work is very impressive. There is something of Ossianic loneliness in the brooding memory of past glories at which Smetana hints in his finale and it was played with emotional power. This was the loftiest point of yesterday's programme.

We were not quite as much in sympathy with Rumania, which came next in our musical Balkan journey. There was little of Smetana's dignity in Enesco's turbulence. After the first peasant melody had presented its simplicity, some of the themes were as wild as American college songs, and as informal. There were frenzied dances, which suggested a combination of Cancan and Carmagnole, and plenty of piccolo spice was poured into the dish, as one pours paprika into a goulash. If ever the piccolo player earned his salary, he did it in this piece. Each dance was wilder than the other (where were the Rumanian police?) and as each seemed to be a climax of wildness in itself, the auditor was deceived into imagining that the end had come,—about 10 different times. Finally the end did actually come, (everything has an end, except a sausage, which has two) and, stunned and dazed, we wandered into the outer atmosphere. We hope that Rumania will remain neutral, for if she does this kind of thing when she is at peace, what would she evolve when she is at war?

TRANSCRIPT. DECEMBER 9, 1915

As Dr. Muck Sees Music in America

Past and Present, Possibilities, Prospects and Poisons—All in a Characteristic Interview That Is Penetrating, Unflattering, Candid and Constructive

From month to month, this autumn, the magazine, The Craftsman, has been publishing a notable series of interviews with eminent conductors of orchestras in the United States. It began in October with Mr. Stransky of the Philharmonic Society of New York; it continued in November with Mr. Bodanzky of the Metropolitan Opera House, and in the December number, published today, it passes to Dr. Muck in the longest, the most careful and the most characteristic interview that he has ever given either in Berlin or in Boston. The Craftsman proposed to the several conductors that they discuss the present conditions and prospects of serious music in the United States, and Dr. Muck, keenly interested, spoke with penetration and candor, as a man of the world and a man of ideals. By the generous permission of the proprietors and the editor of The Craftsman, the article follows hereunder.

A MUSIC loving people! Why not—living in such a marvellous country, a country that should be the source of splendid inspiration for every art. It is different in Europe; the inspiration is not needed. Music continues and thrives in the Old World because it is a part of the existence of the people. They are all brought up with music in their homes and in their schools. They know it as they know their A B Cs; they do not have to seek new and tremendous inspiration—influences powerful enough to cut a channel through prevailing interests.

"But in America you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, when there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions; when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests; when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballad or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy and settled in America with their own specialized ways, with their own social attitude and religion all ready-made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry has time to take deep roots into the hearts of the people.

Emotion and Idea

"When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later, and civilization is full-fledged, it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. The early music wells up out of great love, great joy, great splendid response to nature. In the later life of a nation, art comes from an appreciation of what it adds to life, from a sense of its decorative importance. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea. Wagner, strangely enough, combined both the traditional and the modern point of view in his music. He had the great idea of a new religion for the world, a religion that could no longer be held in the grasp of the gods, that must be reborn through the splendor and tragedy of human love and sacrifice. In the music of Strauss you feel the pounding of a great idea, you feel suddenly that he is breaking down conventional barriers that have held people away from the intoxication and joy of music. Beethoven had the great idea of bringing close to the people all pastoral beauty from the beginning of days. Whatever has been joyous in pastoral lives, whatever has been sad or thrilling or tender or peaceful Beethoven has reproduced for the world's joy and strength.

Haste the Enemy

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of its

(Photograph by Schwalb of Charlottenburg.)

Dr. Muck Off Duty

From a Picture Not Hitherto Reproduced

"Already your painters have found the West and have brought back some of its beauty on canvas, but as yet, I have heard no poetry that repeats to me the story of sunrise in the West, no music that gives me of the yellow lights and the purple shadows that stream down that deep canyon, varied from day to day, and forever lovely.

"You ask me what is the difficulty. It is not that you do not love music in America—few individuals in the world are more liberal than the American man or woman who seeks to bring music to this country, but as yet you have not stopped long enough to cherish the birth of great art here. It seems to me that you are constantly putting it off to the future. You say, 'some day we will have art in America, we can have it whenever we want it. So far we have had everything that we wanted. We are busy just now, we have not yet all the money we want.' And truly you have the great genius for making money; but you appear too busy to use it; at least, to use it in a way that seems most valuable to me. You do buy many, many things that enable you to get about quickly, not only things that will make your homes beautiful but things that will enable you to get away from your homes—swifter steamers, swifter railroads, swifter motor cars. It is a nation hurrying from one generation to another, one century to another, seeking always means of haste, pressing past with an ideal of haste rather than some definite goal.

"Isn't it just as good to stop today as tomorrow, to spend beautiful leisure in your beautiful homes, into which to bring beautiful art? This is the lovely present I wish for America. I want leisure now for your music, your painters want it for art, your young geniuses want it for poetry. Stop now and make this the greatest century America has ever known for the birth of great national art.

Youth and Music

"How would I suggest doing this? I have already said that you should seek your inspiration in your own land, in the splendor and beauty of it, teach your children how beautiful your own land is, and in connection with that, in every school in America teach your children all the beautiful music that the greatest musicians of the world have produced. Have every school one rich chorus, have children sing out all the joy and love of their young hearts; they want to do it, they do not want to bend over their desks every minute, they do not want to study every minute, they want to express something of what youth is, what they feel life to be. You will have no difficulty in establishing choruses in your public schools. All youth has music in its heart, let it pour out in tremendous volumes in every school in America. Beyond this, if you have the time, and I should say make the time, let every school have its orchestra. I do not believe there is a school in America that would not furnish you talent for an orchestra. Let the choruses work with the orchestra, and let children feel that it is a great honor to play in the orchestra. Oh, you cannot think what this would do for the happiness of youth, for the production of art in this country, what channels it would furnish for genius to express itself in the coming generation. And suddenly you will find that you are this musical nation that you have talked about, and no one will ever ask again how it can be done and why Americans are not creating music. You will find barriers that have stood in front of genius drop away, you will find that music will reach the homes.

Poisoning the Source

"It is hopeless to attempt to do anything for middle age. No nation has ever developed art through its grown-up people. It has developed much enjoyment, much culture, it has shown appreciation of art, as America has done, for there is an ever increasing love of good music in this country, an ever growing audience for opera and for symphony concerts, but that is not what you are asking about in America. You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have the great idea for music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy—the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime, is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start I should say, give your young people the best music the world has ever known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

The Curse of Vulgar Music

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical development and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America today for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving, from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation. You ask me frankly and I tell you frankly.

"One instance came to my notice in regard to the deadly influence of the ragtime music which I will cite to show the invidious effect it may have even on people whose first impulse is toward the right thing. I dined one evening with a family devoted to the interests of the Symphony Concerts. They had been subscribers for years. After the dinner I was very tired and strolled in the library alone to rest for a moment. To my astonishment I saw a music machine in one corner of the room. I said possibly they may have some records of good music and singers, and so glanced over the records. Then, to my horror I discovered that they were of the most deadly, vulgar ragtime music; not only was the music of the worst character, but in some instances there were records of vulgar café-chantant songs, a collection of all the things that it seemed to me the real music lover would be opposed to. It was a terrible shock to me. I felt as though I had lost friends. I wondered how much I was to blame for it. How was it possible that I could have put into my work in the Symphony Concerts my heart and soul and most earnest desire for the best results from such work and then find that among those I had counted upon as true friends and music lovers, there was this deadly interest in the vulgar fad of the day? I realized how much there was to work against, how much to overcome before this country, with all the opportunity in the world, would really become a musical nation.

Only the Best

"Not only should you seek the best music for your children, but give them the best teachers, always the best teachers. If you want your children to love poetry, you do not give them some poor little verse, some bit of popular doggerel, you turn back to Shakspeare, to Goethe, to Racine; you give them the wealth of the world. If you wish them to recite poetry you seek some great master of the dramatic arts, so that all the fulness of the meaning of the creator reaches them. You must do the same in music. You must have them taught by the man who knows and loves music, who can win a response from them, who can direct them and encourage them.

"The best music in the world is of no avail for children with a poor teacher. Everything must be of the best if we wish the best results. Seek good music in simple form and music lovers as instructors. What would we think of a gardener who planted seeds in poor soil because the poor soil was economical or easy to get or because people were accustomed to using poor soil? The good gardener seeks the best soil for just the kind of growth he desires, and then he knows just how to plant the seed and how to care for the little plant and how to cultivate his garden for the best and beautiful results. Surely it is necessary to cultivate music as wisely as a garden. And so I say once more that you cannot cultivate a love for Beethoven via ragtime."

The Question of Endowment

Dr. Muck spoke very wisely and logically on the question of the wisdom of endowing music in America. "Undoubtedly," he said, "it would be better for a democratic people to produce and to support their own music. It would be more in line with their ideals. But what will you? As yet the people do not seem willing to make the effort to suport opera and symphony concerts. The question resolves itself into this: If you do not endow these institutions you cannot have this music. If you wish the music at this present stage of your civilization, it must be endowed. So far as I am aware no musical institution of any description is supported by State or Government in America. The only endowments that are made are individual and those in some instances are lavish to a degree. In New York your opera is supported by subscription and frequently by additional endowment as well—always personal. This is true of every opera in America. It is also true, so far as I am able to state, of symphony orchestra. I know it is true of New York, of Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Seattle and so on indefinitely.

"And right here it is important to note that the interest in symphony orchestra is spreading. It is no small matter for America to realize that there is a successful symphony orchestra in Seattle as well as in San Francisco, Chicago and so on toward the East. But these orchestras are not supported by the voluntary contributions of the mass of people. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically the gift to the people

As Dr. Muck Sees Music in America

Past and Present, Possibilities, Prospects and Poisons—All in a Characteristic Interview That Is Penetrating, Unflattering, Candid and Constructive

From month to month, this autumn, the magazine, The Craftsman, has been publishing a notable series of interviews with eminent conductors of orchestras in the United States. It began in October with Mr. Stransky of the Philharmonic Society of New York; it continued in November with Mr. Bodanzky of the Metropolitan Opera House, and in the December number, published today, it passes to Dr. Muck in the longest, the most careful and the most characteristic interview that he has ever given either in Berlin or in Boston. The Craftsman proposed to the several conductors that they discuss the present conditions and prospects of serious music in the United States, and Dr. Muck, keenly interested, spoke with penetration and candor, as a man of the world and a man of ideals. By the generous permission of the proprietors and the editor of The Craftsman, the article follows hereunder.

A MUSIC loving people! Why not—living in such a marvellous country, a country that should be the source of splendid inspiration for every art. It is different in Europe; the inspiration is not needed. Music continues and thrives in the Old World because it is a part of the existence of the people. They are all brought up with music in their homes and in their schools. They know it as they know their A B C's; they do not have to seek new and tremendous inspiration—influences powerful enough to cut a channel through [illegible] interests.

"But in America you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country [illegible] as a youth, not a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, when there are no conventional barriers to the emotions; when they crave some rich expression for their interests; when all of life is action, spontaneity, and when people are not able to stay from nature's storehouse of [illegible], when they are looking up to the [illegible], out to the woods hourly, when [illegible] them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must find expression in ballad or chant, in the [illegible] of the warrior or the song of the [illegible].

"America [illegible] no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Its early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy and settled in America with their own specialized ways, with their own social attitudes and religion all ready-made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry has time to take deep roots into the hearts of the people.

Emotion and Idea

"When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later, and civilization is full-fledged, it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. The early music wells up out of great love, great joy, great splendid response to nature. In the later life of a nation, art comes from an appreciation of what it adds to life, from a sense of its decorative importance. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea. Wagner, strangely enough, combined both the traditional and the modern point of view in his music. He had the great idea of a new religion for the world, a religion that could no longer be held in the grasp of the gods, that must be reborn through the splendor and tragedy of human love and sacrifice. In the music of Strauss you feel the pounding of a great idea, you feel suddenly that he is breaking down conventional barriers that have held people away from the intoxication and joy of music. Beethoven had the great idea of bringing close to the people all pastoral beauty from the beginning of days. Whatever has been joyous in pastoral lives, whatever has been sad or thrilling or tender or peaceful Beethoven has reproduced for the world's joy and strength.

Haste the Enemy

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of its soul.

Dr. Karl Muck

[illegible]

Dr. Muck Off Duty

From a Picture Not Hitherto Reproduced

"Already your painters have found the West and have brought back some of its beauty on canvas, but as yet, I have heard no poetry that repeats to me the story of sunrise in the West, no music that gives me of the yellow lights and the purple shadows that stream down that deep canyon, varied from day to day, and forever lovely.

"You ask me what is the difficulty. It is not that you do not love music in America; few individuals in the world are more liberal than the American man or woman who seeks to bring music to this country, but as yet you have not stopped long enough to cherish the birth of great art here. It seems to me that you are constantly putting it off to the future. You say, 'some day we will have art in America, we can have it whenever we want it. So far we have had everything that we wanted. We are busy just now, we have not yet all the money we want.' And truly you have the great genius for making money; but you appear too busy to use it; at least, to use it in a way that seems most valuable to me. You do buy many, many things that enable you to get about quickly, not only things that will make your homes beautiful but things that will enable you to get away from your homes—swifter steamers, swifter railroads, swifter motor cars. It is a nation hurrying from one generation to another, one century to another, seeking always means of haste, pressing past with an ideal of haste rather than some definite goal.

"Isn't it just as good to stop today as tomorrow, to spend beautiful leisure in your beautiful homes, into which to bring beautiful art? This is the lovely present I wish for America. I want leisure now for your music, your painters want it for art, your young geniuses want it for poetry. Stop now and make this the greatest century America has ever known for the birth of great national art.

Youth and Music

"How would I suggest doing this? I have already said that you should seek your inspiration in your own land, in the splendor and beauty of it, teach your children how beautiful your own land is, and in connection with that, in every school in America teach your children all the beautiful music that the greatest musicians of the world have produced. Have every school one rich chorus, have children sing out all the joy and love of their young hearts; they want to do it, they do not want to bend over their desks every minute, they do not want to study every minute, they want to express something of what youth is, what they feel life to be. You will have no difficulty in establishing choruses in your public schools. All youth has music in its heart, let it pour out in tremendous volume in every school in America [illegible] if you [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] make the [illegible] let every school have [illegible] orchestra. I do not believe there is [illegible] in America that would not [illegible] for [illegible] orchestra. Let the [illegible] work with the orchestra, and let [illegible] feel that it is a great honor to play in the orchestra. Oh, you cannot think what this would do for the happiness of youth, for the production of art in this country, what channels it would furnish for genius to express itself in the coming generation. And suddenly you will find that you [illegible] that you have talked about and no one will ever ask again [illegible] be done and why Americans are not [illegible] music. You will find barriers that stood in front of genius drop [illegible] will find that music will reach the [illegible]

Poisoning the Source

"It is hopeless to attempt to do [illegible] for middle age. No nation has ever developed art through its grown-up people. It has developed much enjoyment, it has shown appreciation of culture, it has done, as America has done, for there is an [illegible] increasing love of good music in this country, an ever growing audience for opera and for symphony concerts, but that is not what you are asking about in America. You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have the great idea for music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy—the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime, is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start I should say, give your young people the best music the world has ever known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

The Curse of Vulgar Music

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical development and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America today for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation. You ask me frankly and I tell you frankly.

"One instance came to my notice in regard to the deadly influence of the ragtime music which will serve to show the insidious effect it may have even on people whose first impulse is toward the right thing. I dined one evening with a family devoted to the interests of the Symphony concerts. They had been subscribers for years. After the dinner I was very tired and strolled in the library alone to rest for a moment. To my astonishment I saw a music machine in one corner of the room. I said possibly they may have some records of good music and singers, and so glanced over the records. Then, to my horror I discovered that they were of the most [illegible] ragtime music. Not only was the music of the worst character, but in some cases [illegible] records of vulgar [illegible] songs, a collection of all [illegible] it was a [illegible] though I [illegible] how much [illegible] was it possible [illegible] work in the [illegible] and soul and [illegible] results from [illegible] these [illegible] friends and [illegible] interest [illegible] realized [illegible] against, how [illegible] with [illegible] would [illegible]

Only the Best

[illegible] the best [illegible] give them the [illegible] teachers. [illegible] poetry, [illegible] little [illegible] doggerel, you [illegible] Goethe, to [illegible] wealth of the [illegible] poetry [illegible] dramatic [illegible] mean- [illegible] them. You [illegible] You must [illegible] who knows [illegible] response [illegible] and encourage [illegible]

"The best music in the world is of no avail for children with a poor teacher. [illegible] if we wish [illegible] tors. [illegible] who [illegible] the [illegible] to get or [illegible] to using [illegible] the best [illegible] sires, [illegible] the [illegible] plant [illegible] it is [illegible] as a [illegible] that you [illegible] Beethoven via [illegible]

The Question of Endowment

Dr. Muck spoke very wisely and logically on the question of the wisdom of endowing music in America. "Undoubtedly," he said, "it would be better for a democratic people to produce and to support their own music. It would be more in line with their ideals. But what will you? As yet the people do not seem willing to make the effort to suport opera and symphony concerts. The question resolves itself into this: If you do not endow these institutions you cannot have this music. If you wish the music at this present stage of your civilization, it must be endowed. So far as I am aware no musical institution of any description is supported by State or Government in America. The only endowments that are made are individual and those in some instances are lavish to a degree. In New York your opera is supported by subscription and frequently by additional endowment as well always personal. This is true of every opera in America. It is also true, so far as I am able to state, of symphony orchestra. I know it is true of New York, of Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Seattle and so on indefinitely.

"And right here it is important to note that the interest in symphony orchestra is spreading. It is no small matter for America to realize that there is a successful symphony orchestra in Seattle as well as in San Francisco, Chicago and so on toward the East. But these orchestras are not supported by the voluntary contributions of the mass of people. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically the gift to the people of

Mr. Higginson. It is Mr. Higginson who has made it possible for the Boston Symphony to work without joining the music union, so that it is an absolutely free institution. And in this free country I find that the trade unions do not always leave the people quite free either in the arts or crafts. I think that if you are not careful, through them you will greatly mar musical opportunity and you will possibly kill the development of craft work.

"A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him how to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; but he could make a little more money as a carpenter and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the man who is the greatest musician who has the best salary.

"But to return to the endowment of music. You will see that at present it is necessary for certain kinds of musical development. After you have put music in all your schools, in the biggest, most impersonal way, I firmly believe that you will be cultivating a generation of people who will be eager to support symphony concerts and opera, who will be writing music for both.

"The question of endowment does not seem to trouble any one in Germany; it is universal. In every place of forty or fifty thousand inhabitants there is a symphony orchestra supported by the town. In Berlin the emperor gives three million marks a year out of his private income for the advancement of music; in Vienna, music is supported by the Government. There seems to be no question in the world but what the people who have the greatest opportunity for enjoying music should really be the supporters. The idea of endowing music in Germany came about through Frederick the Great, some two hundred years ago. He was a music lover. He and the dukes of his court decided that they would pay for it themselves and this sentiment has continued in Germany ever since, although if it were not done there is, in my mind, no question in the world but what the people by voluntary contributions would hold music in their midst.

Our Restless Land

"You have asked me just what quality in your civilization I find most detrimental to the development and progress of the arts. It seems to me that the most serious handicap to art that I have been able to discover in America, and of course there are serious handicaps in every nation to its best growth, is the fact that politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern. I believe that politics should be absolutely separated from business activities. Politics is the machinery of running a nation. A man should not be in politics to make money, to make his living, but to work for the welfare of the nation. There should be no opportunity whatever for him to have to face financial questions. He should be supported by the Government. But in America I find in every State people in politics for their own interest, not to build up a finer, stronger, purer nation, not to insure the development of art loving people, not to add to the beauty of the country, the delight of it, but for their own aggrandizement. Naturally this brings about a State restless, uncertain and separated from the betterment of the country. Also it places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy, and one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth.

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned, to be independent when they are young, and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are losing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more houses, more clothes, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

From HERALD
Address: New York City

Date DEC 3 - 1915

Fritz Kreisler Charms Anew with Symphony

1884

Violinist Makes His First Appearance Here This Season as Soloist with Dr. Muck's Musicians.

In this day and country, when everything must move swiftly to interest the public, there seems to be little chance of Bruckner's symphony in E major, No. 7, which was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck last evening at Carnegie Hall, ever becoming extremely popular.

Bruckner undoubtedly has ideas, but to the average American concertgoer he has too few to keep one symphony going for an hour and a quarter. And from the nature of the applause which followed the presentation it was evident that most of the audience felt somewhat like the Italian pianist Busoni, who when he was asked to go to the theatre by his concert manager last winter declined, saying that he had only about twenty-five more years to live and that life was too short to indulge in such things.

There is some fine music in Bruckner's score. The second movement, over which there has been much controversy as to whether it was written as a funeral march in memory of the death of Richard Wagner or not, is thrilling in parts and throughout is very good to hear. Before the end of the four movements interest lagged. The applause which came after its close was weak but prolonged, showing that if Bruckner's followers were few, at least they were enthusiastic.

The soloist last night was Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who has not been heard here before this season. He was in fine form, though he had some trouble keeping his violin in tune. There probably is no violinist who plays the Beethoven concerto which was his selection, so well. His playing in the cadenza in the first movement was wonderful. The broad melodies he played with fire and passion, and the quiet passages he presented with beautiful tone and with such finish that only admiration could result. Showers of applause came at the end of the first movement and again at the close of the work.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.

Date NOV 28 1915

Die „Boſtoner" in Brooklyn.

Estab

Das zweite in der diesjährigen Serie von Konzerten gibt das Boſtoner Symphonie=Orcheſter am Freitag, den 3. Dezember, im Opernſaale der Academy of Muſic unter den Auſpizien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften, und zwar hat der Dirigent Dr. Carl Mack ein äußerſt intereſſantes und gediegenes Programm aufgeſtellt. Als Soliſt

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City

Date DEC 3 - 1915

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA BRINGS LENTEN GLOOM

Kreisler and a Brilliant Performance of Beethoven.

Estab 34

Dr. Muck chose a particularly unhappy time to reward the admiration which music lovers in New York feel for him and the Boston Orchestra by compelling them to do more than an hour's penance at the second of the evening concerts at Carnegie Hall last night. Lent is still several months distant, and if he thought that his admirers deserved punishment for the good of their souls, either morally or æsthetically, he might have held off Bruckner's symphony in E major till they were in a spirit when they felt that they needed or deserved chastening. As it was, they had to take it last night, and go through the perfunctory motions of approval after an hour half of which at least was unrelieved boredom, in order at the last to enjoy Beethoven's violin concerto and Mr. Kreisler's performance of it. Many years ago when the symphony was first performed at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Theodore Thomas the audience was frank enough to give expression to its opinion of the symphony by walking out of the Metropolitan Opera House in large detachments after the second and third movements and going gloomily home after the last. That was not to be expected last night, because Mr. Kreisler was on hand to make amends for the affliction. He did—so far as he could—by a brilliant performance of the Beethoven concerto, a much more reposeful and musicianly one than he put to his credit the last time he played it here, and one that was thoroughly in the spirit of the composition, which sounded peculiarly stimulating after

---

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.

Date

Boſtoner Symphonie = Orcheſter.

E 1884

Dr. Muck hat geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall anläßlich ſeiner ragenden Wiedergabe von Bruckners Siebenter Symphonie eine große Genugtuung erlebt, die ich ihm wohl nachfühlen kann und die ich ihm von Herzen gönne, zudem es auch mir ſo zu Mute iſt, als ob ein Stückchen davon auf meinen Anteil gekommen wäre. Als er dieſes geniale Werk vor ſieben Jahren hier zum erſten Mal an der Spitze ſeiner Meiſterſchar vorführte, da wollte ſich der Erfolg ſo wenig einſtellen, daß ich meine diesbezügliche Beſprechung mit den Worten beginnen ließ, das Publikum ſei am Abend vorher „vor Bruckners Siebenter durchgefallen." Nun denn: das Publikum hat die Nachprüfung geſtern Abend mit Glanz beſtanden, denn das hehre Werk erntete nach allen Sätzen ſehr freundlichen Beifall, der ſich nach den mittleren Sätzen, namentlich nach dem effektvollen Scherzo, ſehr lebhaft geſtaltete und ſich zum Schluß zu einer Ovation für den Dirigenten und ſeine Mannen ſteigerte.

Erſt wenn man ſolche Gedenktage zu feierr hat, ſieht man ſo recht klar, mit welchen Siebenmeilenſtiefeln das muſikaliſche Verſtändnis ſich hier Bahn bricht. Sieben Jahre ſind hier eine lange Spanne Zeit. Was hat unſer Publikum in dieſem Zeitraum alles über ſich ergehen laſſen müſſen, ſeitdem es dieſen Bruckner mit ſeiner unſtreitigen Formloſigkeit, aber ſeinen genialen Eigenſchaften gar ſo unerträglich und ſchwer verſtändlich befunden hatte! Die Kinderkrankheiten der muſikaliſchen Moderne mußte es überſtehen, Maſern, Scharlach, Keuchhuſten, Anämie und noch Aergeres, und der Leſer möge es mit ſich ſelbſt ausmachen, mit welchen dieſer Kinderſchrecken er die dem Publikum vorgeſetzten Modernen, Modernſten und Futuriſten, die Debuſſy, Reger, Schönberg, Ravel, Strawinſki, Scriabine und all' die anderen vergleichen ſoll. Geſtern klang dieſer Bruckner zwar langatmig und gelegentlich maſſig, aber ſo durchaus leichtverſtändlich und logiſch, ſo klar und allgemeinverſtändlich! Man hatte ſich auf ein Stück harte Arbeit gefaßt gemacht und fand ſo gar nichts Rieſenſchweres. Wann wird die Zeit kommen, da man dieſe Bruckner'ſchen Symphonien mit ihren imponierenden Lichtpunkten und den nichts Weſentliches davon abſchwächenden Flecken als das erkennen wird, was ſie wirklich ſind: als die geniolen Würfe eines gottbegnadeten Muſikers, der zu Lebzeiten ſeinen Leidensweg ſchreiten mußte, um lange nach ſeinem Tod die verdiente begeiſterte Anerkennung noch nicht gefunden zu haben!

Es iſt ſo ſelten, daß wir hier Gelegenheit haben, uns mit dieſem großen Meiſter und einem ſeiner Werke zu beſchäftigen, daß es ein Unrecht wäre, den Gegenſtand mit wenigen in Eile hingeworfenen Worten abzutun. Es wird ſich im Sonntagsblatt Gelegenheit finden, auf dieſes Kapitel näher einzugehen.

Dr. Muck hat ſich geſtern wieder einmal als einer der ganz Großen aufgedrängt. Mit einer bei ihm nicht allzu häufig zu beobachtenden Begeiſterung, die ſich auch äußerlich in ſeiner ungewohnt animierten Stabführung ausprägte, mit ſchlichter Einfachheit und Verzicht auf jede Poſe, dirigierte er das Werk wie ein von Frau Muſica geſandter Streiter für das Große und Bewunderung Heiſchende! So wuchs das Werk zu immer ſtolzeren Gipfeln hinan. Das Orcheſter ſang und webte in einer virtuoſen Durchgeiſtigung und prangte in einem reichen Kolorit, daß man nicht genug Worte der Bewunderung finden kann.

Die zweite Abteilung bildete das von Fritz Kreisler mit adeliger Größe und zauberhafter Wirkung geſpielte Beethoven'ſche Violinkonzert. Der Künſtler wurde, wie man mir mitteilt, empfangen und gefeiert wie ein alter Liebling.

H.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City

Date DEC 3 1915

Esta 84

At Carnegie Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave a clearly defined performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Over this long and diffuse work, with its complaining music, the audience was polite. Evidently the applause was for the performers' excellent work rather than a tribute to the symphony itself.

For the second part of the programme there can only be words of the highest praise. Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven concerto as it deserves to be played, and Dr. Muck and his players were in accord with him. It was a noble performance of a work so great that it wipes away all mere nationality, for it is as universal as Homer and Shakespeare.

Mr. Higginson. It is Mr. Higginson who has made it possible for the Boston Symphony to work without joining the music union, so that it is an absolutely free institution. And in this free country I find that the trade unions do not always leave the people quite free either in the arts or crafts. I think that if you are not careful, through them you will greatly mar musical opportunity and you will possibly kill the development of craft work.

"A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him how to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; but he could make a little more money as a carpenter and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the man who is the greatest musician who has the best salary.

"But to return to the endowment of music. You will see that at present it is necessary for certain kinds of musical development. After you have put music in all your schools, in the biggest, most impersonal way, I firmly believe that you will be cultivating a generation of people who will be eager to support symphony concerts and opera, who will be writing music for both.

"The question of endowment does not seem to trouble any one in Germany; it is universal. In every place of forty or fifty thousand inhabitants there is a symphony orchestra supported by the town. In Berlin the emperor gives three million marks a year out of his private income for the advancement of music; in Vienna, music is supported by the Government. There seems to be no question in the world but what the people who have the greatest opportunity for enjoying music should really be the supporters. The idea of endowing music in Germany came about through Frederick the Great, some two hundred years ago. He was a music lover. He and the dukes of his court decided that they would pay for it themselves and this sentiment has continued in Germany ever since, although if it were not done there is, in my mind, no question in the world but what the people by voluntary contributions would hold music in their midst.

Our Restless Land

"You have asked me just what quality in your civilization I find most detrimental to the development and progress of the arts. It seems to me that the most serious handicap to art that I have been able to discover in America, and of course there are serious handicaps in every nation to its best growth, is the fact that politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern. I believe that politics should be absolutely separated from business activities. Politics is the machinery of running a nation. A man should not be in politics to make money, to make his living, but to work for the welfare of the nation. There should be no opportunity whatever for him to have to face financial questions. He should be supported by the Government. But in America I find in every State people in politics for their own interest, not to build up a finer, stronger, purer nation, not to insure the development of art loving people, not to add to the beauty of the country, the delight of it, but for their own aggrandizement. Naturally this brings about a State restless, uncertain and separated from the betterment of the country. Also it places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy, and one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth.

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned, to be independent when they are young, and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are losing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more houses, more clothes, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915

E 1884

Fritz Kreisler Charms Anew with Symphony

Violinist Makes His First Appearance Here This Season as Soloist with Dr. Muck's Musicians.

In this day and country, when everything must move swiftly to interest the public, there seems to be little chance of Bruckner's symphony in E major, No. 7, which was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck last evening at Carnegie Hall, ever becoming extremely popular.

Bruckner undoubtedly has ideas, but to the average American concertgoer he has too few to keep one symphony going for an hour and a quarter. And from the nature of the applause which followed the presentation it was evident that most of the audience felt somewhat like the Italian pianist Busoni, who when he was asked to go to the theatre by his concert manager last winter declined, saying that he had only about twenty-five more years to live and that life was too short to indulge in such things.

There is some fine music in Bruckner's score. The second movement, over which there has been much controversy as to whether it was written as a funeral march in memory of the death of Richard Wagner or not, is thrilling in parts and throughout is very good to hear. Before the end of the four movements interest lagged. The applause which came after its close was weak but prolonged, showing that if Bruckner's followers were few, at least they were enthusiastic.

The soloist last night was Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who has not been heard here before this season. He was in fine form, though he had some trouble keeping his violin in tune. There probably is no violinist who plays the Beethoven concerto which was his selection, so well. His playing in the cadenza in the first movement was wonderful. The broad melodies he played with fire and passion, and the quiet passages he presented with beautiful tone and with such finish that only admiration could result. Showers of applause came at the end of the first movement and again at the close of the work.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 2 8 1915

Estab

Die „Boſtoner" in Brooklyn.

Das zweite in der diesjährigen Serie von Konzerten gibt das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter am Freitag, den 3. Dezember, im Opernſaale der Academy of Music unter den Auſpizien des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften, und zwar hat der Dirigent Dr. Carl Mack ein äußerſt intereſſantes und gediegenes Programm aufgeſtellt. Als Soliſt fungiert der bekannte Violinvirtuoſe Fritz Kreisler, welcher das Brahms'ſche Konzert für Violine und Orcheſter in D-Dur zu Gehör bringt. Das Programm enthält noch Mozart's Symphonie in G-Moll, Rachmaninoff's ſymphoniſches Gedicht „Die Todteninſel" und ein Mendelſohn'ſches Tonwerk.

---

last night. Lent is [illegible] distant, and if he thought that his admirers deserved punishment for the good of their souls, either morally or æsthetically, he might have held off Bruckner's symphony in E major till they were in a spirit when they felt that they needed or deserved chastening. As it was, they had to take it last night, and go through the perfunctory motions of approval after an hour half of which at least was unrelieved boredom, in order at the last to enjoy Beethoven's violin concerto and Mr. Kreisler's performance of it. Many years ago when the symphony was first performed at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Theodore Thomas the audience was frank enough to give expression to its opinion of the symphony by walking out of the Metropolitan Opera House in large detachments after the second and third movements and going gloomily home after the last. That was not to be expected last night, because Mr. Kreisler was on hand to make amends for the affliction. He did—so far as he could—by a brilliant performance of the Beethoven concerto, a much more reposeful and musicianly one than he put to his credit the last time he played it here, and one that was thoroughly in the spirit of the composition, which [illegible] peculiarly stimulating after

---

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

E 1884

Boſtoner Symphonie = Orcheſter.

Dr. Muck hat geſtern Abend in Carnegie Hall anläßlich ſeiner ragenden Wiedergabe von Bruckners Siebenter Symphonie eine große Genugtuung erlebt, die ich ihm wohl nachfühlen kann und die ich ihm von Herzen gönne, zudem es auch mir ſo zu Mute iſt, als ob ein Stückchen davon auf meinen Anteil gekommen wäre. Als er dieſes geniale Werk vor ſieben Jahren hier zum erſten Mal an der Spitze ſeiner Meiſterſchar vorführte, da wollte ſich der Erfolg ſo wenig einſtellen, daß ich meine diesbezügliche Beſprechung mit den Worten beginnen ließ, das Publikum ſei am Abend vorher „vor Bruckners Siebenter durchgefallen." Nun denn: das Publikum hat die Nachprüfung geſtern Abend mit Glanz beſtanden, denn das hehre Werk erntete nach allen Sätzen ſehr freundlichen Beifall, der ſich nach den mittleren Sätzen, namentlich nach dem effektvollen Scherzo, ſehr lebhaft geſtaltete und ſich zum Schluß zu einer Ovation für den Dirigenten und ſeine Mannen ſteigerte.

Erſt wenn man ſolche Gedenktage zu feierr hat, ſieht man ſo recht klar, mit welchen Siebenmeilenſtiefeln das muſikaliſche Verſtändnis ſich hier Bahn bricht. Sieben Jahre ſind hier eine lange Spanne Zeit. Was hat unſer Publikum in dieſem Zeitraum alles über ſich ergehen laſſen müſſen, ſeitdem es dieſen Bruckner mit ſeiner unſtreitigen Formloſigkeit, aber ſeinen genialen Eigenſchaften gar ſo unerträglich und ſchwer verſtändlich befunden hatte! Die Kinderkrankheiten der muſikaliſchen Moderne mußte es überſtehen, Maſern, Scharlach, Keuchhuſten, Anämie und noch Aergeres, und der Leſer möge es mit ſich ſelbſt ausmachen, mit welchen dieſer Kinderſchrecken er die dem Publikum vorgeſetzten Modernen, Modernſten und Futuriſten, die Debuſſy, Reger, Schönberg, Ravel, Strawinſki, Scriabine und all' die anderen vergleichen ſoll. Geſtern klang dieſer Bruckner zwar langatmig und gelegentlich maſſig, aber ſo durchaus leichtverſtändlich und logiſch, ſo klar und allgemeinverſtändlich! Man hatte ſich auf ein Stück harte Arbeit gefaßt gemacht und fand ſo gar nichts Rieſenſchweres. Wann wird die Zeit kommen, da man dieſe Bruckner'ſchen Symphonien mit ihren imponierenden Lichtpunkten und den nichts Weſentliches davon abſchwächenden Flecken als das erkennen wird, was ſie wirklich ſind: als die genialen Würfe eines gottbegnadeten Muſikers, der zu Lebzeiten ſeinen Leidensweg ſchreiten mußte, um lange nach ſeinem Tod die verdiente begeiſterte Anerkennung noch nicht gefunden zu haben!

Es iſt ſo ſelten, daß wir hier Gelegenheit haben, uns mit dieſem großen Meiſter und einem ſeiner Werke zu beſchäftigen, daß es ein Unrecht wäre, den Gegenſtand mit wenigen in Eile hingeworfenen Worten abzutun. Es wird ſich im Sonntagsblatt Gelegenheit finden, auf dieſes Kapitel näher einzugehen.

Dr. Muck hat ſich geſtern wieder einmal als einer der ganz Großen aufgedrängt. Mit einer bei ihm nicht allzu häufig zu beobachtenden Begeiſterung, die ſich auch äußerlich in ſeiner ungewohnt animierten Stabführung ausprägte, mit ſchlichter Einfachheit und Verzicht auf jede Poſe, dirigierte er das Werk wie ein von Frau Muſica geſandter Streiter für das Große und Bewunderung Heiſchende! So wuchs das Werk zu immer ſtolzeren Gipfeln hinan. Das Orcheſter ſang und webte in einer virtuoſen Durchgeiſtigung und prangte in einem reichen Kolorit, daß man nicht genug Worte der Bewunderung finden kann.

Die zweite Abteilung bildete das von Fritz Kreisler mit adeliger Größe und zauberhafter Wirkung geſpielte Beethoven'ſche Violinkonzert. Der Künſtler wurde, wie man mir mitteilt, empfangen und gefeiert wie ein alter Liebling.

H.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 1915

Esta 84

At Carnegie Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave a clearly defined performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Over this long and diffuse work, with its complaining music, the audience was polite. Evidently the applause was for the performers' excellent work rather than a tribute to the symphony itself.

For the second part of the programme there can only be words of the highest praise. Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven concerto as it deserves to be played, and Dr. Muck and his players were in accord with him. It was a noble performance of a work so great that it wipes away all mere nationality, for it is as universal as Homer and Shakespeare.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 1915

k, 1884

BRUCKNER'S MUSIC BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony Orchestra Gives an Hour and Three Minutes to Solemn Task.

BEETHOVEN HEARD TOO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town again. The programme of the concert last night in Carnegie Hall comprised two numbers, Anton Bruckner's E major symphony, No. 7, and Beethoven's violin concerto. The solo violinist was Fritz Kreisler. There was a time when the gentlemen of Boston walked with perfect gait in the airy ways of classic repose under the direction of Petronius Gericke, "arbiter elegantiarum." Long past are those days and many a stormy mountain height and flooded valley have the sweet singers of Huntington avenue travelled since then.

Under the mighty sceptre of the stern and unrelenting Cato Muck of Berlin they now fly to the very summit of Mount Caucasus itself and amid the eternal snows sing of the sorrows of a poor old man whom the unwitting world passed by. His name was Anton Bruckner and he wrote symphonies, which remained on paper. But there are some who are determined that the world shall hear them. We may reject them, but we shall not escape them. Dr. Carl Muck is one of these friends of Bruckner and foes of idle seekers after entertainment. Listening to a Bruckner symphony is not entirely a sport; it is a solemn consecration, in part a mortification of the flesh and at times a burden to the spirit. Yet when one has suffered and been strong for an hour and three minutes he has received from out of the vasty deeps of Bruckner's bottomless ocean mighty monsters well to be remembered.

Mastery of Counterpoint.

There is enough thematic inspiration in the symphony to set up a Schoenberg or a Stravinsky in business for life. The mastery of counterpoint shown in the first movement is inspiring. It is creative counterpoint, the kind which evolves new things out of old, and it flames with the glow of a large intellect.

The second movement is remarkable. Its second theme is one of the most graceful and winning in all music; but Bruckner's fatal incontinence, his long habit of dwelling in solitary infatuation with his thoughts in the seclusion of his study has here led him to wearisome repetitions and overelaborations. In the scherzo too insistent reiteration of the harsh melodic subject first given forth by the trumpet goes on till the hearer's mind becomes dulled by it. The trio gathers unto itself more than its due share of credit by force of contrast.

The last movement finds the composer desperately enmeshed in the tangled strands of his own ideas. Thirty years ago, when Theodore Thomas introduced this symphony, most of us thought that the dire confusion of chords in this last movement was the deadly feature of it; but now we know better. This harmony is ugly only nor'-nor'west and it is at least characteristic. And it is even simple when brought into comparison with the new stock of keys out of which the futurists brew their witches' broth.

Bruckner's apologists made for him the plea which Schoenberg's are making for their idol to-day. He is logical; the ugly harmonies come in the inevitable process of the voice parts. This is juggling with facts. Counterpoint is never tyrannical except when in strictly canonic form. Free counterpoint, which comprises the chief material of the latter day composer, admits of any sort of evasion of sheer ugliness if it threatens to join itself to the pursuit of logic.

Where Extreme Ugliness Lies.

As a matter of fact the extreme ugliness of this symphony is to be found in the scherzo, at a point where contrapuntal development is conspicuous by its absence. It is first in the melodic ideas themselves and next in their instrumental garb. But when the entire work has passed in review the ugly scherzo seems to have its well defined relation to the general scheme, and for this its intrinsic quality is perhaps to be condoned.

No one can listen to the composition without feeling the groping of a great dreamer after a firmer grasp of his phantoms of beauty. Bruckner had a genial mind, but he lacked the mastery of his materials necessary to make him a genius. His music has elements of greatness and it has moments of grandeur. But it is too often flimsy and thin spun, and too often echoes the thoughts of others, especially those of Wagner. The gods of "Rheingold" go into the true Walhalla, and they march upon a rainbow.

The symphony was admirably played. It seems hardly necessary to say this, and only because it was the Boston Orchestra should there be note of two or three technical slips. That of the second horn was the only important one, but the man was human and his lips were not made of leather.

The last time Mr. Kreisler played the Beethoven concerto he did it badly. It was not known at the time that he was suffering from great mental stress. Last evening he began the work tempestuously and for a time it seemed as if he might storm through it recklessly; but he soon found calm and thenceforward delivered the music with repose and beauty of style. His performance of the first movement, the cadenza, was brilliant without disturbing too greatly the Beethoven atmosphere.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 191

Establis

FRITZ KREISLER WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came again to New York last evening on one of its monthly ministrations of grace, and Dr. Karl Muck presented to his Carnegie Hall audience the Seventh Symphony of Anton Bruckner. This was resuscitation, for the name of Bruckner is fading swiftly from all orchestral programmes. The last third of the evening—Bruckner being two-thirds—was given over to the violin concerto of Beethoven, with Fritz Kreisler playing the violin. This was revelation, for Beethoven, in spite of the tubas of Bruckner and even, irrelevantly, the immanence of Strawinsky, needs no resuscitation.

No doubt Dr. Muck believes that Bruckner is as worthy a place on a programme of to-day as Max Reger or Camille Saint-Saens and Vincent d'Indy, or as Edward Elgar, and one agrees that, if such be his belief, he is indubitably right. It may even be that Dr. Muck believes more emphatically than this in Bruckner. In any case, it is the better part of wisdom for the twentieth century to touch again and retest such vitalities of the nineteenth as stamped some impress upon their own day. Vienna thought Bruckner a great man. He no longer seems that, but at least one can understand how he came to be considered a vitality in the Vienna of Brahms and Hugo Wolf.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony has intrigued several great conductors to play it in New York. It is interesting especially to the musician, for it codifies with neatness some of the dearly beloved musical theories of the nineteenth century. Gustav Mahler once played it authoritatively at a Philharmonic concert and Dr. Muck, like Mahler, asserted it with authority, while the Boston band vented itself upon the work with all the beauties of orchestral energy and finesse of which these players are capable.

It appeared all too conclusively that Bruckner was a supreme admirer of Wagner; nor was it necessary for the composer to entwine his symphony with the Wagnerian tubas to make this a matter of patent fact. And this admiration extended specifically all the way from "Die Meistersinger" to the very end of the "Niebelungen Ring" tetralogy.

Admiration of Bruckner, however, was largely restricted to the first movement of his symphony—possibly because it was the first, for thereafter his prolixity, his variation of the commonplace with the trivial, his repetitious, even if laboriously sincere, pomposities produced a weariness in brain tissue.

But let the tubas and the trombones depart. Beethoven could make music without them. His violin concerto needs only a Kreisler to make its tenderly passionate, buoyantly joyous utterance vibrate straight to the core of the emotions.

Mr. Kreisler played the concerto here last season, but at that time he was not in his full vigor, and only a gentle quality of beauty appeared in his account of it. Last evening he played it with a burning intensity of feeling and it became the lambent, living poem in music that it is.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915

Estab

That the Boston Symphony men could have sold out Carnegie Hall twice over last evening is only repeating the story of their visit to New York to-day. One special reason was the star, Fritz Kreisler. Two hours of preliminaries, or nearly that, in Muck's lengthy Brueckner symphony and the Beethoven concerto, led up to a famous pair of cadenzas in which Kreisler again dazzled the public, as he has for some years now. The audience gasped at his feats on fiddle strings comparable to the most daring escapades of a tight wire performer.

Kreisler, musician to his finger tips, is mesmeric in the thrill he can infuse into the classics. It is all legitimate, this communication of a heart throb to pages that in other hands sound worn and faded. Over the Bruckner revival, the doctors disagreed. It was chivalric of Muck, at least, thus to champion the man whom Vienna once vainly set up against the mighty Brahms. The audience remained to the close of Beethoven, regardless of the later crush of limousines, now past police power to handle.

To-night in Brooklyn the Bostonians play the Rachmaninoff "Isle of the Dead," preceded by a Mozart symphony and followed by the Brahms concerto with Kreisler and the Mendelssohn "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." To-morrow the second visit of the year ends at Carnegie Hall with Mozart and Mendelssohn again, plus a Handel piece for string and wind and a Viotti concerto for Kreisler.

[56]

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 1915

Estab 384

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CLASSICAL PROGRAMME.

Bruckner's Long Composition Followed by Beethoven Concerto With Kreisler.

Musical solidity supported, surrounded and fortified last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which Dr. Carl Muck conducted before the usual large audience in Carnegie Hall.

Only two compositions composed the programme, but they were sufficient to gratify the classicists and those lovers of music who are reached through the head rather than the heart.

Not that Bruckner's seventh symphony is deficient in excellent qualities, but the too-noisy finale and parts of the scherzo are musically dry.

It is doubtful if the orchestral portion of the Beethoven violin concerto ever sounded better than last night. Certainly the support these musicians gave Fritz Kreisler at his season's first appearance was sufficient to prompt him to unusual endeavors.

The Viennese vilolinist's interpretation of the only violin concerto Beethoven wrote was of the highest order.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 2 - 1915

Esta 1884

Two names of composers and two of their executants stand alone on to-night's bill of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. "The length of this programme is one hour and fifty minutes," as told in a line of footnote to the printed circulars. As announced before now the numbers the Bruckner's Seventh symphony, led by Muck, and Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Kreisler. The Boecklin-Rachmaninoff "Isle of the Dead," not included here, was given last night in Baltimore.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915

Established: L

ANTON BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY GIVEN

Dr. Karl Muck Again Revives Great Work of Much Neglected Composer.

FRITZ KREISLER IS THE STAR

Great Violinist Gives Complete Satisfaction to Large and Brilliant Gathering.

With Fritz Kreisler as the stellar attraction of the programme, Dr. Karl Muck ventured to bring forward at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night in Carnegie Hall the Seventh Symphony of that great and sadly neglected composer, Anton Bruckner.

When he first visited America the distinguished German conductor made several attempts here to awaken interest in Bruckner. The thanks he received came in the form of critical abuse. No wonder, then, that he abandoned, temporarily at least, his unselfish propaganda after giving a memorable performance of the ninth and unfinished symphony.

Perhaps Dr. Muck has now decided that the time has come at last to take up the cudgels once more for the Viennese master; and to judge from the manner in which last night's gathering received the inspired and inspiring Seventh Symphony, with its profoundly moving and slow movement, its fascinating Scherzo and its mighty Finale, he was not far wrong. Each movement evoked genuine enthusiasm, and at the close Dr. Muck, recalled repeatedly, asked all his men to share honors with him by rising.

Yet it can hardly be said that Dr. Muck and his men lived up to their reputation in dealing with this gigantic score. In the towering climaxes, to be sure, the accumulation of radiant instrumental sonorities was always beautiful, despite its overwhelming dynamic weight. One noticed, however, a surprising amount of raggedness, a surprising lack of rhythmic precision. There were even a few conspicuous mistakes.

Truth to tell, Dr. Muck wielded his baton listlessly and exerted less authority and power over his players than usual.

Kreisler's interpretation of Beethoven's concerto in D major—the only other offering on the programme—is perfectly familiar. In excellent form, the great violinist gave complete satisfaction to a large and brilliant gathering. He was greeted with tumultuous demonstrations of approval.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 1915

k, 1884

BRUCKNER'S MUSIC BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony Orchestra Gives an Hour and Three Minutes to Solemn Task.

BEETHOVEN HEARD TOO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town again. The programme of the concert last night in Carnegie Hall comprised two numbers, Anton Bruckner's E major symphony, No. 7, and Beethoven's violin concerto. The solo violinist was Fritz Kreisler. There was a time when the gentlemen of Boston walked with perfect gait in the airy ways of classic repose under the direction of Petronius Gericke, "arbiter elegantiarum." Long past are those days and many a stormy mountain height and flooded valley have the sweet singers of Huntington avenue travelled since then.

Under the mighty sceptre of the stern and unrelenting Cato Muck of Berlin they now fly to the very summit of Mount Caucasus itself and amid the eternal snows sing of the sorrows of a poor old man whom the unwitting world passed by. His name was Anton Bruckner and he wrote symphonies, which remained on paper. But there are some who are determined that the world shall hear them. We may reject them, but we shall not escape them. Dr. Carl Muck is one of these friends of Bruckner and foes of idle seekers after entertainment. Listening to a Bruckner symphony is not entirely a sport; it is a solemn consecration, in part a mortification of the flesh and at times a burden to the spirit. Yet when one has suffered and been strong for an hour and three minutes he has received from out of the vasty deeps of Bruckner's bottomless ocean mighty monsters well to be remembered.

Mastery of Counterpoint.

There is enough thematic inspiration in the symphony to set up a Schoenberg or a Stravinsky in business for life. The mastery of counterpoint shown in the first movement is inspiring. It is creative counterpoint, the kind which evolves new things out of old, and it flames with the glow of a large intellect.

The second movement is remarkable. Its second theme is one of the most graceful and winning in all music; but Bruckner's fatal incontinence, his long habit of dwelling in solitary infatuation with his thoughts in the seclusion of his study has here led him to wearisome repetitions and overelaborations. In the scherzo too insistent reiteration of the harsh melodic subject first given forth by the trumpet goes on till the hearer's mind becomes dulled by it. The trio gathers unto itself more than its due share of credit by force of contrast.

The last movement finds the composer desperately enmeshed in the tangled strands of his own ideas. Thirty years ago, when Theodore Thomas introduced this symphony, most of us thought that the dire confusion of chords in this last movement was the deadly feature of it; but now we know better. This harmony is ugly only nor'-nor'west and it is at least characteristic. And it is even simple when brought into comparison with the new stock of keys out of which the futurists brew their witches' broth.

Bruckner's apologists made for him the plea which Schoenberg's are making for their idol to-day. He is logical; the ugly harmonies come in the inevitable process of the voice parts. This is juggling with facts. Counterpoint is never tyrannical except when in strictly canonic form. Free counterpoint, which comprises the chief material of the latter day composer, admits of any sort of evasion of sheer ugliness if it threatens to join itself to the pursuit of logic.

Where Extreme Ugliness Lies.

As a matter of fact the extreme ugliness of this symphony is to be found in the scherzo, at a point where contrapuntal development is conspicuous by its absence. It is first in the melodic ideas themselves and next in their instrumental garb. But when the entire work has passed in review the ugly scherzo seems to have its well defined relation to the general scheme, and for this its intrinsic quality is perhaps to be condoned.

No one can listen to the composition without feeling the groping of a great dreamer after a firmer grasp of his phantoms of beauty. Bruckner had a genial mind, but he lacked the mastery of his materials necessary to make him a genius. His music has elements of greatness and it has moments of grandeur. But it is too often flimsy and thin spun, and too often echoes the thoughts of others, especially those of Wagner. The gods of "Rheingold" go into the true Walhalla, and they march upon a rainbow.

The symphony was admirably played. It seems hardly necessary to say this, and only because it was the Boston Orchestra should there be note of two or three technical slips. That of the second horn was the only important one, but the man was human and his lips were not made of leather.

The last time Mr. Kreisler played the Beethoven concerto he did it badly. It was not known at the time that he was suffering from great mental stress. Last evening he began the work tempestuously and for a time it seemed as if he might storm through it recklessly; but he soon found calm and thenceforward delivered the music with repose and beauty of style. His performance of the first movement, the cadenza, was brilliant without disturbing too greatly the Beethoven atmosphere.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 191

Establis

FRITZ KREISLER WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came again to New York last evening on one of its monthly ministrations of grace, and Dr. Karl Muck presented to his Carnegie Hall audience the Seventh Symphony of Anton Bruckner. This was resuscitation, for the name of Bruckner is fading swiftly from all orchestral programmes. The last third of the evening—Bruckner being two-thirds—was given over to the violin concerto of Beethoven, with Fritz Kreisler playing the violin. This was revelation, for Beethoven, in spite of the tubas of Bruckner and even, irrelevantly, the immanence of Strawinsky, needs no resuscitation.

No doubt Dr. Muck believes that Bruckner is as worthy a place on a programme of to-day as Max Reger or Camille Saint-Saens and Vincent d'Indy, or as Edward Elgar, and one agrees that, if such be his belief, he is indubitably right. It may even be that Dr. Muck believes more emphatically than this in Bruckner. In any case, it is the better part of wisdom for the twentieth century to touch again and retest such vitalities of the nineteenth as stamped some impress upon their own day. Vienna thought Bruckner a great man. He no longer seems that, but at least one can understand how he came to be considered a vitality in the Vienna of Brahms and Hugo Wolf.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony has intrigued several great conductors to play it in New York. It is interesting especially to the musician, for it codifies with neatness some of the dearly beloved musical theories of the nineteenth century. Gustav Mahler once played it authoritatively at a Philharmonic concert and Dr. Muck, like Mahler, asserted it with authority, while the Boston band vented itself upon the work with all the beauties of orchestral energy and finesse of which these players are capable.

It appeared all too conclusively that Bruckner was a supreme admirer of Wagner; nor was it necessary for the composer to entwine his symphony with the Wagnerian tubas to make this a matter of patent fact. And this admiration extended specifically all the way from "Die Meistersinger" to the very end of the "Niebelungen Ring" tetralogy.

Admiration of Bruckner, however, was largely restricted to the first movement of his symphony—possibly because it was the first, for thereafter his prolixity, his variation of the commonplace with the trivial, his repetitious, even if laboriously sincere, pomposities produced a weariness in brain tissue.

But let the tubas and the trombones depart. Beethoven could make music without them. His violin concerto needs only a Kreisler to make its tenderly passionate, buoyantly joyous utterance vibrate straight to the core of the emotions.

Mr. Kreisler played the concerto here last season, but at that time he was not in his full vigor, and only a gentle quality of beauty appeared in his account of it. Last evening he played it with a burning intensity of feeling and it became the lambent, living poem in music that it is.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915

Establ

That the Boston Symphony men could have sold out Carnegie Hall twice over last evening is only repeating the story of their visit to New York to-day. One special reason was the star, Fritz Kreisler. Two hours of preliminaries, or nearly that, in Muck's lengthy Brueckner symphony and the Beethoven concerto, led up to a famous pair of cadenzas in which Kreisler again dazzled the public, as he has for some years now. The audience gasped at his feats on fiddle strings comparable to the most daring escapades of a tight wire performer.

Kreisler, musician to his finger tips, is mesmeric in the thrill he can infuse into the classics. It is all legitimate, this communication of a heart throb to pages that in other hands sound worn and faded. Over the Bruckner revival, the doctors disagreed. It was chivalric of Muck, at least, thus to champion the man whom Vienna once vainly set up against the mighty Brahms. The audience remained to the close of Beethoven, regardless of the later crush of limousines, now past police power to handle.

To-night in Brooklyn the Bostonians play the Rachmaninoff "Isle of the Dead," preceded by a Mozart symphony and followed by the Brahms concerto with Kreisler and the Mendelssohn "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." To-morrow the second visit of the year ends at Carnegie Hall with Mozart and Mendelssohn again, plus a Handel piece for string and wind and a Viotti concerto for Kreisler.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 1915

Estab 184

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN CLASSICAL PROGRAMME.

Bruckner's Long Composition Followed by Beethoven Concerto With Kreisler.

Musical solidity supported, surrounded and fortified last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which Dr. Carl Muck conducted before the usual large audience in Carnegie Hall.

Only two compositions composed the programme, but they were sufficient to gratify the classicists and those lovers of music who are reached through the head rather than the heart.

Not that Bruckner's seventh symphony is deficient in excellent qualities, but the too-noisy finale and parts of the scherzo are musically dry.

It is doubtful if the orchestral portion of the Beethoven violin concerto ever sounded better than last night. Certainly the support these musicians gave Fritz Kreisler at his season's first appearance was sufficient to prompt him to unusual endeavors.

The Viennese vilolinist's interpretation of the only violin concerto Beethoven wrote was of the highest order.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date DEC 2 - 1915

Esta 1884

Two names of composers and two of their executants stand alone on to-night's bill of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. "The length of this programme is one hour and fifty minutes," as told in a line of footnote to the printed circulars. As announced before now the numbers the Bruckner's Seventh symphony, led by Muck, and Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Kreisler. The Boecklin-Rachmaninoff "Isle of the Dead," not included here, was given last night in Baltimore.

From PRESS
Address: New York City
Date DEC [illegible]

Established: L

ANTON BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY GIVEN

Dr. Karl Muck Again Revives Great Work of Much Neglected Composer.

FRITZ KREISLER IS THE STAR

Great Violinist Gives Complete Satisfaction to Large and Brilliant Gathering.

With Fritz Kreisler as the stellar attraction of the programme, Dr. Karl Muck ventured to bring forward at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night in Carnegie Hall the Seventh Symphony of that great and sadly neglected composer, Anton Bruckner.

When he first visited America the distinguished German conductor made several attempts here to awaken interest in Bruckner. The thanks he received came in the form of critical abuse. No wonder, then, that he abandoned, temporarily at least, his unselfish propaganda after giving a memorable performance of the ninth and unfinished symphony.

Perhaps Dr. Muck has now decided that the time has come at last to take up the cudgels once more for the Viennese master; and to judge from the manner in which last night's gathering received the inspired and inspiring Seventh Symphony, with its profoundly moving and slow movement, its fascinating Scherzo and its mighty Finale, he was not far wrong. Each movement evoked genuine enthusiasm, and at the close Dr. Muck, recalled repeatedly, asked all his men to share honors with him by rising.

Yet it can hardly be said that Dr. Muck and his men lived up to their reputation in dealing with this gigantic score. In the towering climaxes, to be sure, the accumulation of radiant instrumental sonorities was always beautiful, despite its overwhelming dynamic weight. One noticed, however, a surprising amount of raggedness, a surprising lack of rhythmic precision. There were even a few conspicuous mistakes.

Truth to tell, Dr. Muck wielded his baton listlessly and exerted less authority and power over his players than usual.

Kreisler's interpretation of Beethoven's concerto in D major—the only other offering on the programme—is perfectly familiar. In excellent form, the great violinist gave complete satisfaction to a large and brilliant gathering. He was greeted with tumultuous demonstrations of approval.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915

Establi 34

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

Dr. Muck made an unusual program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. It comprised only two numbers: Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's concerto for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler. The symphony is long, lasting just over an hour. The audience listened with patience to this work of vast dimensions in length, breadth, and thickness, encouraged, no doubt, by the thought of what was to follow it.

Dr. Muck played it here eight years ago, in his first term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. He is a prophet of Bruckner, who has made extensive propaganda for his symphonies in Europe as well as in this country. So have many others of the most distinguished of modern conductors; and this fact should discourage hasty depreciation of Bruckner's works. Yet they have not hastily been depreciated here, though they have tried the endurance of the public for nearly a generation. When the Seventh Symphony was first played in New York some twenty-eight years ago it was considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, abstruse elaboration. The fifteen brass instruments used in it excited wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as bewilderingly "modern," with Wagnerian tendencies.

His music now seems intelligible enough; it does not persistently ape the Wagnerian idiom, and what he is trying to convey is easy to understand. The trouble with Bruckner does not lie in that direction. It is evident that he was a creative force of undoubted power; but that he had little control, through self-criticism, of his work in symphonic development. Such development he had not mastered; and he had little feeling for the significance or the apt proportions of the symphonic form. The movements of this symphony seem like an elaborate series of genial experiments carried to wearisome lengths, with no certain foresight of the end and no inevitable progress toward that end. There are pages of grandiose and imposing power; passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods, poignant and searching, truly and finely felt.

The opening passages of the first movement, and much in it that follows, have impressiveness; but there are here, as through the whole work, tiresome repetitions, dry and uninteresting details; and the end is a reminder, amusing today, of Bruckner's Wagnerian ardor, so closely does it paraphrase the final scene of "Das Rheingold." The slow movement, interminably and extravagantly prolonged though it is, has true nobility and in its finest moments a deep solemnity. If the succulent portions of the scherzo could be isolated from much husk, they would be enjoyed. The last movement is the weakest, inept in its material and dry in its pretentious learnedness.

This strangely compounded work was heard with more apparent interest than at any previous performance of it here. The performance was superb, devoted on the part of both conductor and players: though some may have questioned whether the scherzo might not have gained by a livelier tempo. There was much applause after the slow movement, and at the end Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and, as he so often does, made his men rise to share the applause with him.

Mr. Kreisler was most enthusiastically welcomed. He played Beethoven's concerto with the profound appreciation of its poetical beauties that has so often marked his performances of it before. It was the performance of a great artist who penetrates the spirit of Beethoven's work and who

---

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915

Es 1884

BOSTONIANS IN BRUCKNER WORK

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Composition Written in Honor of Richard Wagner.

MEMORIES OF OLD BATTLE

How Hanslick Tried to Destroy Symphonic Champion Advanced by Wagnerites.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

It is a commonplace among observers of human nature that the more abstract a question the more concrete, personal and virulent is the quarrel between those who have ranged themselves on different sides of it. Huxley has told us in a tragic page of the fearful dissensions that rage in the fiery bosoms of entomologists when once there arises a contest among them as to the proper way of classifying the odious insects that form the subject matter of their emulous and impassioned studies.

The calamities and quarrels of musicians are proverbially embittered. We notice this in our own days when an audience at a rehearsal of "Pelleas et Melisande" expressed its sincere variety and discord of opinion in the frank and refreshing terms of a free fight, and again when French appreciations of the melodic beauties of "Lohengrin" expressed themselves odorously and emphatically in the form of the ancient weapon known as "stinkpots" hurled at the heads of the principal performers.

A Laputan Quarrel.

Fifty years a Laputan quarre ly suggestive of the last episod second act of "Die Meistersin Nurnberg," was proceeding i Deutschland." One school of m maintained that the touch and pu of German music burned, and alone, in the noble hand of Wagner, the dramatic musician. element violently denied this, sayi the unsullied flame leaped heav from the brazier held in the h Johannes Brahms, the absolute mu One faction was for the theatre, the other for the concert room.

If you loved Brahms you were supposed to hate Wagner. If you came under the spell of Wagner, you had to put a ban on Brahms. The battle raged inflamed by Hanslick, the Vienna critic, who pursued Wagner with a rancorous hunt of obloquy. He created and sustained the battle, feeling that the proper means of elevating Brahms was to debase Wagner. This demonstrates that Hanslick was a poor critic and a poorer soul. Musically he was a nonentity, though he had literary power enough to wound and impede great men. He used it. One taunt of the Brahmsites, or rather the Hanslickites, stung the Wagnerites to the quick. "Your gang," they halloed, "have no symphonic writers. You all belong to the green room and ballet girl crew. Get one of your Wagner idealists to write a symphony. Symphony! Do you hear? Symphony. Yah!" We know the delicacies of internal Teutonic controversy. Imagine the flight of technical Billingsgate.

Wagnerian Symphonist.

The Wagnerites duly brought fo their symphonist. He was Anton B ner, whose Seventh was played last at Carnegie Hall by the Boston cians led by Dr. Karl Muck. Br was a starving village schoolmaste had studied music with opportun maimed and deferred that when l life he tried to play upon the great in the Albert Hall, London, he himself hampered and bewildered l luxurious complexity of the mech In physical appearance and bear must have been among the fashionable and intellectual musicians of the concert halls of Vienna, what Tom Pinch was among the spruce lawyers of the Temple. The uncouth, homely figure was such as to cause laughter among the ill-bred. He spoke with the dialect and ungainly utterance of what he was—a peasant. But whatever was his exterior, it clothed a soul of music.

An Ugly Duckling.

Bruckner was the ugly duckling who turned out a swan. He idolized Wagner, and thought he saw a way of applying Wagner's ideals to the unsupported and unillustrated music of the concert-room. The Brahmsites—though Brahms took no share in the ignoble cry—saw that the village organist had genius as a composer, and they set out to destroy him. Hanslick got Von Buelow sneering and the women spitting. The calling of the critic is at most an asinine and otiose one; but it is never so bloedsinnige as when the writer lends himself and his pen to the sinister purposes of crazy faction.

The opposition of Hanslick to Wagner is the supreme jest of musical history. Wagner had his revenge full and sweet. The Viennese intrigue against Bruckner is not such agreeable reading. Bruckner was poor, struggling, humble and gifted. Hanslick, who was the powerful leader of a rich and insolent musical rabble, even fought against his appointment to some miserable teaching post. The story is pathetic, squalid, showing the meanness of human nature.

The Seventh Symphony is supposed to be written in honor of Wagner. The celebrated adagio is a sort of anticipatory elegy on him whom Bruckner loved to call master. I say anticipatory, because it was written several months before Wagner died at Venice. It must be regarded, however, as its writer wished it to be regarded, as the dirge on the death of his ideal.

Nothing finer than Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Adagio of this work has been heard in many years. The movement has been described as the monument of its creator. Were it possible to solidify the main features of Mr. Muck's version of the Adagio into the durable lineaments of stone, his expression so recorded of the austere beauties of this symphony might be made a fitting memorial to Dr. Muck himself.

On the conclusion of the Bruckner work, the noble episodes of which are the plenary apology for its length and discursiveness, Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 191

Establis

Orchestral Concerts.

Dr. Muck and his Boston Symp Orchestra gave a most enjoyable co in Carnegie Hall on Saturday after although (to some, no doubt, bec the programme was entirely old-ioned. It included a Mozart symp a Handel concerto for two wind or tras, Viotti's twenty-second concerto for violin (Fritz Kreisler) and Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." In none of these is the heavy brass artillery brought into action, but there was abundant opportunity to display the polish and euphony of the famous Boston band. The climax of the concert, it is needless to say, was the Viotti concerto, in which Mr. Kreisler—who got an ovation both before and after playing—was at his very best. He has more than one way of bringing the music of former generations home to modern audiences. He also has, poor man, more than one reason for sadness. The adagio was bathed in tears—more soulful playing has never been heard in a local concert hall. His own cadenza is as splendid an improvisation as his cadenzas in the Beethoven concerto. His playing of it was a bigger advertisement for his Carnegie Hall recital next Sunday afternoon than a whole display page in a daily paper.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5 - 191

Est

RIVAL SYMPHONISTS GIVE TWO CONCERTS

Bostonians Heard in the Afternoo and the Philharmonists in the Evening.

There were several concerts yesterday in Manhattan. Among these the more important were the concert of classical music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, and the first concert of the popular series of the Philharmonic Society given in the same place in the evening.

The Boston Symphonists gave a noble rendering of Handel's concerto in F major. The tranquil beauties of the largo showed the varied and massive powers of the musical intellect of Handel. The symphony was Mozart's in E flat major.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, unrivalled in the rich splendor of his perfect tone and his command over the imagination of his hearers.

The Philharmonic programme included two Beethoven, two Wagner and two Liszt numbers. Mr. Josef Stransky conducted.

Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, with blushing nodesty, played three concertos at Hall with the New York Sym-

---

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 1915

Establish

3 ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS OF WEEK-END

The floods of music that sometimes inundate New York of a week-end surged forth and eddied about the devoted concert-goer on Saturday and Sunday. If he happened to be a choiceful music lover, the several streams offered him plentiful variety. There were no less than five orchestral concerts on the two days, two each of the New York Symphony and Philharmonic orchestras and one of the visiting orchestra from Boston.

To present to the reader any extensive consideration of these five concerts would be manifestly beyond the bounds of newspaper space. It is impossible to do more than indicate some of the significant elements in all this music.

The Boston Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Saturday presented performances of one of the greatest three symphonies of Mozart, that in E flat; a Handel concerto for strings and two wind choirs; the twenty-second concerto for violin and orchestra of Viotti, with Fritz Kriesler as the soloist, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Meeres Stille und Glueckliche Fahrt."

All this, with the exception of the Mendelssohn overture, was eighteenth century music and some of the best of it. Dr. Muck is too much of a thinker and too much the musician with profound sympathies to patronize, even ever so little, the eighteenth century in music. Mozart is accordingly one of the great figures of all time to him. And it was from this viewpoint that the E flat symphony was played.

Mr. Kreisler also has a deep reverence for this music of an earlier day, as some of its forgotten jewels which he has unearthed and again brought out into the sunshine of his art audibly reveal. He knows, moreover, that it is one of the follies of tradition to treat this music solely as having been written merely for its own sake—that is, merely for its odwn of producing beautiful sounds. To have heard him play the slow movement of this concerto of Viotti should have been sufficient to give the lie to any such tradition. A suffusing warmth made the whole work live again with a renewed vitality.

---

n AMERICAN ress: New York City
DEC 5 1915

d:

Boston Symphony Secone Concert Fills Carnegie

Programme Limited to Works by Classic Composers — Fritz Kreisler Again Soloist.

Twice this week Carnegie Hall was filled with the devoted following of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second concert was given yesterday afternoon. For this Dr. Muck arranged a programme that was an absolute contrast to that of Thursday evening. I was limited to works by the classic composers Mozart, Handel, Viotti and Mendelssohn.

Fritz Kneisler was again the soloist (this was his fourth New York appearance in less than a week) and was heard in the solo part in Viotti's Concerto. He has seldom played with more nobility of tone or greater eloquence. In the showy passages his left-hand work was a revelation of eed and accuracy and his bowing as broad and artistic.

The Mozart E flat symphony was read by Dr. Muck and his men with grace, spirit and refinement. In Haendel's concerto for strings and wind choirs the musicians realized much of the original beauty and symmetry of the work through its outline and compass had been changed to fit the requirements of the modern orchestra.

Equally pleasing and delicate was the rendering of Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which closed the concert.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Establi

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

Dr. Muck made an unusual program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. It comprised only two numbers: Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's concerto for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler. The symphony is long, lasting just over an hour. The audience listened with patience to this work of vast dimensions in length, breadth, and thickness, encouraged, no doubt, by the thought of what was to follow it.

Dr. Muck played it here eight years ago, in his first term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. He is a prophet of Bruckner, who has made extensive propaganda for his symphonies in Europe as well as in this country. So have many others of the most distinguished of modern conductors; and this fact should discourage hasty depreciation of Brückner's works. Yet they have not hastily been depreciated here, though they have tried the endurance of the public for nearly a generation. When the Seventh Symphony was first played in New York some twenty-eight years ago it was considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, abstruse elaboration. The fifteen brass instruments used in it excited wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as bewilderingly "modern," with Wagnerian tendencies.

His music now seems intelligible enough; it does not persistently ape the Wagnerian idiom, and what he is trying to convey is easy to understand. The trouble with Bruckner does not lie in that direction. It is evident that he was a creative force of undoubted power; but that he had little control, through self-criticism, of his work in symphonic development. Such development he had not mastered; and he had little feeling for the significance or the apt proportions of the symphonic form. The movements of this symphony seem like an elaborate series of genial experiments carried to wearisome lengths, with no certain foresight of the end and no inevitable progress toward that end. There are pages of grandiose and imposing power; passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods, poignant and searching, truly and finely felt.

The opening passages of the first movement, and much in it that follows, have impressiveness; but there are here, as through the whole work, tiresome repetitions, dry and uninteresting details; and the end is a reminder, amusing today, of Bruckner's Wagnerian ardor, so closely does it paraphrase the final scene of "Das Rheingold." The slow movement, interminably and extravagantly prolonged though it is, has true nobility and in its finest moments a deep solemnity. If the succulent portions of the scherzo could be isolated from much husk, they would be enjoyed. The last movement is the weakest, inept in its material and dry in its pretentious learnedness.

This strangely compounded work was heard with more apparent interest than at any previous performance of it here. The performance was superb, devoted on the part of both conductor and players: though some may have questioned whether the scherzo might not have gained by a livelier tempo. There was much applause after the slow movement, and at the end Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and, as he so often does, made his men rise to share the applause with him.

Mr. Kreisler was most enthusiastically welcomed. He played Beethoven's concerto with the profound appreciation of its poetical beauties that has so often marked his performances of it before. It was the performance of a great artist who penetrates the spirit of Beethoven's work and who

---

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Es 1884

BOSTONIANS IN BRUCKNER WORK

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Composition Written in Honor of Richard Wagner.

MEMORIES OF OLD BATTLE

How Hanslick Tried to Destroy Symphonic Champion Advanced by Wagnerites.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

It is a commonplace among observers of human nature that the more abstract a question the more concrete, personal and virulent is the quarrel between those who have ranged themselves on different sides of it. Huxley has told us in a tragic page of the fearful dissensions that rage in the fiery bosoms of entomologists when once there arises a contest among them as to the proper way of classifying the odious insects that form the subject matter of their emulous and impassioned studies.

The calamities and quarrels of musicians are proverbially embittered. We notice this in our own days when an audience at a rehearsal of "Pelleas et Melisande" expressed its sincere variety and discord of opinion in the frank and refreshing terms of a free fight, and again when French appreciations of the melodic beauties of "Lohengrin" expressed themselves odorously and emphatically in the form of the ancient weapon known as "stinkpots" hurled at the heads of the principal performers.

A Laputan Quarrel.

Fifty years a Laputan quarre ly suggestive of the last episod second act of "Die Meistersin Nurnberg," was proceeding i Deutschland." One school of m maintained that the touch and pu of German music burned, and alone, in the noble hand of Wagner, the dramatic musician. element violently denied this, sayi the unsullied flame leaped heav from the brazier held in the ha Johannes Brahms, the absolute mu One faction was for the theatre, the other for the concert room.

If you loved Brahms you were supposed to hate Wagner. If you came under the spell of Wagner, you had to put a ban on Brahms. The battle raged inflamed by Hanslick, the Vienna critic, who pursued Wagner with a rancorous hunt of obloquy. He created and sustained the battle, feeling that the proper means of elevating Brahms was to debase Wagner. This demonstrates that Hanslick was a poor critic and a poorer soul. Musically he was a nonentity, though he had literary power enough to wound and impede great men. He used it. One taunt of the Brahmsites, or rather the Hanslickites, stung the Wagnerites to the quick. "Your gang," they halloed, "have no symphonic writers. You all belong to the green room and ballet girl crew. Get one of your Wagner idealists to write a symphony. Symphony! Do you hear? Symphony. Yah!" We know the delicacies of internal Teutonic controversy. Imagine the flight of technical Billingsgate.

Wagnerian Symphonist.

The Wagnerites duly brought fo their symphonist. He was Anton B ner, whose Seventh was played last at Carnegie Hall by the Boston cians led by Dr. Karl Muck. Br was a starving village schoolmaste had studied music with opportun maimed and deferred that when l life he tried to play upon the great in the Albert Hall, London, he himself hampered and bewildered luxurious complexity of the mecha In physical appearance and beari must have been among the fashionable and intellectual musicians of the concert halls of Vienna, what Tom Pinch was among the spruce lawyers of the Temple. The uncouth, homely figure was such as to cause laughter among the ill-bred. He spoke with the dialect and ungainly utterance of what he was—a peasant. But whatever was his exterior, it clothed a soul of music.

An Ugly Duckling.

Bruckner was the ugly duckling who turned out a swan. He idolized Wagner, and thought he saw a way of applying Wagner's ideals to the unsupported and unillustrated music of the concert-room. The Brahmsites—though Brahms took no share in the ignoble cry—saw that the village organist had genius as a composer, and they set out to destroy him. Hanslick got Von Buelow sneering and the women spitting. The calling of the critic is at most an asinine and otiose one; but it is never so bloedsinnige as when the writer lends himself and his pen to the sinister purposes of crazy faction.

The opposition of Hanslick to Wagner is the supreme jest of musical history. Wagner had his revenge full and sweet. The Viennese intrigue against Bruckner is not such agreeable reading. Bruckner was poor, struggling, humble and gifted. Hanslick, who was the powerful leader of a rich and insolent musical rabble, even fought against his appointment to some miserable teaching post. The story is pathetic, squalid, showing the meanness of human nature.

The Seventh Symphony is supposed to be written in honor of Wagner. The celebrated adagio is a sort of anticipatory elegy on him whom Bruckner loved to call master. I say anticipatory, because it was written several months before Wagner died at Venice. It must be regarded, however, as its writer wished it to be regarded, as the dirge on the death of his ideal.

Nothing finer than Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Adagio of this work has been heard in many years. The movement has been described as the monument of its creator. Were it possible to solidify the main features of Mr. Muck's version of the Adagio into the durable lineaments of stone, his expression so recorded of the austere beauties of this symphony might be made a fitting memorial to Dr. Muck himself.

On the conclusion of the Bruckner work, the noble episodes of which are the plenary apology for its length and discursiveness, Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 191
Establis

Orchestral Concerts.

Dr. Muck and his Boston Symp Orchestra gave a most enjoyable co in Carnegie Hall on Saturday after although (to some, no doubt, beca the programme was entirely old-ioned. It included a Mozart symp a Handel concerto for two wind or tras, Viotti's twenty-second concerto for violin (Fritz Kreisler) and Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." In none of these is the heavy brass artillery brought into action, but there was abundant opportunity to display the polish and euphony of the famous Boston band. The climax of the concert, it is needless to say, was the Viotti concerto, in which Mr. Kreisler—who got an ovation both before and after playing—was at his very best. He has more than one way of bringing the music of former generations home to modern audiences. He also has, poor man, more than one reason for sadness. The adagio was bathed in tears—more soulful playing has never been heard in a local concert hall. His own cadenza is as splendid an improvisation as his cadenzas in the Beethoven concerto. His playing of it was a bigger advertisement for his Carnegie Hall recital next Sunday afternoon than a whole display page in a daily paper.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 1915
Establish

3 ORCHESTRAS IN CONCERTS OF WEEK-END

The floods of music that sometimes inundate New York of a week-end surged forth and eddied about the devoted concert-goer on Saturday and Sunday. If he happened to be a choiceful music lover, the several streams offered him plentiful variety. There were no less than five orchestral concerts on the two days, two each of the New York Symphony and Philharmonic orchestras and one of the visiting orchestra from Boston.

To present to the reader any extensive consideration of these five concerts would be manifestly beyond the bounds of newspaper space. It is impossible to do more than indicate some of the significant elements in all this music.

The Boston Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Saturday presented performances of one of the greatest three symphonies of Mozart, that in E flat; a Handel concerto for strings and two wind choirs; the twenty-second concerto for violin and orchestra of Viotti, with Fritz Kriesler as the soloist, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Meeres Stille und Glueckliche Fahrt."

All this, with the exception of the Mendelssohn overture, was eighteenth century music and some of the best of it. Dr. Muck is too much of a thinker and too much the musician with profound sympathies to patronize, even ever so little, the eighteenth century in music. Mozart is accordingly one of the great figures of all time to him. And it was from this viewpoint that the E flat symphony was played.

Mr. Kreisler also has a deep reverence for this music of an earlier day, as some of its forgotten jewels which he has unearthed and again brought out into the sunshine of his art audibly reveal. He knows, moreover, that it is one of the follies of tradition to treat this music solely as having been written merely for its own sake—that is, merely for its odwn of producing beautiful sounds. To have heard him play the slow movement of this concerto of Viotti should have been sufficient to give the lie to any such tradition. A suffusing warmth made the whole work live again with a renewed vitality.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5 - 19
Est

RIVAL SYMPHONISTS GIVE TWO CONCERTS

Bostonians Heard in the Afternoo and the Philharmonists in the Evening.

There were several concerts yesterday in Manhattan. Among these the more important were the concert of classical music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, and the first concert of the popular series of the Philharmonic Society given in the same place in the evening.

The Boston Symphonists gave a noble rendering of Handel's concerto in F major. The tranquil beauties of the largo showed the varied and massive powers of the musical intellect of Handel. The symphony was Mozart's in E flat major.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, unrivalled in the rich splendor of his perfect tone and his command over the imagination of his hearers.

The Philharmonic programme included two Beethoven, two Wagner and two Liszt numbers. Mr. Josef Stransky conducted.

Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, with blushing modesty, played three concertos at Hall with the New York Sym-

---

n AMERICAN
ress: New York City
DEC 1915
d:

Boston Symphony Secone Concert Fills Carnegie

Programme Limited to Works by Classic Composers — Fritz Kreisler Again Soloist.

Twice this week Carnegie Hall was filled with the devoted following of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second concert was given yesterday afternoon. For this Dr. Muck arranged a programme that was an absolute contrast to that of Thursday evening. I was limited to works by the classic composers Mozart, Handel, Viotti and Mendelssohn.

Fritz Kneisler was again the soloist (this was his fourth New York appearance in less than a week) and was heard in the solo part in Viotti's Concerto. He has seldom played with more nobility of tone or greater eloquence. In the showy passages his left-hand work was a revelation of eed and accuracy and his bowing as broad and artistic.

The Mozart E flat symphony was read by Dr. Muck and his men with grace, spirit and refinement. In Haendel's concerto for strings and wind choirs the musicians realized much of the original beauty and symmetry of the work through its outline and compass had been changed to fit the requirements of the modern orchestra.

Equally pleasing and delicate was the rendering of Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which closed the concert.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Establi 34

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

Dr. Muck made an unusual program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. It comprised only two numbers: Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's concerto for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler. The symphony is long, lasting just over an hour. The audience listened with patience to this work of vast dimensions in length, breadth, and thickness, encouraged, no doubt, by the thought of what was to follow it.

Dr. Muck played it here eight years ago, in his first term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. He is a prophet of Bruckner, who has made extensive propaganda for his symphonies in Europe as well as in this country. So have many others of the most distinguished of modern conductors; and this fact should discourage hasty depreciation of Bruckner's works. Yet they have not hastily been depreciated here, though they have tried the endurance of the public for nearly a generation. When the Seventh Symphony was first played in New York some twenty-eight years ago it was considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, abstruse elaboration. The fifteen brass instruments used in it excited wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as bewilderingly "modern," with Wagnerian tendencies.

His music now seems intelligible enough; it does not persistently ape the Wagnerian idiom, and what he is trying to convey is easy to understand. The trouble with Bruckner does not lie in that direction. It is evident that he was a creative force of undoubted power; but that he had little control, through self-criticism, of his work in symphonic development. Such development he had not mastered; and he had little feeling for the significance or the apt proportions of the symphonic form. The movements of this symphony seem like an elaborate series of genial experiments carried to wearisome lengths, with no certain foresight of the end and no inevitable progress toward that end. There are pages of grandiose and imposing power; passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods, poignant and searching, truly and finely felt.

The opening passages of the first movement, and much in it that follows, have impressiveness; but there are here, as through the whole work, tiresome repetitions, dry and uninteresting details; and the end is a reminder, amusing today, of Bruckner's Wagnerian ardor, so closely does it paraphrase the final scene of "Das Rheingold." The slow movement, interminably and extravagantly prolonged though it is, has true nobility and in its finest moments a deep solemnity. If the succulent portions of the scherzo could be isolated from much husk, they would be enjoyed. The last movement is the weakest, inept in its material and dry in its pretentious learnedness.

This strangely compounded work was heard with more apparent interest than at any previous performance of it here. The performance was superb, devoted on the part of both conductor and players: though some may have questioned whether the scherzo might not have gained by a livelier tempo. There was much applause after the slow movement, and at the end Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and, as he so often does, made his men rise to share the applause with him.

Mr. Kreisler was most enthusiastically welcomed. He played Beethoven's concerto with the profound appreciation of its poetical beauties that has so often marked his performances of it before. It was the performance of a great artist who penetrates the spirit of Beethoven's work and who

---

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Es 1884

BOSTONIANS IN BRUCKNER WORK

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Composition Written in Honor of Richard Wagner.

MEMORIES OF OLD BATTLE

How Hanslick Tried to Destroy Symphonic Champion Advanced by Wagnerites.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

It is a commonplace among observers of human nature that the more abstract a question the more concrete, personal and virulent is the quarrel between those who have ranged themselves on different sides of it. Huxley has told us in a tragic page of the fearful dissensions that rage in the fiery bosoms of entomologists when once there arises a contest among them as to the proper way of classifying the odious insects that form the subject matter of their emulous and impassioned studies.

The calamities and quarrels of musicians are proverbially embittered. We notice this in our own days when an audience at a rehearsal of "Pelleas et Melisande" expressed its sincere variety and discord of opinion in the frank and refreshing terms of a free fight, and again when French appreciations of the melodic beauties of "Lohengrin" expressed themselves odorously and emphatically in the form of the ancient weapon known as "stinkpots" hurled at the heads of the principal performers.

A Laputan Quarrel.

Fifty years a Laputan quarrel, strongly suggestive of the last episode of the second act of "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," was proceeding in "alte Deutschland." One school of musicians maintained that the touch and pure flame of German music burned, and burned alone, in the noble hand of Richard Wagner, the dramatic musician. Another element violently denied this, saying that the unsullied flame leaped heavenward from the brazier held in the hand of Johannes Brahms, the absolute musician. One faction was for the theatre, the other for the concert room.

If you loved Brahms you were supposed to hate Wagner. If you came under the spell of Wagner, you had to put a ban on Brahms. The battle raged inflamed by Hanslick, the Vienna critic, who pursued Wagner with a rancorous hunt of obloquy. He created and sustained the battle, feeling that the proper means of elevating Brahms was to debase Wagner. This demonstrates that Hanslick was a poor critic and a poorer soul. Musically he was a nonentity, though he had literary power enough to wound and impede great men. He used it. One taunt of the Brahmsites, or rather the Hanslickites, stung the Wagnerites to the quick. "Your gang," they halloed, "have no symphonic writers. You all belong to the green room and ballet girl crew. Get one of your Wagner idealists to write a symphony. Symphony! Do you hear? Symphony. Yah!" We know the delicacies of internal Teutonic controversy. Imagine the flight of technical Billingsgate.

Wagnerian Symphonist.

The Wagnerites duly brought forward their symphonist. He was Anton Bruckner, whose Seventh was played last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston musicians led by Dr. Karl Muck. Bruckner was a starving village schoolmaster, who had studied music with opportunity so maimed and deferred that when late in life he tried to play upon the great organ in the Albert Hall, London, he found himself hampered and bewildered by the luxurious complexity of the mechanism. In physical appearance and bearing he must have been among the fashionable and intellectual musicians of the concert halls of Vienna, what Tom Pinch was among the spruce lawyers of the Temple. The uncouth, homely figure was such as to cause laughter among the ill-bred. He spoke with the dialect and ungainly utterance of what he was—a peasant. But whatever was his exterior, it clothed a soul of music.

An Ugly Duckling.

Bruckner was the ugly duckling who turned out a swan. He idolized Wagner, and thought he saw a way of applying Wagner's ideals to the unsupported and unillustrated music of the concert-room. The Brahmsites—though Brahms took no share in the ignoble cry—saw that the village organist had genius as a composer, and they set out to destroy him. Hanslick got Von Buelow sneering and the women spitting. The calling of the critic is at most an asinine and otiose one; but it is never so bloedsinnige as when the writer lends himself and his pen to the sinister purposes of crazy faction.

The opposition of Hanslick to Wagner is the supreme jest of musical history. Wagner had his revenge full and sweet. The Viennese intrigue against Bruckner is not such agreeable reading. Bruckner was poor, struggling, humble and gifted. Hanslick, who was the powerful leader of a rich and insolent musical rabble, even fought against his appointment to some miserable teaching post. The story is pathetic, squalid, showing the meanness of human nature.

The Seventh Symphony is supposed to be written in honor of Wagner. The celebrated adagio is a sort of anticipatory elegy on him whom Bruckner loved to call master. I say anticipatory, because it was written several months before Wagner died at Venice. It must be regarded, however, as its writer wished it to be regarded, as the dirge on the death of his ideal.

Nothing finer than Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Adagio of this work has been heard in many years. The movement has been described as the monument of its creator. Were it possible to solidify the main features of Mr. Muck's version of the Adagio into the durable lineaments of stone, his expression so recorded of the austere beauties of this symphony might be made a fitting memorial to Dr. Muck himself.

On the conclusion of the Bruckner work, the noble episodes of which are the plenary apology for its length and discursiveness, Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto.

ING POST
ew York City
DEC 6 191

Orchestral Concerts.

k and his Boston Sym ave a most enjoyable c
Hall on Saturday after to some, no doubt, bec
mme was entirely old ncluded a Mozart symp
Handel concerto for two wind o tras, Viotti's twenty-second concerto for violin (Fritz Kreisler) and Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." In none of these is the heavy brass artillery brought into action, but there was abundant opportunity to display the polish and euphony of the famous Boston band. The climax of the concert, it is needless to say, was the Viotti concerto, in which Mr. Kreisler—who got an ovation both before and after playing—was at his very best. He has more than one way of bringing the music of former generations home to modern audiences. He also has, poor man, more than one reason for sadness. The adagio was bathed in tears—more soulful playing has never been heard in a local concert hall. His own cadenza is as splendid an improvisation as his cadenzas in the Beethoven concerto. His playing of it was a bigger advertisement for his Carnegie Hall recital next Sunday afternoon than a whole display page in a daily paper.

G JOURNAL
York City
DEC 6 1915

CHESTRAS IN NCERTS OF WEEK-END

The floods of music that sometimes inundate New York of a week-end surged forth and eddied about the devoted concert-goer on Saturday and Sunday. If he happened to be a choiceful music lover, the several streams offered him plentiful variety. There were no less than five orchestral concerts on the two days, two each of the New York Symphony and Philharmonic orchestras and one of the visiting orchestra from Boston.

To present to the reader any extensive consideration of these five concerts would be manifestly beyond the bounds of newspaper space. It is impossible to do more than indicate some of the significant elements in all this music.

The Boston Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Saturday presented performances of one of the greatest three symphonies of Mozart, that in E flat; a Handel concerto for strings and two wind choirs: the twenty-second concerto for violin and orchestra of Viotti, with Fritz Kriesler as the soloist, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Meeres Stille und Glueckliche Fahrt."

All this, with the exception of the Mendelssohn overture, was eighteenth century music and some of the best of it. Dr. Muck is too much of a thinker and too much the musician with profound sympathies to patronize, even ever so little, the eighteenth century in music. Mozart is accordingly one of the great figures of all time to him. And it was from this viewpoint that the E flat symphony was played.

Mr. Kreisler also has a deep reverence for this music of an earlier day, as some of its forgotten jewels which he has unearthed and again brought out into the sunshine of his art audibly reveal. He knows, moreover, that it is one of the follies of tradition to treat this music solely as having been written merely for its own sake—that is, merely for its odwn of producing beautiful sounds. To have heard him play the slow movement of this concerto of Viotti should have been sufficient to give the lie to any such tradition. A suffusing warmth made the whole work live again with a renewed vitality.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5 - 191
Est

RIVAL SYMPHONISTS GIVE TWO CONCERT

Bostonians Heard in the Afternoo and the Philharmonists in the Evening.

There were several concerts yesterday in Manhattan. Among these the more important were the concert of classical music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, and the first concert of the popular series of the Philharmonic Society given in the same place in the evening.

The Boston Symphonists gave a noble rendering of Handel's concerto in F major. The tranquil beauties of the largo showed the varied and massive powers of the musical intellect of Handel. The symphony was Mozart's in E flat major.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, unrivalled in the rich splendor of his perfect tone and his command over the imagination of his hearers.

The Philharmonic programme included two Beethoven, two Wagner and two Liszt numbers. Mr. Josef Stransky conducted.

Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, with blushing modesty, played three concertos at Hall with the New York Sym-

---

n AMERICAN ess: New York City
d: DEC 6 1915

Boston Symphony Secone Concert Fills Carnegie

Programme Limited to Works by Classic Composers — Fritz Kreisler Again Soloist.

Twice this week Carnegie Hall was filled with the devoted following of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second concert was given yesterday afternoon. For this Dr. Muck arranged a programme that was an absolute contrast to that of Thursday evening. I was limited to works by the classic composers Mozart, Handel, Viotti and Mendelssohn.

Fritz Kneisler was again the soloist (this was his fourth New York appearance in less than a week) and was heard in the solo part in Viotti's Concerto. He has seldom played with more nobility of tone or greater eloquence. In the showy passages his left-hand work was a revelation of peed and accuracy and his bowing as broad and artistic.

The Mozart E flat symphony was read by Dr. Muck and his men with grace, spirit and refinement. In Haendel's concerto for strings and wind choirs the musicians realized much of the original beauty and symmetry of the work through its outline and compass had been changed to fit the requirements of the modern orchestra.

Equally pleasing and delicate was the rendering of Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which closed the concert.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Establi

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

Dr. Muck made an unusual program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given last evening in Carnegie Hall. It comprised only two numbers: Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's concerto for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler. The symphony is long, lasting just over an hour. The audience listened with patience to this work of vast dimensions in length, breadth, and thickness, encouraged, no doubt, by the thought of what was to follow it.

Dr. Muck played it here eight years ago, in his first term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. He is a prophet of Bruckner, who has made extensive propaganda for his symphonies in Europe as well as in this country. So have many others of the most distinguished of modern conductors; and this fact should discourage hasty depreciation of Bruckner's works. Yet they have not hastily been depreciated here, though they have tried the endurance of the public for nearly a generation. When the Seventh Symphony was first played in New York some twenty-eight years ago it was considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, abstruse elaboration. The fifteen brass instruments used in it excited wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as bewilderingly "modern," with Wagnerian tendencies.

His music now seems intelligible enough; it does not persistently ape the Wagnerian idiom, and what he is trying to convey is easy to understand. The trouble with Bruckner does not lie in that direction. It is evident that he was a creative force of undoubted power; but that he had little control, through self-criticism, of his work in symphonic development. Such development he had not mastered; and he had little feeling for the significance or the apt proportions of the symphonic form. The movements of this symphony seem like an elaborate series of genial experiments carried to wearisome lengths, with no certain foresight of the end and no inevitable progress toward that end. There are pages of grandiose and imposing power; passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods, poignant and searching, truly and finely felt.

The opening passages of the first movement, and much in it that follows, have impressiveness; but there are here, as through the whole work, tiresome repetitions, dry and uninteresting details; and the end is a reminder, amusing today, of Bruckner's Wagnerian ardor, so closely does it paraphrase the final scene of "Das Rheingold." The slow movement, interminably and extravagantly prolonged though it is, has true nobility and in its finest moments a deep solemnity. If the succulent portions of the scherzo could be isolated from much husk, they would be enjoyed. The last movement is the weakest, inept in its material and dry in its pretentious learnedness.

This strangely compounded work was heard with more apparent interest than at any previous performance of it here. The performance was superb, devoted on the part of both conductor and players; though some may have questioned whether the scherzo might not have gained by a livelier tempo. There was much applause after the slow movement, and at the end Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and, as he so often does, made his men rise to share the applause with him.

Mr. Kreisler was most enthusiastically welcomed. He played Beethoven's concerto with the profound appreciation of its poetical beauties that has so often marked his performances of it before. It was the performance of a great artist who penetrates the spirit of Beethoven's work and who

---

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Es 1884

BOSTONIANS IN BRUCKNER WORK

Dr. Karl Muck Leads Composition Written in Honor of Richard Wagner.

MEMORIES OF OLD BATTLE

How Hanslick Tried to Destroy Symphonic Champion Advanced by Wagnerites.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

It is a commonplace among observers of human nature that the more abstract a question the more concrete, personal and virulent is the quarrel between those who have ranged themselves on different sides of it. Huxley has told us in a tragic page of the fearful dissensions that rage in the fiery bosoms of entomologists when once there arises a contest among them as to the proper way of classifying the odious insects that form the subject matter of their emulous and impassioned studies.

The calamities and quarrels of musicians are proverbially embittered. We notice this in our own days when an audience at a rehearsal of "Pelleas et Melisande" expressed its sincere variety and discord of opinion in the frank and refreshing terms of a free fight, and again when French appreciations of the melodic beauties of "Lohengrin" expressed themselves odorously and emphatically in the form of the ancient weapon known as "stinkpots" hurled at the heads of the principal performers.

A Laputan Quarr

Fifty years a Laputan qua ly suggestive of the last epi second act of "Die Meister Nurnberg," was proceeding Deutschland." One school of maintained that the touch and of German music burned, an alone, in the noble hand of Wagner, the dramatic musician. element violently denied this, sa the unsullied flame leaped hea from the brazier held in the Johannes Brahms, the absolute m One faction was for the theatre, the other for the concert room.

If you loved Brahms you were supposed to hate Wagner. If you came under the spell of Wagner, you had to put a ban on Brahms. The battle raged inflamed by Hanslick, the Vienna critic, who pursued Wagner with a rancorous hunt of obloquy. He created and sustained the battle, feeling that the proper means of elevating Brahms was to debase Wagner. This demonstrates that Hanslick was a poor critic and a poorer soul. Musically he was a nonentity, though he had literary power enough to wound and impede great men. He used it. One taunt of the Brahmsites, or rather the Hanslickites, stung the Wagnerites to the quick. "Your gang," they halloed, "have no symphonic writers. You all belong to the green room and ballet girl crew. Get one of your Wagner idealists to write a symphony. Symphony! Do you hear? Symphony. Yah!" We know the delicacies of internal Teutonic controversy. Imagine the flight of technical Billingsgate.

Wagnerian Symphonist.

The Wagnerites duly brought forward their symphonist. He was Anton Bruckner, whose Seventh was played last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston musicians led by Dr. Karl Muck. Bruckner was a starving village schoolmaster, who had studied music with opportunity so maimed and deferred that when late in life he tried to play upon the great organ in the Albert Hall, London, he found himself hampered and bewildered by the luxurious complexity of the mechanism. In physical appearance and bearing he must have been among the fashionable and intellectual musicians of the concert halls of Vienna, what Tom Pinch was among the spruce lawyers of the Temple. The uncouth, homely figure was such as to cause laughter among the ill-bred. He spoke with the dialect and ungainly utterance of what he was—a peasant. But whatever was his exterior, it clothed a soul of music.

An Ugly Duckling.

Bruckner was the ugly duckling who turned out a swan. He idolized Wagner, and thought he saw a way of applying Wagner's ideals to the unsupported and unillustrated music of the concert-room. The Brahmsites—though Brahms took no share in the ignoble cry—saw that the village organist had genius as a composer, and they set out to destroy him. Hanslick got Von Buelow sneering and the women spitting. The calling of the critic is at most an asinine and otiose one; but it is never so bloedsinnige as when the writer lends himself and his pen to the sinister purposes of crazy faction.

The opposition of Hanslick to Wagner is the supreme jest of musical history. Wagner had his revenge full and sweet. The Viennese intrigue against Bruckner is not such agreeable reading. Bruckner was poor, struggling, humble and gifted. Hanslick, who was the powerful leader of a rich and insolent musical rabble, even fought against his appointment to some miserable teaching post. The story is pathetic, squalid, showing the meanness of human nature.

The Seventh Symphony is supposed to be written in honor of Wagner. The celebrated adagio is a sort of anticipatory elegy on him whom Bruckner loved to call master. I say anticipatory, because it was written several months before Wagner died at Venice. It must be regarded, however, as its writer wished it to be regarded, as the dirge on the death of his ideal.

Nothing finer than Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Adagio of this work has been heard in many years. The movement has been described as the monument of its creator. Were it possible to solidify the main features of Mr. Muck's version of the Adagio into the durable lineaments of stone, his expression so recorded of the austere beauties of this symphony might be made a fitting memorial to Dr. Muck himself.

On the conclusion of the Bruckner work, the noble episodes of which are the plenary apology for its length and discursiveness, Fritz Kreisler played the Beethoven violin concerto.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 1915
Establis

Orchestral Concerts.

Dr. Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a most enjoyable concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, although (to some, no doubt, because) the programme was entirely old-fashioned. It included a Mozart symphony, a Handel concerto for two wind orchestras, Viotti's twenty-second concerto for violin (Fritz Kreisler) and Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." In none of these is the heavy brass artillery brought into action, but there was abundant opportunity to display the polish and euphony of the famous Boston band. The climax of the concert, it is needless to say, was the Viotti concerto, in which Mr. Kreisler—who got an ovation both before and after playing—was at his very best. He has more than one way of bringing the music of former generations home to modern audiences. He also has, poor man, more than one reason for sadness. The adagio was bathed in tears—more soulful playing has never been heard in a local concert hall. His own cadenza is as splendid an improvisation as his cadenzas in the Beethoven concerto. His playing of it was a bigger advertisement for his Carnegie Hall recital next Sunday afternoon than a whole display page in a daily paper.

G JOURNAL
York City
DEC 6 1915

CHESTRAS IN NCERTS OF WEEK-END

The floods of music that sometimes inundate New York of a week-end surged forth and eddied about the devoted concert-goer on Saturday and Sunday. If he happened to be a choiceful music lover, the several streams offered him plentiful variety. There were no less than five orchestral concerts on the two days, two each of the New York Symphony and Philharmonic orchestras and one of the visiting orchestra from Boston.

To present to the reader any extensive consideration of these five concerts would be manifestly beyond the bounds of newspaper space. It is impossible to do more than indicate some of the significant elements in all this music.

The Boston Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, on Saturday presented performances of one of the greatest three symphonies of Mozart, that in E flat; a Handel concerto for strings and two wind choirs: the twenty-second concerto for violin and orchestra of Viotti, with Fritz Kriesler as the soloist, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Meeres Stille und Glueckliche Fahrt."

All this, with the exception of the Mendelssohn overture, was eighteenth century music and some of the best of it. Dr. Muck is too much of a thinker and too much the musician with profound sympathies to patronize, even ever so little, the eighteenth century in music. Mozart is accordingly one of the great figures of all time to him. And it was from this viewpoint that the E flat symphony was played.

Mr. Kreisler also has a deep reverence for this music of an earlier day, as some of its forgotten jewels which he has unearthed and again brought out into the sunshine of his art audibly reveal. He knows, moreover, that it is one of the follies of tradition to treat this music solely as having been written merely for its own sake—that is, merely for its odwn of producing beautiful sounds. To have heard him play the slow movement of this concerto of Viotti should have been sufficient to give the lie to any such tradition. A suffusing warmth made the whole work live again with a renewed vitality.

RNING TELEGRAPH
New York City
DEC 5 - 19

L SYMPHONISTS GIVE TWO CONCERT

ians Heard in the Afterno d the Philharmonists in the Evening.

There were several concerts yesterday in Manhattan. Among these the more important were the concert of classical music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, and the first concert of the popular series of the Philharmonic Society given in the same place in the evening.

The Boston Symphonists gave a noble rendering of Handel's concerto in F major. The tranquil beauties of the largo showed the varied and massive powers of the musical intellect of Handel. The symphony was Mozart's in E flat major.

The soloist was Mr. Fritz Kreisler, unrivalled in the rich splendor of his perfect tone and his command over the imagination of his hearers.

The Philharmonic programme included two Beethoven, two Wagner and two Liszt numbers. Mr. Josef Stransky conducted.

Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, with blushing modesty, played three concertos at Hall with the New York Sym-

---

n AMERICAN
ress: New York City
DEC 1915
ed:

Boston Symphony Secone Concert Fills Carnegie

Programme Limited to Works by Classic Composers — Fritz Kreisler Again Soloist.

Twice this week Carnegie Hall was filled with the devoted following of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second concert was given yesterday afternoon. For this Dr. Muck arranged a programme that was an absolute contrast to that of Thursday evening. I was limited to works by the classic composers Mozart, Handel, Viotti and Mendelssohn.

Fritz Kneisler was again the soloist (this was his fourth New York appearance in less than a week) and was heard in the solo part in Viotti's Concerto. He has seldom played with more nobility of tone or greater eloquence. In the showy passages his left-hand work was a revelation of eed and accuracy and his bowing as broad and artistic.

The Mozart E flat symphony was read by Dr. Muck and his men with grace, spirit and refinement. In Haendel's concerto for strings and wind choirs the musicians realized much of the original beauty and symmetry of the work through its outline and compass had been changed to fit the requirements of the modern orchestra.

Equally pleasing and delicate was the rendering of Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which closed the concert.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5 - 1915
Establ 84

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony and Philharmonic play—Mr. Hutcheson in Concertos.

There were three orchestral concerts in town yesterday: an unusual number for a week day, even in New York; today, being Sunday, there will be four. At Carnegie Hall, in the afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its second appearance on its present visit. Also in the afternoon Mr. Ernest Hutcheson gave an ambitious concert in Aeolian Hall, at which he had the assistance of the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Damrosch. The Philharmonic Society, in the evening, gave the first of a series of popular concerts, under Mr. Stransky's direction. All these concerts had large audiences.

Dr. Muck put before his afternoon subscribers a program of eighteenth and early nineteenth century music: Mozart's symphony in E flat, Händel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras; Mr. Fritz Kreisler played Viotti's twenty-second concerto in A minor, for violin, which was followed by Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," (a title which is an exacter translation of the original than the one usually given, but which smacks more of German than of English.) Mozart's symphony was beautifully played with an elastic rhythm and with exquisite translucency and beauty of tone; and the vital spirit of the work that has touched it with immortality was caught and embodied in the performance.

The concerto by Händel is a stately and noble specimen of his style. Five of the nine movements of the original are given in Kogel's arrangement which was used. If there was thinness in the original score, Mr. Kogel has seen to it that there is none in his edition, and there was splendid richness in the sound of the orchestra. Passages of obbligato for two oboes and for two horns were both exquisitely played, and Dr. Muck at the close of the movements in which they occurred had the players rise and appropriate a due measure of the applause for themselves.

Mr. Freisler's playing of Viotti's concerto was wholly appropriate to the style of the composition in its simplicity, dignity, and breadth, and yet there were not excluded warmth and sympathetic expression, especially in the adagio, that were found especially appealing. The cadenza for the slow movement made great use of the passages in thirds that abound in the movement, and was much liked.

From SUN
Address: New York City
Date
Es k, 1884

ANCIENT MUSIC BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Diagrams Not Needed by Harmony Lovers to Enjoy Dr. Muck's Programme.

FRITZ KREISLER PLAYS

The programme arranged by Dr. Carl Muck for the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was delightful. It comprised Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's concerto in F major for strings and wind, Viotti's A minor violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." The solo player in the Viotti work was Fritz Kreisler, who had already appeared with the orchestra at its Thursday evening concert, playing the Beethoven concerto.

Yesterday's programme had the value created by homogeneity of character. Up to the Mendelssohn composition it consisted of eighteenth century productions in the field of absolute music, while the overture, although entering the domain of the delineative, comes down to us from a time when tone painting preserved its primitive thought and object and did not seek to steep itself in philosophy or ethics.

One could listen to this music without beginning a struggle to find out what it all meant. It was not necessary to read Nietzsche before going to the concert nor to acquaint one's self with that new law of harmony which abolishes all the others. One could sit in the serene enjoyment of pure beauty in sounds.

Listening to such works the concertgoer could be ready to agree with Dr. Hanslick's view that music expresses nothing at all and is beautiful just because it is beautiful. And what is more one who has had to wrestle with several hundred scores of problem music could be glad that in order to understand this programme it was necessary, as it was for Lady Sapphir harkening to Bunthorne's poetry, "to think of nothing at all."

All the music was beautifully played. But without doubt the highest mark of the afternoon was reached in Mr. Kreisler's performance of the slow movement of the Viotti concerto. The movement is in itself one of those simple, flowing, unstrained songs which so many of the earlier writers for the violin turned out. No mighty music, perhaps, but then neither are all Schubert's songs mighty. Music is not all Alps. It has its sunny valleys, and even its violets.

Viotti's adagio is something very gentle, tender and lovable, and its classic purity of style is fragile and easily spoiled. Mr. Kreisler, as is his habit in dealing with the music of the old masters, let the song sing itself. His delivery of it was continent, reverent and affectionate. He played the whole concerto like the great master that he is, but this adagio was a thing to cherish in the memory.

Nor must the delightful virtuosity and

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5 - 1915
E k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS AGAIN

Mozart and Handel on Classic Programme—Mr. Kreisler Again Appears.

A very different atmosphere permeated yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony than the one that hung over its predecessor on Friday night. From Bruckner Conductor Muck had turned to Mozart, and many must have considered the journey one from gloom to sunlight. No matter what Major Higginson's band elects to play, Carnegie Hall is invariably found sold out, so as far as the size of the audience is concerned there was yesterday no variation. The Mozart work was the symphony in E flat major (K. 543), and in it the great orchestra was at its best.

Dr. Muck is never more pleasing than when he essays the classics, and his reading of the symphony yesterday possessed all his usual poise, balance and fine dynamic adjustment. It was an exquisitely polished, an exquisitely articulated performance. The same praise must be given to the Handel Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras.

The solo performer was again Mr. Kreisler, who chose this time the Viotti Concerto in A minor, No. 22. The famous violinist was quite at his best, and both in technical mastery and in richness of tone he proved himself the master that he is. The concluding number was the Mendelssohn overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." Whatever adverse comment might be made of a programme so alike in spirit as was yesterday's, it at least possessed the merit of being one in which each of its component parts was of pure beauty. Variety in an afternoon's entertainment does not appear to appeal to Dr. Muck.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date DEC 5
Establisl

Dr. Muck's Men Join in Applause for Mr. Kreisler

Violinist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Fairly Outdoes Himself at Concert.

Like a trip to an antiquarian's was yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall, when Dr. Karl Muck conducted a programme of music, most of which was centuries old. Mozart, Handel and Viotti represented the eighteenth century, while the nearest approach to the music of to-day was Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which was the youngest member of this party, being only a century old.

The afternoon's soloist was Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who appeared for the second time this week with the orchestra, and yesterday played the Viotta A minor concerto with nobility of tone, artistic dignity and compelling sentiment. The adagio was interpreted wonderfully, its sentimental beauty never exaggerated and the technical difficulties of both the opening movement and the finale were mastered so easily that they appeared to be child's play to the violinist. Small wonder that the audience kept calling him out time and time again, while a large share of the applause came from the members of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck's men began the programme with Mozart's E flat symphony, excellently played and of such a purity of style that it sounded a model bit of virtuoso ensemble playing. Then came a andel F major concerto for strings and d orchestras, in which the solo work he orchestra's "firsts" was remark-
Finally there was heard the Men-overture, also well played, and audience reluctantly filed out.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Establ 84

Music.

The Boston Symphony Plays Bruckner.

The bugbear of symphony concert audiences in New York is Anton Bruckner. I can understand certain reasons why he might be, but let us not forget that in the eighties (or was it the nineties?) the sapient Philip Hale declared that the red lamps in the old Boston Music Hall meant "exit in case of Brahms." It is not given to every composer of music to write like Tschaikowsky or Victor Herbert. Bach could not tickle the ears in just that way; neither could Anton Bruckner. I have no quarrel with people who know the music of Bruckner and dislike it, but I have a quarrel with the people that dislike it before they have listened to it. Personally I am more curious about Bruckner than about any composer not now living. The "antis" would prevent my gratifying my very legitimate curiosity. Fortunately for me certain exceedingly important conductors have been on my side—the late Theodore Thomas, Max Fiedler, Mr. Stransky, Dr. Muck might without inaccuracy be termed Brucknerites.

Dr. Muck in particular is stiff-necked in his generation. Heaven knows I have fought his programme-making often enough! Let me now publicly rejoice that he dared put a Bruckner symphony on the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, and let all those who shy at music that is unfamiliar or hard-shelled, or less voluptuous to sink your eye-teeth into than a bar of the fattest nougat, regard the feast he, in compensation, has spread for their joy to-morrow. Mozart, Handel, Viotti, Mendelssohn, all heaped into one delirious December afternoon! And in so saying I at the same time warn any and all and sundry that Mozart remains the first article of my musical creed!

I remember a performance of Bruckner's eighth symphony, directed by Max Fiedler, which converted me if not to Bruckner at least to Bruckner's eighth symphony. I once spoke of the eighth symphony to Mr. Stransky, and he treated its beauty, its charm even, as the tritest matter of course. I wish he would put it on a Philharmonic programme. The symphony performed last night is the seventh, which Brucknerites regard, I understand, as its author's masterpiece. There are unmistakable drawbacks to the enjoyment of this symphony—pages that are merely pedantic, pages that are simple garrulity, pages that are to music—as M. Saint-Saëns once said of certain things in Wagner—what pickles are to cookery. The scherzo has been termed "ugly." I noticed that it was received with more applause than any other movement by the great audience, which as a whole received the symphony rather coldly.

But I did feel sincerely last night that the symphony was worth sitting through in all its excessive length for the sake of the genuine, the great beauties it contains which the world could not afford to leave unheard. Nor is Bruckner without classical support in his predicament. We all submit to the bad in Schumann's symphonies for the sake of the good. Has not our fellow-townsman, Mr. H. T. Finck, contested the right of the finale of Beethoven's violin concerto to a place in a concert of serious music? Are there not those (I am not of them!) who find Schubert's symphony in C major too long? In at least four symphonies out of Beethoven's nine we sit through pages that are hopelessly antiquated, moribund, for the sake of others imperishable in their beauty.

The opening of Bruckner's symphony as sung by the Boston band last night struck me as one of the most thrillingly beautiful pages in all symphonic music. And there is many another page of compelling beauty in this long work. Nor are they confined to the opening and to the adagio, which in Europe has attained even a certain celebrity. Dr. Muck evidently conducted the symphony with all the lavish care of a deep affection. The performance by the orchestra was in the main superb. A conspicuous slip on the part of a horn merely proved this miraculous band is human.

I have spoken of the reception by the audience as rather cold. There was, indeed, applause enough at the end to give Dr. Muck an excuse for summoning his men to rise and share the glory with their conductor. But this rising of orchestras to their feet, once a rarity, is so common now as to have become meaningless. The applause that makes your ear-drums tingle broke out when Mr. Kreisler appeared on the stage.

Mr. Kreisler elected to be heard in the Beethoven violin concerto, the work whose finale Mr. Finck once condemned. Mr. Kreisler is one of the most admired exponents of this concerto. He began to play last night roughly and nervously, but soon he recovered his poise and thenceforth he played superbly. The deafening applause his performance elicited was quite deserved. The symphony and the concerto made the whole of the programme, and no one can complain that the concert was short.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 - 1915

Music.

Two Busy Days in the Field of Music.

All those who sputtered at Dr. Muck because he put a Bruckner symphony on the programme of the Boston orchestra's concert Thursday night had a chance to soothe their outraged notions Saturday afternoon, for nothing more decorous and doctorial ever came out of Dr. Primrose's own academy than the programme Dr. Muck set before the audience that filled Carnegie Hall for the matinée concert of his orchestra. There were no indurated nuts to crack, no hyperacid harmonies to digest. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's F major concerto for strings and wind, the A minor violin concerto of Viotti (with Fritz Kreisler as soloist), and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture—all eighteenth century music except the overture, which almost is.

Not a number on this programme as performed on Saturday but was in itself a sheer delight. But the combination! Myriad are the ways of dichotomizing the universe. One sundering rock is Dr. Muck's Saturday programme. To one side streams the swarm of those that found in it a source of delirious joy; to the other, those that mournfully admit the collocation of all those just things became long before the concert was over a veritable burden to the flesh.

so superb that silence would be an indiscretion.

The Hippodrome with Sousa's Band, Miss Belle Storey, and Orville Harrold; the Metropolitan Opera House with Mrs. Garrison, Miss Braslau, Mr. Damacco, and Mr. Amato, and the Princess Theatre with Gaston M. Déthier and Edouard Déthier in sonatas for piano and violin offered concert-goers a variety of entertainment last evening.

PITTS SANBORN.

EVENING POST
New York City
DEC 3 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

Whenever Fritz Kreisler plays the Beethoven concerto—he did it in Carnegie Hall last night, with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one recalls an incident in the life of Joseph Joachim which is characteristic of that strictly classical and "objective" violinist. He had composed his own cadenza for the first movement of this concerto (as most public players do), and there was so much comment on this achievement—all of it favorable—that he refused to play it afterwards, on the ground that he did not want musical folk to talk more about his cadenza than about Beethoven's work itself. It ought to have occurred to him that the concerto was already old in his day and little more to be said about it, whereas his cadenza was new and therefore properly a subject of discussion.

Fritz Kreisler is neither as o nor as foolish as was Joachim. of praise have been written and of his two cadenzas for this c which are even more splendid th chim's—entrancing improvisations melodies of the concerto; yet he calmly—or rather passionately— them, doubtless because he has a tion that Beethoven is able to hold even if now taken for granted a out much comment. To be sure, would resent the accusation that cadenza is really the best thin whole concerto; but every time o it, one is more impressed with the fact that it really is so. Beethoven was not vain or jealous. Had he heard Fritz Kreisler play that concerto, he would have gladly admitted that this great Viennese violinist had provided the climax for the whole work.

Last night it was not this part of the work in which Kreisler was at his best as it is usually. Nor ,in fact, in the more brilliant parts of Beethoven's noble work. It was in the slow movement that he excelled. Rarely has this been played with such melting tenderness. The cadenza in the final movement impressed itself especially on his hearers, for its wonderful beauty. The first cadenza has almost overshadowed it heretofore, but in this second cadenza Kreisler has taken material which is far inferior in value to that of the first movement and lifted it to the level of the remainder of the concerto. That is an achievement without precedent.

The only other work on yesterday's programme was Bruckner's seventh symphony, yet the performance lasted an hour and fifty minutes. Bruckner's symphonies are long—too long—and inspired only in spots. The gem of the seventh is the solemn adagio. This is a sort of dirge, supposed to have been inspired by the thought that Wagner, whom Bruckner adored, was near the end of his life. It was played as a dirge after Bruckner's own death. It is certainly one of his best movements, and the Boston Orchestra played it most impressively. There are some singularly beautiful moments in this slow movement, especially the opening, the beautiful first melody given to the violins, the magnificent crescendo toward the end, and the superb brass effects in which Bruckner revels. These frequently resemble Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz, too, are suggested, the latter in the scherzo, and Liszt in the finale. The pathos of Bruckner's struggles against poverty and musical enmity make one feel lenient in criticism of his work, even though he cannot suffer any more from adverse criticism; but the fact remains that the beauty spots in this symphony are few and far between, and separated by arid stretches of mere notes.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 3 - 191

PROF. WELCH ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, was the subject of a lecture recital given last evening by Prof. Roy Dickinson Welch, of Smith College, at the Academy under Brooklyn Institute auspices. The programme is of four numbers, Mozart's E flat major symphony and Brahms' D major violin concerto, representing absolute music, and Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," composed to a picture by Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," inspired by Goethe's poem, examples of programme music.

The first movement of the symsymphony, said Prof. Welch, is a survival of the slow introductions of the Italian opera that gave the audience time to get settled in their seats. It is built of very slender material, he declared, but it shows admirably Mozart's delicate touch. The second movement he called a work created not merely for one generation, but for all time.

In considering the Brahms concerto which Kriesler will play tonight, Prof. Welch said Brahms had put all his ideas into the introduction. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of the composer, throwing off the melodic idea into the complex shifting of rhythm. Then follows a profound slow movement, and the last movement gives the Brahms of Hungarian dances, with vigorous movement, alternating for violin and orchestra.

Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said; it is almost gay in contrast to Rachmaninoff's tone poem, which reveals a freer use of dissonance that Mendelssohn never thought of using. In this way Rachmaninoff gave tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of.

From EAGLE
Address klyn, N. Y.
Date 3 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Professor Welch Analyzes Programme of Concert to be Played Tonight.

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening, at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, with the violinist, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, was considered in detail in a lecture recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, last evening, by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch of Smith College. He spoke of absolute music, in one group, and programme music, in the second group, the symphony and concerto being in the first group, the tone [illegible] in the second. Mozart's

Symphony— [illegible] said, the finish and polish needful for the time of powdered wigs and brocades. He took up the different movements and played the outlines of the themes. After the introduction, he said, Mozart turned to idealizing the dance and gave it infinite grace and beauty. The "Minuetto" is a dance, from start to finish, and the "Finale" has almost continuous single melody.

In considering the Brahms' D Major Concerto, which Kreisler will play with the orchestra, Professor Welch said that Brahms has put all his ideas in the work into the introduction, and the lecturer illustrated on the piano the growth of one figure td another. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of Brahms. Then follows a profound, slow movement, while the last movement shows the Brahms of the Hungarion dances.

The two pieces of programme music, Rachmaniniff's "The Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem composed to the picture by Boecklin, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," composed to Goethe's poem, represent the beginning and the end of the nineteenth century. Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said. It is almost gay, when contrasted with Rachmaninoff's tone poem. Rachmaninoff gives tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of. Professor Welch played the themes, which, he said, are bits of scales, fragmentary ideas, presented in dissonant relation to the background. But Rachmaninoff achieved [illegible] climax, the last part

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 4 - 1915

KREISLER PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO

Great Violinist Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

NIGHT OF SUPREME THINGS.

"Island of the Dead" Given Here for First Time.

It was a night of supreme things, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, for not only was "the perfect orchestra" playing, but there was Fritz Kreisler, the greatest violinist of the day, and Conductor Dr. Karl Muck had arranged a programme of four masterpieces. Again the house was crowded with Brooklyn's most fashionable audience and the long line of limousines outside the opera house duplicated the crush of opera nights.

Dr. Muck's programme was the first in many moons that gave unalloyed delight. It opened with Mozart's E-flat major symphony, one of the three great symphonies, by the most graceful of composers, and one that has been heard but infrequently of late. After the intermission gave the audience a chance for spiritual readjustment, so that the leap from the paint and powder period to the present day was not accompanied by the horrible jolt that Dr. Muck has been accustomed to inflict upon his audiences, a symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by the Russian, Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, was heard in Brooklyn for the first time. There followed Brahms' concerto in D major for the violin, played by Kreisler, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" completed the programme.

It is a long time since the orchestra was heard to better advantage in the Brooklyn concerts. Its pure singing tone and its superb balance were used by Dr. Muck with that finesse and excellent musicianship that has won him such admiration.

But it was the violin concerto that the audience felt the thrill of real genius. The concerto was written by Brahms for his friend, Josef Joachim, but it is reported that even Joachim found great difficulty in laying it, for the technical diffi ulties are overwhelming. But these ifficulties were as non-existent last ight. Kreisler gave its most beau ful tone to every note; there was ot a hint of a blur in the most illiant passages. At the end of e first movement he introduced a o-string cadenza of his own that me as a blaze of fire in the pas al setting of Brahms. In the ro ntic second movement, intro ced by an oboe solo that was yed in splendid fashion, the etic quality in Kreisler's playing s heard in all its richness, and in finale, the player fairly dazzled h his brilliancy. He was re led many times, the usually undemonstrative Boston Symphony audience giving him an ovation.

Almost as much enthusiasm was stirred by the Rachmaninoff tone [illegible] and the whole orchestra had to make a bow at its conclusion. The composition is a wonderful piece of programme music, and more than that, for the programme is quite unnecessary for the comprehension of the music. It opens with what has been described as "the tranquil lapping of the waters that surround the Island of the Dead," and works up to an inspired climax, inspired partly by the "love-death" from "Tristan and Isolde," with its

---

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 4 1915

Music Notes.

KREISLER WITH MUCK'S MEN.

Master Violinist Given Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist in the Brahms' Concerto in D major.

The orchestral numbers were Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, Rachmaninoff's Symphonie Poem, "The Island of the Dead," suggested by the painting of Arnold Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea Calm and a Prosperous Voyage."

The chief interest of the evening naturally centred in Mr. Kreisler's reading of the Brahms' Concerto, The absence in this work of any passages written for mere effect, the fact that it is to be judged solely as a composition, not as a means of display, and its tremendous difficulties both of technique and interpretation have placed this concerto beyond the range and capabilities of any but the truly great artists.

Mr. Kreisler's reading was distinguished by clarity of exposition, breadth and nobility of conception, and command of all the nuances of exquisite tone production; Suave and melodic in the broad theme of the first movement, in the adagio infused by a gentle pathos, especially in the romantic ending of the movement when the syncopated rhythm produces almost the effect, in the solo instrument, of sobbing, as of grief for some absent friend, and in the final allegro, with its unmistakable Hungarian rhythm, a tone brilliant and jocose, and of exquisite beauty.

The Mozart Symphony under Dr. Muck's leadership was a triumph of grace and beauty in sound. It kas a far cry from the gay, and impersonal music of Mozart to the gloomy, but strikingly effective tone painting of the modern Russian, and Dr. Muck is a master in contrasts. The symphonic poem of Rachmaninoff is well worth a frequent hearing. It is rich in modern orchestral effects, the mood is further enhanced by a suggestion of the Dies Irae, the work rises at times to tremendous climaxes, and at the beginning and at the close there is admirable tone painting of the "tranquil lapping of the water that surrounds the Island of the Dead."

Dr. Muck and his men were compelled to rise in acknowledgement of the applause with which the performance was received.

The concert closed with Mendelssohn's sunny and familiar overture. Its obvious frankness, and the solos and trumpet calls when the good ship ends its prosperous voyage, dismissed the good humor.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 29. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting, and, at the same time, the most pathetic figure in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna for 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where he lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let his hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Doctor Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September 1881 and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was, in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Doctor Muck conducted it. Doctor Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three quarters.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 - 19

Music.

Two Busy Days in the Field of Music.

All those who sputtered at Dr. Muck because he put a Bruckner symphony on the programme of the Boston orchestra's concert Thursday night had a chance to soothe their outraged notions Saturday afternoon, for nothing more decorous and doctorial ever came out of Dr. Primrose's own academy than the programme Dr. Muck set before the audience that filled Carnegie Hall for the matinée concert of his orchestra. There were no indurated nuts to crack, no hyperacid harmonies to digest. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's F major concerto for strings and wind, the A minor violin concerto of Viotti (with Fritz Kreisler as soloist), and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture—all eighteenth century music except the overture, which almost is.

Not a number on this programme as performed on Saturday but was in itself a sheer delight. But the combination! Myriad are the ways of dichotomizing the universe. One sundering rock is Dr. Muck's Saturday programme. To one side streams the swarm of those that found in it a source of delirious joy; to the other, those that mournfully admit the collocation of all those just things became long before the concert was over a veritable burden to the flesh.

so superb that silence would be an indiscretion.

The Hippodrome with Sousa's Band, Miss Belle Storey, and Orville Harrold; the Metropolitan Opera House with Mrs. Garrison, Miss Braslau, Mr. Damacco, and Mr. Amato, and the Princess Theatre with Gaston M. Déthier and Edouard Déthier in sonatas for piano and violin offered concert-goers a variety of entertainment last evening.

PITTS SANBORN.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC

PROF. WELCH ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, was the subject of a lecture recital given last evening by Prof. Roy Dickinson Welch, of Smith College, at the Academy under Brooklyn Institute auspices. The programme is of four numbers, Mozart's E flat major symphony and Brahms' D major violin concerto, representing absolute music, and Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," composed to a picture by Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," inspired by Goethe's poem, examples of programme music.

The first movement of the symsymphony; said Prof. Welch, is a survival of the slow introductions of the Italian opera that gave the audience time to get settled in their seats. It is built of very slender material, he declared, but it shows admirably Mozart's delicate touch. The second movement he called a work created not merely for one generation, but for all time.

In considering the Brahms concerto which Kriesler will play tonight, Prof. Welch said Brahms had put all his ideas into the introduction. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of the composer throwing off the melodic idea into the complex shifting of rhythm. Then follows a profound slow movement, and the last movement gives the Brahms of Hungarian dances, with vigorous movement, alternating for violin and orchestra.

Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said; it is almost gay in contrast to Rachmaninoff's tone poem, which reveals a freer use of dissonance that Mendelssohn ever thought of using. In this way Rachmaninoff gave tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of.

EVENING POST
New York City
DEC 3 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

Whenever Fritz Kreisler plays the Beethoven concerto—he did it in Carnegie Hall last night, with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one recalls an incident in the life of Joseph Joachim which is characteristic of that strictly classical and "objective" violinist. He had composed his own cadenza for the first movement of this concerto (as most public players do), and there was so much comment on this achievement—all of it favorable—that he refused to play it afterwards, on the ground that he did not want musical folk to talk more about his cadenza than about Beethoven's work itself. It ought to have occurred to him that the concerto was already old in his day and little more to be said about it, whereas his cadenza was new and therefore properly a subject of discussion.

Fritz Kreisler is neither as ol nor as foolish as was Joachim. V of praise have been written and
of his two cadenzas for this c
which are even more splendid th
chim's—entrancing improvisations
melodies of the concerto; yet he calmly—or rather passionately—
them, doubtless because he has a tion that Beethoven is able to hold even if now taken for granted a
out much comment. To be sure, would resent the accusation that cadenza is really the best thing whole concerto; but every time o
it, one is more impressed with the fact that it really is so. Beethoven was not vain or jealous. Had he heard Fritz Kreisler play that concerto, he would have gladly admitted that this great Viennese violinist had provided the climax for the whole work.

Last night it was not this part of the work in which Kreisler was at his best as it is usually. Nor, in fact, in the more brilliant parts of Beethoven's noble work. It was in the slow movement that he excelled. Rarely has this been played with such melting tenderness. The cadenza in the final movement impressed itself especially on his hearers for its wonderful beauty. The first cadenza has almost overshadowed it heretofore, but in this second cadenza Kreisler has taken material which is far inferior in value to that of the first movement and lifted it to the level of the remainder of the concerto. That is an achievement without precedent.

The only other work on yesterday's programme was Bruckner's seventh symphony, yet the performance lasted an hour and fifty minutes. Bruckner's symphonies are long—too long—and inspired only in spots. The gem of the seventh is the solemn adagio. This is a sort of dirge, supposed to have been inspired by the thought that Wagner, whom Bruckner adored, was near the end of his life. It was played as a dirge after Bruckner's own death. It is certainly one of his best movements, and the Boston Orchestra played it most impressively. There are some singularly beautiful moments in this slow movement, especially the opening, the beautiful first melody given to the violins, the magnificent crescendo toward the end, and the superb brass effects in which Bruckner revels. These frequently resemble Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz, too, are suggested, the latter in the scherzo, and Liszt in the finale. The pathos of Bruckner's struggles against poverty and musical enmity make one feel lenient in criticism of his work, even though he cannot suffer any more from adverse criticism; but the fact remains that the beauty spots in this symphony are few and far between, and separated by arid stretches of mere notes.

From EAGLE
Address lyn, N. Y.
Date 3 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Professor Welch Analyzes Programme of Concert to be Played Tonight.

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening, at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, with the violinist, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, was considered in detail in a lecture recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, last evening, by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch of Smith College. He spoke of absolute music, in one group, and programme music, in the second group, the symphony and concerto being in the first group, the tone poems in the second. Mozart's Symphony [illegible] he said, the finish and polish needful for the time of powdered wigs and brocades. He took up the different movements and played the outlines of the themes. After the introduction, he said, Mozart turned to idealizing the dance and gave it infinite grace and beauty. The "Minuetto" is a dance, from start to finish, and the "Finale" has almost continuous single melody.

In considering the Brahms' D Major Concerto, which Kreisler will play with the orchestra, Professor Welch said that Brahms has put all his ideas in the work into the introduction, and the lecturer illustrated on the piano the growth of one figure td another. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of Brahms. Then follows a profound, slow movement, while the last movement shows the Brahms of the Hungarion dances.

The two pieces of programme music, Rachmaniniff's "The Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem composed to the picture by Boecklin, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," composed to Goethe's poem, represent the beginning and the end of the nineteenth century. Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said. It is almost gay, when contrasted with Rachmaninoff's tone poem. Rachmaninoff gives tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of. Professor Welch played the themes, which, he said, are bits of scales, fragmentary ideas, presented in dissonant relation to the background. But Rachmaninoff achieved [illegible] climax, the last part

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 4 1915

KREISLER PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO

Great Violinist Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

NIGHT OF SUPREME THINGS.

"Island of the Dead" Given Here for First Time.

It was a night of supreme things, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, for not only was "the perfect orchestra" playing, but there was Fritz Kreisler, the greatest violinist of the day, and Conductor Dr. Karl Muck had arranged a programme of four masterpieces. Again the house was crowded with Brooklyn's most fashionable audience and the long line of limousines outside the opera house duplicated the crush of opera nights.

Dr. Muck's programme was the first in many moons that gave unalloyed delight. It opened with Mozart's E-flat major symphony, one of the three great symphonies, by the most graceful of composers, and one that has been heard but infrequently of late. After the intermission gave the audience a chance for spiritual readjustment, so that the leap from the paint and powder period to the present day was not accompanied by the horrible jolt that Dr. Muck has been accustomed to inflict upon his audiences, a symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by the Russian, Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, was heard in Brooklyn for the first time. There followed Brahms' concerto in D major for the violin, played by Kreisler, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" completed the programme.

It is a long time since the orchestra was heard to better advantage in the Brooklyn concerts. Its pure singing tone and its superb balance were used by Dr. Muck with that finesse and excellent musicianship that has won him such admiration.

But it was the violin concerto that the audience felt the thrill of real genius. The concerto was written by Brahms for his friend, Josef Joachim, but it is reported that even 'oachim found great difficulty in laying it, for the technical difficulties are overwhelming. But these ifficulties were as non-existent last ight. Kreisler gave its most beauful tone to every note; there was ot a hint of a blur in the most illiant passages. At the end of e first movement he introduced a o-string cadenza of his own that me as a blaze of fire in the pasral setting of Brahms. In the rontic second movement, introced by an oboe solo that was yed in splendid fashion, the etic quality in Kreisler's playing s heard in all its richness, and in e finale, the player fairly dazzled h his brilliancy. He was reled many times, the usually undemonstrative Boston Symphony audience giving him an ovation.

Almost as much enthusiasm was stirred by the Rachmaninoff tone poem and the whole orchestra had to make a bow at its conclusion. The composition is a wonderful piece of programme music, and more than that, for the programme is quite unnecessary for the comprehension of the music. It opens with what has been described as "the tranquil lapping of the waters that surround the Island of the Dead," and works up to an inspired climax, inspired partly by the "love-death" from "Tristan and Isolde," with its glorious soaring

---

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
1915

Music Notes.

KREISLER WITH MUCK'S MEN.

Master Violinist Given Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist in the Brahms' Concerto in D major.

The orchestral numbers were Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, Rachmaninoff's Symphonie Poem, "The Island of the Dead," suggested by the painting of Arnold Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea Calm and a Prosperous Voyage."

The chief interest of the evening naturally centred in Mr. Kreisler's reading of the Brahms' Concerto, The absence in this work of any passages written for mere effect, the fact that it is to be judged solely as a composition, not as a means of display, and its tremendous difficulties both of technique and interpretation have placed this concerto beyond the range and capabilities of any but the truly great artists.

Mr. Kreisler's reading was distinguished by clarity of exposition, breadth and nobility of conception, and command of all the nuances of exquisite tone production; Suave and melodic in the broad theme of the first movement, in the adagio infused by a gentle pathos, especially in the romantic ending of the movement when the syncopated rhythm produces almost the effect, in the solo instrument, of sobbing, as of grief for some absent friend, and in the final allegro, with its unmistakable Hungarian rhythm, a tone brilliant and jocose, and of exquisite beauty.

The Mozart Symphony under Dr. Muck's leadership was a triumph of grace and beauty in sound. It kas a far cry from the gay, and impersonal music of Mozart to the gloomy, but strikingly effective tone painting of the modern Russian, and Dr. Muck is a master in contrasts. The symphonic poem of Rachmaninoff is well worth a frequent hearing. It is rich in modern orchestral effects, the mood is further enhanced by a suggestion of the Dies Irae, the work rises at times to tremendous climaxes, and at the beginning and at the close there is admirable tone painting of the "tranquil lapping of the water that surrounds the Island of the Dead."

Dr. Muck and his men were compelled to rise in acknowledgement of the applause with which the performance was received.

The concert closed with Mendelssohn's sunny and familiar overture. Its obvious frankness, and the solos and trumpet calls when the good ship ends its prosperous voyage, dismissed the [illegible] good humor.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 29. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting, and, at the same time, the most pathetic figure in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna for 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where he lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let his hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Doctor Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September 1881 and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was, in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Doctor Muck conducted it. Doctor Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three quarters.

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 - 19

tablished:

Music.

Two Busy Days in the Field of Music.

All those who sputtered at Dr. Muck because he put a Bruckner symphony on the programme of the Boston orchestra's concert Thursday night had a chance to soothe their outraged notions Saturday afternoon, for nothing more decorous and doctorial ever came out of Dr. Primrose's own academy than the programme Dr. Muck set before the audience that filled Carnegie Hall for the matinée concert of his orchestra. There were no indurated nuts to crack, no hyperacid harmonies to digest. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's F major concerto for strings and wind, the A minor violin concerto of Viotti (with Fritz Kreisler as soloist), and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture—all eighteenth century music except the overture, which almost is.

Not a number on this programme as performed on Saturday but was in itself a sheer delight. But the combination! Myriad are the ways of dichotomizing the universe. One sundering rock is Dr. Muck's Saturday programme. To one side streams the swarm of those that found in it a source of delirious joy; to the other, those that mournfully admit the collocation of all those just things became long before the concert was over a veritable burden to the flesh.

so superb that silence would be an indiscretion.

The Hippodrome with Sousa's Band, Miss Belle Storey, and Orville Harrold; the Metropolitan Opera House with Mrs. Garrison, Miss Braslau, Mr. Damacco, and Mr. Amato, and the Princess Theatre with Gaston M. Déthier and Edouard Déthier in sonatas for piano and violin offered concert-goers a variety of entertainment last evening.

PITTS SANBORN.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

PROF. WELCH ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, was the subject of a lecture recital given last evening by Prof. Roy Dickinson Welch, of Smith College, at the Academy under Brooklyn Institute auspices. The programme is of four numbers, Mozart's E flat major symphony and Brahms' D major violin concerto, representing absolute music, and Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," composed to a picture by Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," inspired by Goethe's poem, examples of programme music.

The first movement of the symsymphony, said Prof. Welch, is a survival of the slow introductions of the Italian opera that gave the audience time to get settled in their seats. It is built of very slender material, he declared, but it shows admirably Mozart's delicate touch. The second movement he called a work created not merely for one generation, but for all time.

In considering the Brahms concerto which Kriesler will play tonight, Prof. Welch said Brahms had put all his ideas into the introduction. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of the composer throwing off the melodic idea into the complex shifting of rhythm. Then follows a profound slow movement, and the last movement gives the Brahms of Hungarian dances, with vigorous movement, alternating for violin and orchestra.

Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said; it is almost gay in contrast to Rachmaninoff's tone poem, which reveals a freer use of dissonance that Mendelssohn ever thought of using. In this way Rachmaninoff gave tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of.

EVENING POST
New York City
DEC 3 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

Whenever Fritz Kreisler plays the Beethoven concerto—he did it in Carnegie Hall last night, with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one recalls an incident in the life of Joseph Joachim which is characteristic of that strictly classical and "objective" violinist. He had composed his own cadenza for the first movement of this concerto (as most public players do), and there was so much comment on this achievement—all of it favorable—that he refused to play it afterwards, on the ground that he did not want musical folk to talk more about his cadenza than about Beethoven's work itself. It ought to have occurred to him that the concerto was already old in his day and little more to be said about it, whereas his cadenza was new and therefore properly a subject of discussion.

Fritz Kreisler is neither as objective nor as foolish as was Joachim. Volumes of praise have been written and spoken of his two cadenzas for this concerto, which are even more splendid than Joachim's—entrancing improvisations on the melodies of the concerto; yet he goes on calmly—or rather passionately—playing them, doubtless because he has a conviction that Beethoven is able to hold his own, even if now taken for granted and without much comment. To be sure, Kreisler would resent the accusation that his first cadenza is really the best thing in the whole concerto; but every time one hears it, one is more impressed with the fact that it really is so. Beethoven was not vain or jealous. Had he heard Fritz Kreisler play that concerto, he would have gladly admitted that this great Viennese violinist had provided the climax for the whole work.

Last night it was not this part of the work in which Kreisler was at his best as it is usually. Nor, in fact, in the more brilliant parts of Beethoven's noble work. It was in the slow movement that he excelled. Rarely has this been played with such melting tenderness. The cadenza in the final movement impressed itself especially on his hearers for its wonderful beauty. The first cadenza has almost overshadowed it heretofore, but in this second cadenza Kreisler has taken material which is far inferior in value to that of the first movement and lifted it to the level of the remainder of the concerto. That is an achievement without precedent.

The only other work on yesterday's programme was Bruckner's seventh symphony, yet the performance lasted an hour and fifty minutes. Bruckner's symphonies are long—too long—and inspired only in spots. The gem of the seventh is the solemn adagio. This is a sort of dirge, supposed to have been inspired by the thought that Wagner, whom Bruckner adored, was near the end of his life. It was played as a dirge after Bruckner's own death. It is certainly one of his best movements, and the Boston Orchestra played it most impressively. There are some singularly beautiful moments in this slow movement, especially the opening, the beautiful first melody given to the violins, the magnificent crescendo toward the end, and the superb brass effects in which Bruckner revels. These frequently resemble Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz, too, are suggested, the latter in the scherzo, and Liszt in the finale. The pathos of Bruckner's struggles against poverty and musical enmity make one feel lenient in criticism of his work, even though he cannot suffer any more from adverse criticism; but the fact remains that the beauty spots in this symphony are few and far between, and separated by arid stretches of mere notes.

From EAGLE
Address lyn, N. Y.
Date 3 - 1915

Establ

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Professor Welch Analyzes Programme of Concert to be Played Tonight.

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening, at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, with the violinist, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, was considered in detail in a lecture recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, last evening, by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch of Smith College. He spoke of absolute music, in one group, and programme music, in the second group, the symphony and concerto being in the first group, the tone poems in the second. Mozart's Symphony [illegible] said, the finish and polish needful for the time of powdered wigs and brocades. He took up the different movements and played the outlines of the themes. After the introduction, he said, Mozart turned to idealizing the dance and gave it infinite grace and beauty. The "Minuetto" is a dance, from start to finish, and the "Finale" has almost continuous single melody.

In considering the Brahms' D Major Concerto, which Kreisler will play with the orchestra, Professor Welch said that Brahms has put all his ideas in the work into the introduction, and the lecturer illustrated on the piano the growth of one figure td another. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of Brahms. Then follows a profound, slow movement, while the last movement shows the Brahms of the Hungarion dances.

The two pieces of programme music, Rachmaniniff's "The Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem composed to the picture by Boecklin, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," composed to Goethe's poem, represent the beginning and the end of the nineteenth century. Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said. It is almost gay, when contrasted with Rachmaninoff's tone poem. Rachmaninoff gives tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of. Professor Welch played the themes, which, he said, are bits of scales, fragmentary ideas, presented in dissonant relation to the background. But Rachmaninoff achieved a remarkable climax, the last part being like a Latin hymn.

LER PLAYS HMS' CONCERTO

Violinist Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

NIGHT OF SUPREME THINGS.

"Island of the Dead" Given Here for First Time.

It was a night of supreme things, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, for not only was "the perfect orchestra" playing, but there was Fritz Kreisler, the greatest violinist of the day, and Conductor Dr. Karl Muck had arranged a programme of four masterpieces. Again the house was crowded with Brooklyn's most fashionable audience and the long line of limousines outside the opera house duplicated the crush of opera nights.

Dr. Muck's programme was the first in many moons that gave unalloyed delight. It opened with Mozart's E-flat major symphony, one of the three great symphonies, by the most graceful of composers, and one that has been heard but infrequently of late. After the intermission gave the audience a chance for spiritual readjustment, so that the leap from the paint and powder period to the present day was not accompanied by the horrible jolt that Dr. Muck has been accustomed to inflict upon his audiences, a symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by the Russian, Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, was heard in Brooklyn for the first time. There followed Brahms' concerto in D major for the violin, played by Kreisler, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" completed the programme.

It is a long time since the orchestra was heard to better advantage in the Brooklyn concerts. Its pure singing tone and its superb balance were used by Dr. Muck with that finesse and excellent musicianship that has won him such admiration.

But it was the violin concerto that the audience felt the thrill of real genius. The concerto was written by Brahms for his friend, Josef Joachim, but it is reported that even 'oachim found great difficulty in laying it, for the technical difficulties are overwhelming. But these ifficulties were as non-existent last ight. Kreisler gave its most beauful tone to every note; there was ot a hint of a blur in the most illiant passages. At the end of e first movement he introduced a o-string cadenza of his own that me as a blaze of fire in the pasal setting of Brahms. In the rontic second movement, introced by an oboe solo that was yed in splendid fashion, the etic quality in Kreisler's playing s heard in all its richness, and in e finale, the player fairly dazzled h his brilliancy. He was reled many times, the usually undemonstrative Boston Symphony audience giving him an ovation.

Almost as much enthusiasm was stirred by the Rachmaninoff tone poem, and the whole orchestra had to make a bow at its conclusion. The composition is a wonderful piece of programme music, and more than that, for the programme is quite unnecessary for the comprehension of the music. It opens with what has been described as "the tranquil lapping of the waters that surround the Island of the Dead," and works up to an inspired climax, inspired partly by the "love-death" from "Tristan and Isolde," with its glorious soaring

---

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music Notes.

KREISLER WITH MUCK'S MEN.

Master Violinist Given Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist in the Brahms' Concerto in D major.

The orchestral numbers were Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, Rachmaninoff's Symphonie Poem, "The Island of the Dead," suggested by the painting of Arnold Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea Calm and a Prosperous Voyage."

The chief interest of the evening naturally centred in Mr. Kreisler's reading of the Brahms' Concerto, The absence in this work of any passages written for mere effect, the fact that it is to be judged solely as a composition, not as a means of display, and its tremendous difficulties both of technique and interpretation have placed this concerto beyond the range and capabilities of any but the truly great artists.

Mr. Kreisler's reading was distinguished by clarity of exposition, breadth and nobility of conception, and command of all the nuances of exquisite tone production; Suave and melodic in the broad theme of the first movement, in the adagio infused by a gentle pathos, especially in the romantic ending of the movement when the syncopated rhythm produces almost the effect, in the solo instrument, of sobbing, as of grief for some absent friend, and in the final allegro, with its unmistakable Hungarian rhythm, a tone brilliant and jocose, and of exquisite beauty.

The Mozart Symphony under Dr. Muck's leadership was a triumph of grace and beauty in sound. It kas a far cry from the gay, and impersonal music of Mozart to the gloomy, but strikingly effective tone painting of the modern Russian, and Dr. Muck is a master in contrasts. The symphonic poem of Rachmaninoff is well worth a frequent hearing. It is rich in modern orchestral effects, the mood is further enhanced by a suggestion of the Dies Irae, the work rises at times to tremendous climaxes, and at the beginning and at the close there is admirable tone painting of the "tranquil lapping of the water that surrounds the Island of the Dead."

Dr. Muck and his men were compelled to rise in acknowledgement of the applause with which the performance was received.

The concert closed with Mendelssohn's sunny and familiar overture. Its obvious frankness, and the solos and trumpet calls when the good ship ends prosperous voyage, dismissed the good humor.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

Est

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 29. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting, and, at the same time, the most pathetic figure in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna for 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where he lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let his hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Doctor Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September 1881 and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was, in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Doctor Muck conducted it. Doctor Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three quarters.

[59]

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 6 - 1915

ablished:

Music.

Two Busy Days in the Field of Music.

All those who sputtered at Dr. Muck because he put a Bruckner symphony on the programme of the Boston orchestra's concert Thursday night had a chance to soothe their outraged notions Saturday afternoon, for nothing more decorous and doctorial ever came out of Dr. Primrose's own academy than the programme Dr. Muck set before the audience that filled Carnegie Hall for the matinée concert of his orchestra. There were no indurated nuts to crack, no hyperacid harmonies to digest. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's F major concerto for strings and wind, the A minor violin concerto of Viotti (with Fritz Kreisler as soloist), and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture—all eighteenth century music except the overture, which almost is.

Not a number on this programme as performed on Saturday but was in itself a sheer delight. But the combination! Myriad are the ways of dichotomizing the universe. One sundering rock is Dr. Muck's Saturday programme. To one side streams the swarm of those that found in it a source of delirious joy; to the other, those that mournfully admit the collocation of all those just things became long before the concert was over a veritable burden to the flesh.

so superb that silence would be an indiscretion,

The Hippodrome with Sousa's Band, Miss Belle Storey, and Orville Harrold; the Metropolitan Opera House with Mrs. Garrison, Miss Braslau, Mr. Damacco, and Mr. Amato, and the Princess Theatre with Gaston M. Déthier and Edouard Déthier in sonatas for piano and violin offered concert-goers a variety of entertainment last evening.

PITTS SANBORN.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 3 - 1915

rk, 18

PROF. WELCH ON BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play this evening at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, was the subject of a lecture recital given last evening by Prof. Roy Dickinson Welch, of Smith College, at the Academy under Brooklyn Institute auspices. The programme is of four numbers, Mozart's E flat major symphony and Brahms' D major violin concerto, representing absolute music, and Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead," composed to a picture by Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," inspired by Goethe's poem, examples of programme music.

The first movement of the symsymphony, said Prof. Welch, is a survival of the slow introductions of the Italian opera that gave the audience time to get settled in their seats. It is built of very slender material, he declared, but it shows admirably Mozart's delicate touch. The second movement he called a work created not merely for one generation, but for all time.

In considering the Brahms concerto which Kriesler will play tonight, Prof. Welch said Brahms had put all his ideas into the introduction. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of the composer throwing off the melodic idea into the complex shifting of rhythm. Then follows a profound slow movement, and the last movement gives the Brahms of Hungarian dances, with vigorous movement, alternating for violin and orchestra. Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said; it is almost gay in contrast to Rachmaninoff's tone poem, which reveals a freer use of dissonance that Mendelssohn ever thought of using. In this way Rachmaninoff gave tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of.

EVENING POST
New York City
DEC 3 1915

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Kreisler with Boston Orchestra.

Whenever Fritz Kreisler plays the Beethoven concerto—he did it in Carnegie Hall last night, with Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one recalls an incident in the life of Joseph Joachim which is characteristic of that strictly classical and "objective" violinist. He had composed his own cadenza for the first movement of this concerto (as most public players do), and there was so much comment on this achievement—all of it favorable—that he refused to play it afterwards, on the ground that he did not want musical folk to talk more about his cadenza than about Beethoven's work itself. It ought to have occurred to him that the concerto was already old in his day and little more to be said about it, whereas his cadenza was new and therefore properly a subject of discussion.

Fritz Kreisler is neither as nor as foolish as was Joachim.
of praise have been written and
of his two cadenzas for this c
which are even more splendid th
chim's—entrancing improvisations
melodies of the concerto; yet he calmly—or rather passionately—
them, doubtless because he has a
tion that Beethoven is able to hold even if now taken for granted a
out much comment. To be sure,
would resent the accusation that cadenza is really the best thin whole concerto; but every time
it, one is more impressed with the fact that it really is so. Beethoven was not vain or jealous. Had he heard Fritz Kreisler play that concerto, he would have gladly admitted that this great Viennese violinist had provided the climax for the whole work.

Last night it was not this part of the work in which Kreisler was at his best as it is usually. Nor, in fact, in the more brilliant parts of Beethoven's noble work. It was in the slow movement that he excelled. Rarely has this been played with such melting tenderness. The cadenza in the final movement impressed itself especially on his hearers for its wonderful beauty. The first cadenza has almost overshadowed it heretofore, but in this second cadenza Kreisler has taken material which is far inferior in value to that of the first movement and lifted it to the level of the remainder of the concerto. That is an achievement without precedent.

The only other work on yesterday's programme was Bruckner's seventh symphony, yet the performance lasted an hour and fifty minutes. Bruckner's symphonies are long—too long—and inspired only in spots. The gem of the seventh is the solemn adagio. This is a sort of dirge, supposed to have been inspired by the thought that Wagner, whom Bruckner adored, was near the end of his life. It was played as a dirge after Bruckner's own death. It is certainly one of his best movements, and the Boston Orchestra played it most impressively. There are some singularly beautiful moments in this slow movement, especially the opening, the beautiful first melody given to the violins, the magnificent crescendo toward the end, and the superb brass effects in which Bruckner revels. These frequently resemble Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz, too, are suggested, the latter in the scherzo, and Liszt in the finale. The pathos of Bruckner's struggles against poverty and musical enmity make one feel lenient in criticism of his work, even though he cannot suffer any more from adverse criticism; but the fact remains that the beauty spots in this symphony are few and far between, and separated by arid stretches of mere notes.

From EAG
Address lyn, N.
Date 3 -

Establ

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECT

Professor Welch Analyzes Progra of Concert to be Played Tonig

The programme which the Bo Symphony Orchestra will pla evening, at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, with the violinist, Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, was considered in detail in a lecture recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, last evening, by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch of Smith College. He spoke of absolute music, in one group, and programme music, in the second group, the symphony and concerto being in the first group, the tone poems in the second. Mozart's said, the finish and polish needful for the time of powdered wigs and brocades. He took up the different movements and played the outlines of the themes. After the introduction, he said, Mozart turned to idealizing the dance and gave it infinite grace and beauty. The "Minuetto" is a dance, from start to finish, and the "Finale" has almost continuous single melody.

In considering the Brahms' D Major Concerto, which Kreisler will play with the orchestra, Professor Welch said that Brahms has put all his ideas in the work into the introduction, and the lecturer illustrated on the piano the growth of one figure td another. The first movement emphasizes the rhythmic complexity of Brahms. Then follows a profound, slow movement, while the last movement shows the Brahms of the Hungarion dances.

The two pieces of programme music, Rachmaniniff's "The Island of the Dead," a symphonic poem composed to the picture by Boecklin, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," composed to Goethe's poem, represent the beginning and the end of the nineteenth century. Mendelssohn's composition scarcely expresses the inspiration of the poem, he said. It is almost gay, when contrasted with Rachmaninoff's tone poem. Rachmaninoff gives tone ideas that Mendelssohn never heard of. Professor Welch played the themes, which, he said, are bits of scales, fragmentary ideas, presented in dissonant relation to the background. But Rachmaninoff achieved a climax, the last part

---

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 4 - 1915

Establ

.84

KREISLER PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO

Great Violinist Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

NIGHT OF SUPREME THINGS.

"Island of the Dead" Given Here for First Time.

It was a night of supreme things, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, for not only was "the perfect orchestra" playing, but there was Fritz Kreisler, the greatest violinist of the day, and Conductor Dr. Karl Muck had arranged a programme of four masterpieces. Again the house was crowded with Brooklyn's most fashionable audience and the long line of limousines outside the opera house duplicated the crush of opera nights.

Dr. Muck's programme was the first in many moons that gave unalloyed delight. It opened with Mozart's E-flat major symphony, one of the three great symphonies, by the most graceful of composers, and one that has been heard but infrequently of late. After the intermission gave the audience a chance for spiritual readjustment, so that the leap from the paint and powder period to the present day was not accompanied by the horrible jolt that Dr. Muck has been accustomed to inflict upon his audiences, a symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by the Russian, Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, was heard in Brooklyn for the first time. There followed Brahms' concerto in D major for the violin, played by Kreisler, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" completed the programme.

It is a long time since the orchestra was heard to better advantage in the Brooklyn concerts. Its pure singing tone and its superb balance were used by Dr. Muck with that finesse and excellent musicianship that has won him such admiration.

But it was the violin concerto that the audience felt the thrill of real genius. The concerto was written by Brahms for his friend, Josef Joachim, but it is reported that even Joachim found great difficulty in playing it, for the technical difficulties are overwhelming. But these difficulties were as non-existent last night. Kreisler gave its most beautiful tone to every note; there was not a hint of a blur in the most brilliant passages. At the end of the first movement he introduced a two-string cadenza of his own that came as a blaze of fire in the pastoral setting of Brahms. In the romantic second movement, introduced by an oboe solo that was played in splendid fashion, the poetic quality in Kreisler's playing was heard in all its richness, and in the finale, the player fairly dazzled with his brilliancy. He was recalled many times, the usually undemonstrative Boston Symphony audience giving him an ovation.

Almost as much enthusiasm was stirred by the Rachmaninoff tone poem, and the whole orchestra had to make a bow at its conclusion. The composition is a wonderful piece of programme music, and more than that, for the programme is quite unnecessary for the comprehension of the music. It opens with what has been described as "the tranquil lapping of the waters that surround the Island of the Dead," and works up to an inspired climax, inspired partly by the "love-death" from "Tristan and Isolde," with its

---

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
4 1915

k, 184

Music Notes.

KREISLER WITH MUCK'S MEN.

Master Violinist Given Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist in the Brahms' Concerto in D major.

The orchestral numbers were Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, Rachmaninoff's Symphonie Poem, "The Island of the Dead," suggested by the painting of Arnold Bocklin, and Mendelssohn's Overture, "Sea Calm and a Prosperous Voyage."

The chief interest of the evening naturally centred in Mr. Kreisler's reading of the Brahms' Concerto, The absence in this work of any passages written for mere effect, the fact that it is to be judged solely as a composition, not as a means of display, and its tremendous difficulties both of technique and interpretation have placed this concerto beyond the range and capabilities of any but the truly great artists.

Mr. Kreisler's reading was distinguished by clarity of exposition, breadth and nobility of conception, and command of all the nuances of exquisite tone production; Suave and melodic in the broad theme of the first movement, in the adagio infused by a gentle pathos, especially in the romantic ending of the movement when the syncopated rhythm produces almost the effect, in the solo instrument, of sobbing, as of grief for some absent friend, and in the final allegro, with its unmistakable Hungarian rhythm, a tone brilliant and jocose, and of exquisite beauty.

The Mozart Symphony under Dr. Muck's leadership was a triumph of grace and beauty in sound. It kas a far cry from the gay, and impersonal music of Mozart to the gloomy, but strikingly effective tone painting of the modern Russian, and Dr. Muck is a master in contrasts. The symphonic poem of Rachmaninoff is well worth a frequent hearing. It is rich in modern orchestral effects, the mood is further enhanced by a suggestion of the Dies Irae, the work rises at times to tremendous climaxes, and at the beginning and at the close there is admirable tone painting of the "tranquil lapping of the water that surrounds the Island of the Dead."

Dr. Muck and his men were compelled to rise in acknowledgement of the applause with which the performance was received.

The concert closed with Mendelssohn's sunny and familiar overture. Its obvious frankness, and the solos and trumpet calls when the good ship ends its prosperous voyage, dismissed the good humor.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

Est

34

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 29. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting, and, at the same time, the most pathetic figure in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna for 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where he lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let his hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Doctor Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September 1881 and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was, in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Doctor Muck conducted it. Doctor Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three quarters.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

Esta 884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The programme has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's concerto in D major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and at the same time most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at the large sum of 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

The Seventh Symphony which Dr. Muck will play here was written in the two years between September, 1881, and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the Adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Dr. Muck conducted it. Dr. Muck studied the score with the composer himself and his score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three-quarters.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915

Establi

BOSTON SYMPHONY, KREISLER SOLOIST

Great Violinist Thrills the Audience with a Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAM.

Bruckner……Symphony, E major, No. 7
Beethoven,
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 61
Conductor …… Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist……Fritz Kreisler

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, attracted an audience that completely filled every part of the available space, and turned many away. Fritz Kreisler made his first appearance here this season as a soloist, which was, no doubt, responsible for the great outpouring, for Kreisler's popularity in Philadelphia is such as is enjoyed by no other artist.

But aside from the soloist, Dr. Muck and his Boston Symphony, presented the divine Bruckner Symphony No. 7, which is so seldom presented and which is so admirable in its entire construction, that it is a gem among the more modern of the symphonies. It is to be compared with no other like work, and in its great variety it gives the orchestra the opportunity for the full breadth of the choirs, and Dr. Muck's reading leaves nothing to be desired in bringing out the full import of the entire work.

The Tribute to Wagner.

The most appealing part of the symphony is the adagio movement, into which the composer has thrown his great soul, to give the most divine expression of another great soul, the greatest of all Germans, in his estimation, whom he revered, and this portion of his work remains as the monument he has erected to the genius of Wagner.

Dr. Muck conducted the Bruckner Symphony at Graz nearly thirty years ago, and directed its first performance in Austria and in Berlin. He is a great admirer of the eminent Austrian and naturally he has full command of the work and is able to make it most impressive, more so than any other American conductor. At the finish of the symphony the conductor was called out repeatedly, and finally requested the orchestra to rise to share with him the great ovation he received from the delighted audience.

Kreisler's Incomparable Art.

Kreisler's playing was again evidence of the incomparable mastery he holds over the instrument. It is beyond criticism, and beyond any further attainment in perfection. His cadenzas hold the audience breathless at his art. It was in the larghetto movement that the full breadth of his work was brought out, and during his interpretation many at the top of the house were on their feet in order that they should not miss one particle of the wonderful music to which they were being treated.

[illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] the Academy [illegible]

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 1915 30

KREISLER HEARD WITH DR. MUCK'S SYMPHONY

Second Appearance of Boston Orchestra Delights Academy Audience

RARE SKILL IS REVEALED

Work Played With Fidelity to Manuscript, But Devoid of Stiffness

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was warmly welcomed at the Academy of Music last night, when its second concert, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was given with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The full force of Kreisler's personality, his immaculate phrasing and technical finish, came to the surface in his rendition of Beethoven's Concerto in D major for violin.

The theme of the concerto, eloquent of content, was carried by the orchestra, threaded during rare intervals with the full-throated and eloquent tones of the soloist's violin. The few passionate movements were skillfully interpreted by Kreisler; the more quiet passage gleamed with subdued color, sometimes shaded to near silence, under his bow. From the opening of the theme, introduced by three taps of the bettledrums, until the final note, the concerto made a notable appeal to the audience.

A deeply religious mood of Bruckner's Symphony in E major was sympathetically interpreted by the orchestra. Reminiscent of the Wagner school of music, with themes heroic in character rather than purely melodious, the symphony was charged with force and character under the baton of Doctor Muck. The colorful theme of the second movement, embroidered with the melody of violins, picked up by horn, oboes and clarinets, was well interpreted; the volume of sound, which characterized some passages tempered by judicious handling and released under perfect control.

Doctor Muck was equally happy in his interpretation of the more joyous mood of the finale, ending in a free fantasia. Played with a fidelity to manuscript, with discretion but without stiffness, the symphony captured the audience in the final movements even more than at the beginning. The rich orchestral music was developed by infinite variety of instruments mastered by members of the orchestra, who were obviously in accord with the leader.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915

E 1884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE

Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert for the season before the kind of audience which its appearance never fails to attract at the Academy of Music last evening when the programme consisted of only two numbers, Bruckner's seventh symphony and Beethoven's concerto for the violin.

The symphony was in the nature of a novelty, as it had not previously been presented here. Although characterized by the diffuseness and prolixity which were Bruckner's besetting sins—it plays for a mortal hour and a few minutes over—it is in every sense of the word a great work and the tedium which its inordinate length entails is from time to time illuminated by flashes of genius which reconcile the listener to the excessive demands which are made upon his attention. Easily the finest and most interesting of its movements is the heavenly adagio in which a theme of singular beauty is developed and exhibited and diversified with a wonderfully skillful and resourceful art, which by itself sufficiently rewards the patience which the composition in its entirety exacts and renders its production well worth the while.

At the same time it must be regretted that Bruckner's sense of proportion and of form did not serve to restrain him from the inordinate copiousness in which he indulged and that he so conspicuously failed to cultivate or practice the virtue of reticence. His injudicious or undiscriminating admirers affected at one time to recognize in him a rival and even superior to Brahms, but one among other grounds upon which such claims must be rejected is embodied in the circumstance that Brahms always knows when to stop, something that Bruckner could never learn. There is not a note in one of Brahms symphonies which could well be spared out, but in the symphony played last evening there are whole pages whose elimination would be an undisputed and indisputable improvement.

The Beethoven concerto was done by [illegible] finished art was [illegible] displayed than [illegible]

[60]

---

piece, so admirable and satisfying in the beauty of its tone, in the authoritative masterliness of its execution, in the sustained dignity of its sentiment, in its unaffected simplicity and in the spontaneity of its inspiration was a perfect exemplification of the violin playing art and an unalloyed delight. The next of these concerts will be given on [illegible]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

84

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY ON ORCHESTRA'S BILL

Fritz Kreisler to Play Beethoven Concerto at Concert in the Academy.

CARUSO AND ALDA TO SING

Massenet's "Manon" Announced by Metropolitan—Philadelphia Orchestra's Tour.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during this season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's, Concerto in B Major for violin.

FRITZ KREISLER.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and, at the same time, most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at 60 cents a lesson. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where Bruckner lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let that hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Dr. Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September, 1881, and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. This was so in a sense, for although the Adagio was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that the Adagio was written under the stress of the knowledge that Wagner did not have long to live.

The Symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and, in Vienna, under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Dr. Muck conducted the work. Dr. Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which Muck uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Da NOV 4 1915

1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Impressive Programme With Fritz Kreisler as Solo Violinist.

There was something for all tastes on Dr. Muck's Boston Symphony programme last night at the Academy. The conductor joined Rachmaninoff to Mozart and Mendelssohn to Brahms. The dainty, gracious measures of Mozart's E flat Symphony preceded the Russian's "Die Toteninsel," with its impressive sweep and weirdly colored accents. Then came Brahms' Concerto in D major, closely aligned in form to music of the past, but full of the rich variety and orchestral fury of this day. The Concerto served to introduce Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening. The concluding Mendelssohn-Bartholdy number, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," might have served its intended purpose as an overture, but it sounded hollow, ingenuous and little more than pretty after what had preceded it. If last night's audience could have rearranged Dr. Muck's programme to its taste it would probably have placed the overture first, followed this with the Mozart Symphony and continued the concert after the intermission with Brahms, concluding with the Rachmaninoff number, which produced the greatest single impression of the evening.

Dr. Muck takes his Mozart very seriously. That means strict attention to the composer's prescriptions and proscriptions. It results in giving well-tempered value to every phase of the composition, but it leaves the hearer wondering how it would seem to have him hurried along a little more. Last night the tempo was rather slow, particularly in the first movement and in the familiar, but eternally delightful, "Minuetto."

"The Island of the Dead," Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Poem, is an endeavor to interpret in orchestral music the impressions conveyed by Boecklin's picture of that name. The music has something of the mystic weirdness and world-weariness suggested by the picture. There is a wealth of thematic material, much of it enunciated only to be at once abandoned. It is a constant struggle for expression rather than the completed delineation of a series of musical ideas. From the quiet rhythmic sweep of the opening passages through the several approaches to passionate climax and on to the tranquil end there is the ever-present suggestion that "more is meant than strikes the ear." The opening and close recall the wonderful orchestral passages with which Moussorgsky illustrates and ornaments the remarkable snowstorm scene in "Boris Godunoff." In such a work an important phase of the Boston Orchestra's achievement is revealed. It created again the composition, smoothing over the composer's dissonance and lingering lovingly on the melodic beauties. After the number, enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch and the orchestra was compelled to bow its response.

Fritz Kreisler has long been a Brooklyn favorite, and the usual warm welcome greeted him. One beauty of the Brahms D major concerto lies in its impartial distribution of material as between orchestra and soloist. Both participate in the elaboration of the themes, while the easily flowing transitions from the strings to the solo instrument are among the finest passages. The second movement, with its romanza character, is the most beautiful and it revealed the depth and sweep of Kreisler's art. The cadenza and concluding rondo gave his technical mastery full play, but the Adagio lingers in memory. The audience was enthusiastic in its appreciation and recalled the soloist to the stage again and again.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 27 1915

E 1884

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E-major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D-major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

The Bruckner Symphony, which will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was written in the two years between September 188 and September 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II. of Bavaria and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and [illegible] Felix [illegible]

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The programme has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's concerto in D major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and at the same time most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at the large sum of 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

The Seventh Symphony which Dr. Muck will play here was written in the two years between September, 1881, and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the Adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Dr. Muck conducted it. Dr. Muck studied the score with the composer himself and his score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three-quarters.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY, KREISLER SOLOIST

Great Violinist Thrills the Audience with a Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAM.

Bruckner.....Symphony, E major, No. 7
Beethoven,
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 61
Conductor .... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist....................Fritz Kreisler

The second concert of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Music last evening, attracted an aud ence that completely filled every pa of the available space, and turned ma away. Fritz Kreisler made his first a pearance here this season as a soloi which was, no doubt, responsible for t great outpouring, for Kreisler's popula ity in Philadelphia is such as is enjoy by no other artist.

But aside from the soloist, Dr. Mu and his Boston Symphony, presented divine Bruckner Symphony No. 7, wh is so seldom presented and which is admirable in its entire construction, th it is a gem among the more modern of the symphonies. It is to be compared with no other like work, and in its great variety it gives the orchestra the opportunity for the full breadth of the choirs, and Dr. Muck's reading leaves nothing to be desired in bringing out the full import of the entire work.

The Tribute to Wagner.

The most appealing part of the symphony is the adagio movement, into which the composer has thrown his great soul, to give the most divine expression of another great soul, the greatest of all Germans, in his estimation, whom he revered, and this portion of his work remains as the monument he has erected to the genius of Wagner.

Dr. Muck conducted the Bruckner Symphony at Graz nearly thirty years ago, and directed its first performance in Austria and in Berlin. He is a great admirer of the eminent Austrian and naturally he has full command of the work and is able to make it most impressive, more so than any other American conductor. At the finish of the symphony the conductor was called out repeatedly, and finally requested the orchestra to rise to share with him the great ovation he received from the delighted audience.

Kreisler's Incomparable Art.

Kreisler's playing was again evidence of the incomparable mastery he holds over the instrument. It is beyond criticism, and beyond any further attainment in perfection. His cadenzas hold the audience breathless at his art. It was in the larghetto movement that the full breadth of his work was brought out, and during his interpretation many at the top of the house were on their feet in order that they should not miss one particle of the wonderful music to which they were being treated.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be given at the Academy on [illegible] 3, when Mme. Melba will be

---

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 20 1915
30

KREISLER HEARD WITH DR. MUCK'S SYMPHONY

Second Appearance of Boston Orchestra Delights Academy Audience

RARE SKILL IS REVEALED

Work Played With Fidelity to Manuscript, But Devoid of Stiffness

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was warmly welcomed at the Academy of Music last night, when its second concert, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was given with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The full force of Kreisler's personality, his immaculate phrasing, and technical finish, came to the surface in his rendition of Beethoven's Concerto in D major for violin.

The theme of the concerto, eloquent of content, was carried by the orchestra, threaded during rare intervals with the full-throated and eloquent tones of the soloist's violin. The few passionate movements were skillfully interpreted by Kreisler; the more quiet passage gleamed with subdued color, sometimes shaded to near silence, under his bow. From the opening of the theme, introduced by three taps of the bettledrums, until the final note, the concerto made a notable appeal to the audience.

A deeply religious mood of Bruckner's Symphony in E major was sympathetically interpreted by the orchestra. Reminiscent of the Wagner school of music, with themes heroic in character rather than purely melodious, the symphony was charged with force and character under the baton of Doctor Muck. The colorful theme of the second movement, embroidered with the melody of violins, picked up by horn, oboes and clarinets, was well interpreted; the volume of sound, which characterized some passages tempered by judicious handling and released under perfect control.

Doctor Muck was equally happy in his interpretation of the more joyous mood of the finale, ending in a free fantasia. Played with a fidelity to manuscript, with discretion but without stiffness, the symphony captured the audience in the final movements even more than at the beginning. The rich orchestral music was developed by infinite variety of instruments mastered by members of the orchestra, who were obviously in accord with the leader.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE

Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert for the season before the kind of audience which its appearance never fails to attract at the Academy of Music last evening when the programme consisted of only two numbers, Bruckner's seventh symphony and Beethoven's concerto for the violin.

The symphony was in the nature of a novelty, as it had not previously been presented here. Although characterized by the diffuseness and prolixity which were Bruckner's besetting sins—it plays for a mortal hour and a few minutes over—it is in every sense of the word a great work and the tedium which its inordinate length entails is from time to time illuminated by flashes of genius which reconcile the listener to the excessive demands which are made upon his attention. Easily the finest and most interesting of its movements is the heavenly adagio in which a theme of singular beauty is developed and exhibited and diversified with a wonderfully skillful and resourceful art, which by itself sufficiently rewards the patience which the composition in its entirety exacts and renders its production well worth the while.

At the same time it must be regretted that Bruckner's sense of proportion and of form did not serve to restrain him from the inordinate copiousness in which he indulged and that he so conspicuously failed to cultivate or practice the virtue of reticence. His injudicious or undiscriminating admirers affected at one time to recognize in him a rival and even superior to Brahms, but one among other grounds upon which such claims must be rejected is embodied in the circumstance that Brahms always knows when to stop, something that Bruckner could never learn. There is not a note in one of Brahms symphonies which could well be spared out, but in the symphony played last evening there are whole pages whose elimination would be an undisputed and indisputable improvement.

The Beethoven concerto was done by Fritz Kreisler, whose finished art was never more [illegible] displayed than during the [illegible] season and whose nopiece, so admirable and satisfying in the beauty of its tone, in the authoritative masterliness of its execution, in the sustained dignity of its sentiment, in its unaffected simplicity and in the spontaneity of its inspiration was a perfect exemplification of the violin playing art and an unalloyed delight. The next of these concerts will be given on Monday

[60]

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 28 1915

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY ON ORCHESTRA'S BILL

Fritz Kreisler to Play Beethoven Concerto at Concert in the Academy.

CARUSO AND ALDA TO SING

Massenet's "Manon" Announced by Metropolitan—Philadelphia Orchestra's Tour.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during this season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's, Concerto in B Major for violin.

FRITZ KREISLER.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and, at the same time, most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at 60 cents a lesson. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where Bruckner lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let that hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Dr. Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September, 1881, and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. This was so in a sense, for although the Adagio was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that the Adagio was written under the stress of the knowledge that Wagner did not have long to live.

The Symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and, in Vienna, under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Dr. Muck conducted the work. Dr. Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which Muck uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 4 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Impressive Programme With Fritz Kreisler as Solo Violinist.

There was something for all tastes on Dr. Muck's Boston Symphony programme last night at the Academy. The conductor joined Rachmaninoff to Mozart and Mendelssohn to Brahms. The dainty, gracious measures of Mozart's E flat Symphony preceded the Russian's "Die Toteninsel," with its impressive sweep and weirdly colored accents. Then came Brahms' Concerto in D major, closely aligned in form to music of the past, but full of the rich variety and orchestral fury of this day. The Concerto served to introduce Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening. The concluding Mendelssohn-Bartholdy number, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," might have served its intended purpose as an overture, but it sounded hollow, ingenuous and little more than pretty after what had preceded it. If last night's audience could have rearranged Dr. Muck's programme to its taste it would probably have placed the overture first, followed this with the Mozart Symphony and continued the concert after the intermission with Brahms, concluding with the Rachmaninoff number, which produced the greatest single impression of the evening.

Dr. Muck takes his Mozart very seriously. That means strict attention to the composer's prescriptions and proscriptions. It results in giving well-tempered value to every phase of the composition, but it leaves the hearer wondering how it would seem to have him hurried along a little more. Last night the tempo was rather slow, particularly in the first movement and in the familiar, but eternally delightful, "Minuetto."

"The Island of the Dead," Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Poem, is an endeavor to interpret in orchestral music the impressions conveyed by Boecklin's picture of that name. The music has something of the mystic weirdness and world-weariness suggested by the picture. There is a wealth of thematic material, much of it enunciated only to be at once abandoned. It is a constant struggle for expression rather than the completed delineation of a series of musical ideas. From the quiet rhythmic sweep of the opening passages through the several approaches to passionate climax and on to the tranquil end there is the ever-present suggestion that "more is meant than strikes the ear." The opening and close recall the wonderful orchestral passages with which Moussorgsky illustrates and ornaments the remarkable snowstorm scene in "Boris Godunoff." In such a work an important phase of the Boston Orchestra's achievement is revealed. It created again the composition, smoothing over the composer's dissonance and lingering lovingly on the melodic beauties. After the number, enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch and the orchestra was compelled to bow its response.

Fritz Kreisler has long been a Brooklyn favorite, and the usual warm welcome greeted him. One beauty of the Brahms D major concerto lies in its impartial distribution of material as between orchestra and soloist. Both participate in the elaboration of the themes, while the easily flowing transitions from the strings to the solo instrument are among the finest passages. The second movement, with its romanza character, is the most beautiful and it revealed the depth and sweep of Kreisler's art. The cadenza and concluding rondo gave his technical mastery full play, but the Adagio lingers in memory. The audience was enthusiastic in its appreciation and recalled the soloist to the stage again and again.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 27 1915

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E-major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D-major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

The Bruckner Symphony, which will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was written in the two years between September 1881 and September 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II. of Bavaria and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, sa

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2 8 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert of the Boston Sy phony Orchestra will be given in t Academy of Music tomorrow evenin The soloist will be Frits Kreisler, w will then make his only appearance he during the current season. The pr gramme has only two numbers. Th first part will be taken by Bruckner Seventh Symphony in E major. The se ond part will be devoted to Beethoven concerts in D major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and at the same time most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at the large sum of 60 cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

The Seventh Symphony which Dr. Muck will play here was written in the two years between September, 1881, and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that he wrote the Adagio when very sad over the knowledge that the "Master" (Wagner) did not have long to live.

The symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi and in Vienna under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Dr. Muck conducted it. Dr. Muck studied the score with the composer himself and his score which he uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

The length of the concert will be one hour and three-quarters.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 0 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY, KREISLER SOLOIST

Great Violinist Thrills the Audience with a Beethoven Concerto.

PROGRAM.
Bruckner......Symphony, E major, No. 7
Beethoven,
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 61
Conductor .... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist......................Fritz Kreisler

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, attracted an audience that completely filled every part of the available space, and turned many away. Fritz Kreisler made his first appearance here this season as a soloist, which was, no doubt, responsible for the great outpouring, for Kreisler's popularity in Philadelphia is such as is enjoyed by no other artist.

But aside from the soloist, Dr. Muck and his Boston Symphony, presented the divine Bruckner Symphony No. 7, which is so seldom presented and which is so admirable in its entire construction, that it is a gem among the more modern of the symphonies. It is to be compared with no other like work, and in its great variety it gives the orchestra the opportunity for the full breadth of the choirs, and Dr. Muck's reading leaves nothing to be desired in bringing out the full import of the entire work.

The Tribute to Wagner.

The most appealing part of the symphony is the adagio movement, into which the composer has thrown his great soul, to give the most divine expression of another great soul, the greatest of all Germans, in his estimation, whom he revered, and this portion of his work remains as the monument he has erected to the genius of Wagner.

Dr. Muck conducted the Bruckner Symphony at Graz nearly thirty years ago, and directed its first performance in Austria and in Berlin. He is a great admirer of the eminent Austrian and naturally he has full command of the work and is able to make it most impressive, more so than any other American conductor. At the finish of the symphony the conductor was called out repeatedly, and finally requested the orchestra to rise to share with him the great ovation he received from the delighted audience.

Kreisler's Incomparable Art.

Kreisler's playing was again evidence of the incomparable mastery he holds over the instrument. It is beyond criticism, and beyond any further attainment in perfection. His cadenzas hold the audience breathless at his art. It was in the larghetto movement that the full breadth of his work was brought out, and during his interpretation many at the top of the house were on their feet in order that they should not miss one particle of the wonderful music to which they were being treated.

The next concert of the Boston Symphony will be given at the Academy on January 3, when Mme. Melba will be

---

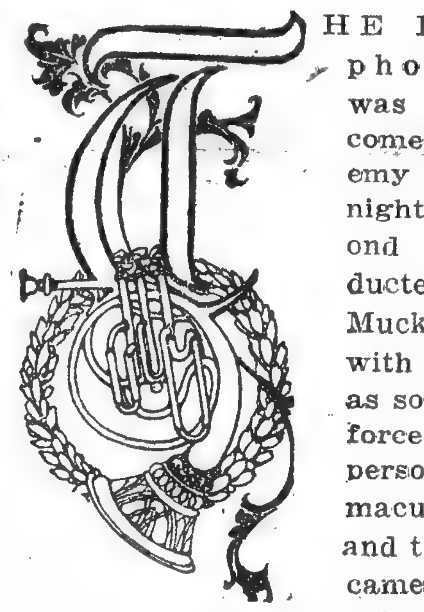
From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 30 NOV [illegible] 1915

KREISLER HEARD WITH DR. MUCK'S SYMPHONY

Second Appearance of Boston Orchestra Delights Academy Audience

RARE SKILL IS REVEALED

Work Played With Fidelity to Manuscript, But Devoid of Stiffness



THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was warmly welcomed at the Academy of Music last night, when its second concert, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was given with Fritz Kreisler as soloist. The full force of Kreisler's personality, his immaculate phrasing, and technical finish, came to the surface in his rendition of Beethoven's Concerto in D major for violin.

The theme of the concerto, eloquent of content, was carried by the orchestra, threaded during rare intervals with the full-throated and eloquent tones of the soloist's violin. The few passionate movements were skillfully interpreted by Kreisler; the more quiet passage gleamed with subdued color, sometimes shaded to near silence, under his bow. From the opening of the theme, introduced by three taps of the bettledrums, until the final note, the concerto made a notable appeal to the audience.

A deeply religious mood of Bruckner's Symphony in E major was sympathetically interpreted by the orchestra. Reminiscent of the Wagner school of music, with themes heroic in character rather than purely melodious, the symphony was charged with force and character under the baton of Doctor Muck. The colorful theme of the second movement, embroidered with the melody of violins, picked up by horn, oboes and clarinets, was well interpreted; the volume of sound, which characterized some passages tempered by judicious handling and released under perfect control.

Doctor Muck was equally happy in his interpretation of the more joyous mood of the finale, ending in a free fantasia. Played with a fidelity to manuscript, with discretion but without stiffness, the symphony captured the audience in the final movements even more than at the beginning. The rich orchestral music was developed by infinite variety of instruments mastered by members of the orchestra, who were obviously in accord with the leader.

R iladelphia, Pa.
NOV 3 0 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE

ymphony Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening

he Boston Symphony Orchestra, un- the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, its second concert for the season be- e the kind of audience which its appearance never fails to attract at the cademy of Music last evening when the rogramme consisted of only two numbers, Bruckner's seventh symphony and eethoven's concerto for the violin.

The symphony was in the nature of a novelty, as it had not previously been presented here. Although characterized by the diffuseness and prolixity which were Bruckner's besetting sins—it plays for a mortal hour and a few minutes over—it is in every sense of the word a great work and the tedium which its inordinate length entails is from time to time illuminated by flashes of genius which reconcile the listener to the excessive demands which are made upon his attention. Easily the finest and most interesting of its movements is the heavenly adagio in which a theme of singular beauty is developed and exhibited and diversified with a wonderfully skillful and resourceful art, which by itself sufficiently rewards the patience which the composition in its entirety exacts and renders its production well worth the while.

At the same time it must be regretted that Bruckner's sense of proportion and of form did not serve to restrain him from the inordinate copiousness in which he indulged and that he so conspicuously failed to cultivate or practice the virtue of reticence. His injudicious or undiscriminating admirers affected at one time to recognize in him a rival and even superior to Brahms, but one among other grounds upon which such claims must be rejected is embodied in the circumstance that Brahms always knows when to stop, something that Bruckner could never learn. There is not a note in one of Brahms symphonies which could well be spared out, but in the symphony played last evening there are whole pages whose elimination would be an undisputed and indisputable improvement.

The Beethoven concerto was done by Fritz Kreisler, whose finished art was never more effectively displayed than during the [illegible] season and whose nopiece, so admirable and satisfying in the beauty of its tone, in the authoritative masterliness of its execution, in the sustained dignity of its sentiment, in its unaffected simplicity and in the spontaneity of its inspiration was a perfect exemplification of the violin playing art and an unalloyed delight. The next of these concerts will be given on Monday evening, Jan.

1884

[60]

---

CORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2 8 19

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY ON ORCHESTRA'S BILL

Fritz Kreisler to Play Beethoven Concerto at Concert in the Academy.

CARUSO AND ALDA TO SING

Massenet's "Manon" Announced by Metropolitan—Philadelphia Orchestra's Tour.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during this season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's, Concerto in B Major for violin.

FRITZ KREISLER.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and, at the same time, most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty, and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at 60 cents a lesson. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

It was Bruckner's misfortune to be an ardent admirer of Wagner at a time when Vienna, where Bruckner lived, was dominated, musically speaking, by the great Hanslick, who hated Wagner and all his works and let that hate spread to those who admired Wagner or followed in his footsteps. Consequently, Hanslick continuously wrote most venomously regarding Bruckner and his symphonies and did much to make the quaint old man's life unhappy.

The Seventh Symphony, which Dr. Muck will play here, was written in the two years between September, 1881, and September, 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. This was so in a sense, for although the Adagio was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl, said that the Adagio was written under the stress of the knowledge that Wagner did not have long to live.

The Symphony had its first performance in Leipsic, December 30, 1884, under Nikisch, at a theatre concert in aid of the Wagner Monument Fund. Later it was played in Munich under Levi, and, in Vienna, under Richter. The first performance in Austria, however, was given in Graz, March 14, 1886, when Dr. Muck conducted the work. Dr. Muck studied the score with the composer himself and the score which Muck uses in performances contains Bruckner's own markings.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 4 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Impressive Programme With Fritz Kreisler as Solo Violinist.

There was something for all tastes on Dr. Muck's Boston Symphony programme last night at the Academy. The conductor joined Rachmaninoff to Mozart and Mendelssohn to Brahms. The dainty, gracious measures of Mozart's E flat Symphony preceded the Russian's "Die Toteninsel," with its impressive sweep and weirdly colored accents. Then came Brahms' Concerto in D major, closely aligned in form to music of the past, but full of the rich variety and orchestral fury of this day. The Concerto served to introduce Fritz Kreisler, the soloist of the evening. The concluding Mendelssohn-Bartholdy number, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," might have served its intended purpose as an overture, but it sounded hollow, ingenuous and little more than pretty after what had preceded it. If last night's audience could have rearranged Dr. Muck's programme to its taste it would probably have placed the overture first, followed this with the Mozart Symphony and continued the concert after the intermission with Brahms, concluding with the Rachmaninoff number, which produced the greatest single impression of the evening.

Dr. Muck takes his Mozart very seriously. That means strict attention to the composer's prescriptions and proscriptions. It results in giving well-tempered value to every phase of the composition, but it leaves the hearer wondering how it would seem to have him hurried along a little more. Last night the tempo was rather slow, particularly in the first movement and in the familiar, but eternally delightful, "Minuetto."

"The Island of the Dead," Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Poem, is an endeavor to interpret in orchestral music the impressions conveyed by Boecklin's picture of that name. The music has something of the mystic weirdness and world-weariness suggested by the picture. There is a wealth of thematic material, much of it enunciated only to be at once abandoned. It is a constant struggle for expression rather than the completed delineation of a series of musical ideas. From the quiet rhythmic sweep of the opening passages through the several approaches to passionate climax and on to the tranquil end there is the ever-present suggestion that "more is meant than strikes the ear." The opening and close recall the wonderful orchestral passages with which Moussorgsky illustrates and ornaments the remarkable snowstorm scene in "Boris Godunoff." In such a work an important phase of the Boston Orchestra's achievement is revealed. It created again the composition, smoothing over the composer's dissonance and lingering lovingly on the melodic beauties. After the number, enthusiasm of the audience rose to its highest pitch and the orchestra was compelled to bow its response.

Fritz Kreisler has long been a Brooklyn favorite, and the usual warm welcome greeted him. One beauty of the Brahms D major concerto lies in its impartial distribution of material as between orchestra and soloist. Both participate in the elaboration of the themes, while the easily flowing transitions from the strings to the solo instrument are among the finest passages. The second movement, with its romanza character, is the most beautiful and it revealed the depth and sweep of Kreisler's art. The cadenza and concluding rondo gave his technical mastery full play, but the Adagio lingers in memory. The audience was enthusiastic in its appreciation and recalled the soloist to the stage again and again.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2 7 1915

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E-major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D-major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

The Bruckner Symphony, which will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was written in the two years between September 188 and September 1883. It was dedicated to King Ludwig II. of Bavaria and the statement is always made that the Adagio was composed as funeral music in memory of Richard Wagner. It was in a sense, for although it was written before Wagner died, Bruckner in a letter to his good and loyal friend, Felix Mottl,

1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date EC 4
Es

FRITZ KREISLE RECEIVES OVAT

Is Assisting Artist with Bostonp Symhony.

PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO WITH NOBILITY OF TONE

Perfection Attained by Boston Orchestra Splendidly Exemplified Throughout the Programme —Concert One of the Most Enjoyable of the Season.

The second Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large audience that was highly enthusiastic throughout the evening, each orchestral number receiving great applause, as did the playing of Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, or rather assisting artist, of the evening.

Mr. Kreisler received an ovation on his appearance for the third number on the programme, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 77. The artist was at his best and the three movements were played with all the mobility of tone, marvelous technique and exquisite artistic conception that has placed Mr. Kreisler on the highest artistic plane. The applause was deafening and sustained at the end.

The orchestral numbers began with Mozart's Symphony in E flat and was followed by Rachmaninoff's "Die Toteninsel" (The Island of the Dead), a symphonic tone poem for full orchestra, to the picture of A. Backlin, opus 29, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," opus 27.

The degree of perfection attained by this body of artists was splendidly exemplified last night throughout. The magnificence of voice, precision in the difficult and involved harmonies in Rachmaninoff's tone poem, and the exquisite melodies of the symphony and overture made last night's concert one of the most enjoyable that has been heard in some time.

The orchestral part in th number was handled by Dr. masterly manner.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 28 19
Establi

KREISLER AS SOLOIST

FRITZ KREISLER will make his first appearance of the year here on wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else. In them his genius shines the brightest. His melodic inventon was never more wonderful and in his skill as a composer he so wrote that despite the small orchestra he uses, the symphonies are today full of modern feeling. There is little choice among the three. Some prefer the "Jupiter," some prefer the G minor and some the E flat, but they are all of ineffable beauty.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninoff is easily the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel." The chances are that this work will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The poem is one of extraordinary beauty and is well worthy of more frequent performances than it has. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Der Toteninsel."
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 27 1915
Estab

KREISLER TO APPEAR HERE WEDNESDAY

Will Be Soloist At Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART WORK ON PROGRAM

Symphonic Poem By Rachmaninoff, Regarded As Greatest Living Russian Composer, To Be Played.

Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the year here next Wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D Major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else.

Regarded As Greatest Of Russians.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninff is regarded by many as the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany, the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel."

When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The concert will close with Mendelssohn's overture "Sea-Calm and Prosperous V

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 1915
Estab

GOOD PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert at Lyric Well Attended; Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Baltimore series of the season at the Lyric last night. The program was quite interesting, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the special soloist, was applauded an unusually long time. The audience filled the house.

Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543) is heard seldom enough to have been enjoyable last night. Its comparative simplicity of construction, its brightness and Mozart's particular individualty made it much more welcome than another repetition at this time of the oft-repeated Beethoven symphonies. It would be well, particularly in these days of transition in musical art, if other such works were played more often.

The Island of the Dead, a symphonic poem by Rachmaninoff, suggested by the picture of that name by A Bocklin, is a tonal work from contemplation of which it is hard to turn. Here is modern music in keeping with the present age—neither an echo of ancient days nor, literally speaking, the shadow of coming events. To attempt to describe it would be far harder than to attempt to describe the gripping picture which inspired it. The simplicity of the emotion, yet its deep moving power defy words for communication of its full appreciation. When one hears such music he wonders how much further musical art is able to go along present lines, and if, after all, it will be necessary in future to resort to such a method as just suggested by the youthful Leo Ornstein.

It seemed a pity to have to turn immediately from such a work to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, fine as the concerto is. The concerto itself is moving music, and Kreisler played it exceedingly well and with excellent support by the orchestra.

Mendelssohn's overture, Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage, closed the program rather ineffectively. It seemed insipid after the other music.

J. N. H.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 2 - 1915

PROGRAM PLEASES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard At Its Best.

Judicious Blending Of Ancient And Modern Schools; Kreisler Receives A Great Ovation.

It is doubtful whether any concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late years has been so heartily enjoyed as that at the Lyric last night, and this was the result of a most fortunate combination of circumstances. For one thing, Fritz Kreisler was the soloist; the playing of the orchestra was peculiarly finished and sympathetic even for this unique organization, and finally, the program was one of singular attraction and nicety of balance. For the last two years, indeed, Dr. Muck's programs have shown a consistent endeavor to give Baltimore a judicious blend of the best of both ancient and modern schools, and such criticisms as have been freely expressed in the past as to this conductor's seemingly careless flinging on to this city of whatever music happened to suit his mood at the moment must surely now, in common justice, cease.

The concert opened with Mozart's E-flat Symphony—one of the three which have, by universal consent, been rescued from the general internment of the composer's remaining 46 symphonies; but of these three the one performed last night is certainly the least striking.

Of its two contemporaries, that commonly known as the Jupiter Symphony has a pervading dignity and a certain godlike aloofness which more or less justifies its title, and, moreover, its finale stands for all time as a monument of orchestral counterpoint, while the other—the G minor, the first great emotional symphony given to the world—is full of a tender subtlety of feeling quite modern at times in its intensity. The E-flat Symphony, on the other hand, is bathed in almost uninterrupted sunshine and its claims to distinction lie in the unusual impressiveness of its introduction, the energy and individuality of its last movement and the exquisite grace and balance of its slender scoring throughout. This is, by the bye, the only symphony without oboe parts in the musical repertoire of today.

Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," which came next on the program, is in many respects the most inspired work that has yet issued from this composer's pen. There is a powerful weirdness of coloring, a curiously tense atmosphere and a peculiar suggestion of desolation, especially at the beginning, which made a profound impression on the audience. Many of the harmonic progressions are most original and beautiful, but never, as is the case with so many modern compositions, exaggerated or eccentric.

Fritz Kreisler, who played the now almost hackneyed Tschaikowsky concerto in D, was at his finest once again last night. There is in this artist a steady and perpetual flow of inspiration above and beyond his immense technical equipment, whic gives him a place altogether uniqu among executants of the present da and he was accorded such an ova tion both before and after his pe formance as has seldom been wi nessed even at these concerts.

H. D. P.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 1 - 1915
Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Fritz Kreisler Will Be Soloist At Concert At Lyric.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 this evening, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The program is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Die Toteninsel" (symphonic poem).
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 24 1915
Es 1884

SECOND CONCERT SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Hartley, Pianist, Pleased.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night and Infantry Hall was well filled with an appreciative audience. It was an all instrumental programme that was presented, with a pianist as soloist, and that combination does not always appeal as strongly to many as a more diversified arrangement of musicians. On this occasion, however, the audience left the hall quite satisfied with what had been heard in two hours of continuous pleasure.

The programme was carefully planned and well balanced, reflecting more than ordinarily the skill of Dr. Muck in that respect. The symphony was serious and difficult, while the remaining numbers were of the lighter sort, all being brilliant, bright and melodious. The programme was played in the following order:

Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; Berlioz, Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 22; Bizet, Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Music to Alphonse Daudet's play.

The Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor is not as popular as most compositions that are rendered more frequently. Dr. Muck, however, does not seem to share in that feeling concerning this selection, for he has shown evidence of keen admiration for Brahms in all his moods, and has been particularly successful in interpreting his music to the public. The marked feature of this symphony is its slow movement, and it possesses a beauty that cannot fail to be appreciated by real lovers of music of the highest grade. The unique character of the last part of the selection also marks it as distinctive, the composer having used as a basis the ancient Passacaglia dance. Altogether this symphony is well worth hearing when it is played as it should be, and there was nothing lacking in the expression with which it was rendered last night. It has still further charm for many because it is the last work of the kind that Brahms produced, and so forms in a sense a special memorial to his genius.

In the second half of the programme three French composers were represented, the trio who stand highest in musical honor in that land. Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Bizet are names to inspire any musician, and the grouping of the three as a section of a programme was a happy idea that worked to a charm.

Berlioz contributed the overture to the "Roman Carnival," which shows clearly and skillfully the gayety of the carnival time in ancient Rome when the population in light holiday mood sallied forth to enjoy the festival. There is a fanciful strain running through the muisc, and the great composer must have been in a happy frame when he created this masterpiece of wild, care-free melody.

The other orchestral number and the final one on the programme, was the Bizet selection, his first "L'Arlesienne" suite. This composer's name is associated inseparably with the music of "Carmen," but this selection, which is part of the incidental music which he wrote for Daudet's play, is as fine and rich in melody as any of his compositions. It is filled with the spirit of the Provence, and is iexquisite in its colorful character. Each of the four parts, prelude, minuetto, adagietto and carillon, is a gem in itself, and the entire suite, played as it was last night, as an unfailing source of keenest pleasure.

The solosit was Miss Laeta Hartley, an American pianist who had never been heard in this city before. She made many friends, however, both by her simple, charming manner and by her ability at the piano. Her selection was Saint-Saen's second concerto in G minor, which requires special nimblenes and accuracy, and she played it with marked symphony, displaying a delicacy of touch combined with assurance of control that won immediate admiration and warm aproval from her audience. It is no mean test of ability, and it was rendered in a most satisfying manner by both the soloist and the orchestra.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 28 1915
884

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler the great violinist, who will then make his first appearance of the season here. Kreisler will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D Major.

The orchestral numbers will be the urth Symphony of Brahms, Bizet's quisite "L'Arlesienne" Suite. The ahms Symphony in E Minor No. 4, s been for a number of years in a ise the Cinderella of the symphonic aily. Pedants in the first place obted to the key in which it was writ saying that it was improper to come a symphony in such a key. Oth found it turgid and cryptic, al igh the bitterest enemies of Brahms to admit that the slow movement one of ethereal beauty. The great uctors of the world, however, have always had great admiration for this symphony, and now the public is beginning rapidly to respond to its charm.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date EC 4 - 1915

FRITZ KREISLER RECEIVES OVATION

Is Assisting Artist with Bostonp Symhony.

PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO WITH NOBILITY OF TONE

Perfection Attained by Boston Orchestra Splendidly Exemplified Throughout the Programme —Concert One of the Most Enjoyable of the Season.

The second Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large audience that was highly enthusiastic throughout the evening, each orchestral number receiving great applause, as did the playing of Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, or rather assisting artist, of the evening.

Mr. Kreisler received an ovation on his appearance for the third number on the programme, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 77. The artist was at his best and the three movements were played with all the mobility of tone, marvelous technique and exquisite artistic conception that has placed Mr. Kreisler on the highest artistic plane. The applause was deafening and sustained at the end.

The orchestral numbers began with Mozart's Symphony in E flat and was followed by Rachmaninoff's "Die Toteninsel" (The Island of the Dead), a symphonic tone poem for full orchestra, to the picture of A. Backlin, opus 29, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," opus 27.

The degree of perfection attained by this body of artists was splendidly exemplified last night throughout. The magnificence of voice, precision in the difficult and involved harmonies in Rachmaninoff's tone poem, and the exquisite melodies of the symphony and overture made last night's concert one of the most enjoyable that has been heard in some time.

The orchestral part in the Kreisler number was handled by Dr. Muck in a masterly manner.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date NOV 28 1915

Establi

KREISLER AS SOLOIST

FRITZ KREISLER will make his first appearance of the year here on wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else. In them his genius shines the brightest. His melodic inventon was never more wonderful and in his skill as a composer he so wrote that despite the small orchestra he uses, the symphonies are today full of modern feeling. There is little choice among the three. Some prefer the "Jupiter," some prefer the G minor and some the E flat, but they are all of ineffable beauty.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninoff is easily the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel." The chances are that this work will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The poem is one of extraordinary beauty and is well worthy of more frequent performances than it has. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Der Toteninsel."
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

NING SUN

ltimore, Md.

NOV 27 1915

LER TO APPEAR HERE WEDNESDAY

e Soloist At Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART WORK ON PROGRAM

Symphonic Poem By Rachmaninoff, Regarded As Greatest Living Russian Composer, To Be Played.

Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the year here next Wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D Major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543). Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else.

Regarded As Greatest Of Russians.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninff is regarded by many as the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany, the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel."

When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The concert will close with Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous V more, Md.

---

1915

PROGRAM BY STON SYMPHONY

Concert at Lyric Well Attended; Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Baltimore series of the season at the Lyric last night. The program was quite interesting, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the special soloist, was applauded an unusually long time. The audience filled the house.

Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543) is heard seldom enough to have been enjoyable last night. Its comparative simplicity of construction, its brightness and Mozart's particular individualty made it much more welcome than another repetition at this time of the oft-repeated Beethoven symphonies. It would be well, particularly in these days of transition in musical art, if other such works were played more often.

The Island of the Dead, a symphonic poem by Rachmaninoff, suggested by the picture of that name by A Bocklin, is a tonal work from contemplation of which it is hard to turn. Here is modern music in keeping with the present age—neither an echo of ancient days nor, literally speaking, the shadow of coming events. To attempt to describe it would be far harder than to attempt to describe the gripping picture which inspired it. The simplicity of the emotion, yet its deep moving power defy words for communication of its full appreciation. When one hears such music he wonders how much further musical art is able to go along present lines, and if, after all, it will be necessary in future to resort to such a method as just suggested by the youthful Leo Ornstein.

It seemed a pity to have to turn immediately from such a work to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, fine as the concerto is. The concerto itself is moving music, and Kreisler played it exceedingly well and with excellent support by the orchestra.

Mendelssohn's overture, Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage, closed the program rather ineffectively. It seemed insipid after the other music.

J. N. H.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

DEC 2 - 1915

PROGRAM PLEASES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard At Its Best.

Judicious Blending Of Ancient And Modern Schools; Kreisler Receives A Great Ovation.

It is doubtful whether any concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late years has been so heartily enjoyed as that at the Lyric last night, and this was the result of a most fortunate combination of circumstances. For one thing, Fritz Kreisler was the soloist; the playing of the orchestra was peculiarly finished and sympathetic even for this unique organization, and finally, the program was one of singular attraction and nicety of balance. For the last two years, indeed, Dr. Muck's programs have shown a consistent endeavor to give Baltimore a judicious blend of the best of both ancient and modern schools, and such criticisms as have been freely expressed in the past as to this conductor's seemingly careless flinging on to this city of whatever music happened to suit his mood at the moment must surely now, in common justice, cease.

The concert opened with Mozart's E-flat Symphony—one of the three which have, by universal consent, been rescued from the general internment of the composer's remaining 46 symphonies; but of these three the one performed last night is certainly the least striking.

Of its two contemporaries, that commonly known as the Jupiter Symphony has a pervading dignity and a certain godlike aloofness which more or less justifies its title, and, moreover, its finale stands for all time as a monument of orchestral counterpoint, while the other—the G minor, the first great emotional symphony given to the world—is full of a tender subtlety of feeling quite modern at times in its intensity. The E-flat Symphony, on the other hand, is bathed in almost uninterrupted sunshine and its claims to distinction lie in the unusual impressiveness of its introduction, the energy and individuality of its last movement and the exquisite grace and balance of its slender scoring throughout. This is, by the bye, the only symphony without oboe parts in the musical repertoire of today.

Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," which came next on the program, is in many respects the most inspired work that has yet issued from this composer's pen. There is a powerful weirdness of coloring, a curiously tense atmosphere and a peculiar suggestion of desolation, especially at the beginning, which made a profound impression on the audience. Many of the harmonic progressions are most original and beautiful, but never, as is the case with so many modern compositions, exaggerated or eccentric.

Fritz Kreisler, who played the now almost hackneyed Tschaikowsky concerto in D, was at his finest once again last night. There is in this artist a steady and perpetual flow of nspiration above and beyond his immense technical equipment, whic gives him a place altogether uniqu among executants of the present da and he was accorded such an ovation both before and after his pe formance as has seldom been wi nessed even at these concerts.

H. D. P.

From EVENING SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date DEC 1 - 1915

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Fritz Kreisler Will Be Soloist At Concert At Lyric.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 this evening, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The program is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Die Toteninsel" (symphonic poem).
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date NOV 24 1915

Es 1884

SECOND CONCERT SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Hartley, Pianist, Pleased.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night and Infantry Hall was well filled with an appreciative audience. It was an all instrumental programme that was presented, with a pianist as soloist, and that combination does not always appeal as strongly to many as a more diversified arrangement of musicians. On this occasion, however, the audience left the hall quite satisfied with what had been heard in two hours of continuous pleasure.

The programme was carefully planned and well balanced, reflecting more than ordinarily the skill of Dr. Muck in that respect. The symphony was serious and difficult, while the remaining numbers were of the lighter sort, all being brilliant, bright and melodious. The programme was played in the following order:

Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; Berlioz, Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 22; Bizet, Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Music to Alphonse Daudet's play.

The Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor is not as popular as most compositions that are rendered more frequently. Dr. Muck, however, does not seem to share in that feeling concerning this selection, for he has shown evidence of keen admiration for Brahms in all his moods, and has been particularly successful in interpreting his music to the public. The marked feature of this symphony is its slow movement, and it possesses a beauty that cannot fail to be appreciated by real lovers of music of the highest grade. The unique character of the last part of the selection also marks it as distinctive, the composer having used as a basis the ancient Passacaglia dance. Altogether this symphony is well worth hearing when it is played as it should be, and there was nothing lacking in the expression with which it was rendered last night. It has still further charm for many because it is the last work of the kind that Brahms produced, and so forms in a sense a special memorial to his genius.

In the second half of the programme three French composers were represented, the trio who stand highest in musical honor in that land. Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Bizet are names to inspire any musician, and the grouping of the three as a section of a programme was a happy idea that worked to a charm.

Berlioz contributed the overture to the "Roman Carnival," which shows clearly and skillfully the gayety of the carnival time in ancient Rome when the population in light holiday mood sallied forth to enjoy the festival. There is a fanciful strain running through the muisc, and the great composer must have been in a happy frame when he created this masterpiece of wild, care-free melody.

The other orchestral number and the final one on the programme, was the Bizet selection, his first "L'Arlesienne" suite. This composer's name is associated inseparably with the music of "Carmen," but this selection, which is part of the incidental music which he wrote for Daudet's play, is as fine and rich in melody as any of his compositions. It is filled with the spirit of the Provence, and is iexquisite in its colorful character. Each of the four parts, prelude, minuetto, adagietto and carillon, is a gem in itself, and the entire suite, played as it was last night, as an unfailing source of keenest pleasure.

The soloist was Miss Laeta Hartley, an American pianist who had never been heard in this city before. She made many friends, however, both by her simple, charming manner and by her ability at the piano. Her selection was Saint-Saen's second concerto in G minor, which requires special nimblenes and accuracy, and she played it with marked symphony, displaying a delicacy of touch combined with assurance of control that won immediate admiration and warm aproval from her audience. It is no mean test of ability, and it was rendered in a most satisfying manner by both the soloist and the orchestra.

From POST

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date NOV 28 1915

884

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler the great iolinist, who will then make his first ppearance of the season here. Kreis- r will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant oncerto in D Major.

The orchestral numbers will be the ourth Symphony of Brahms, Bizet's quisite "L'Arlesienne" Suite. The ahms Symphony in E Minor No. 4, s been for a number of years in a ise the Cinderella of the symphonic nily. Pedants in the first place ob- ted to the key in which it was written, saying that it was improper to com- e a symphony in such a key. Oth- found it turgid and cryptic, al- gh the bitterest enemies of Brahms to admit that the slow movement one of ethereal beauty. The great uctors of the world, however, have always had great admiration for this symphony, and now the public is beginning rapidly to respond to its charm.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date EC 4

FRITZ KREISLE RECEIVES OVA

Is Assisting Artist with Bostonp Symhony.

PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO WITH NOBILITY OF TONE

Perfection Attained by Boston Orchestra Splendidly Exemplified Throughout the Programme —Concert One of the Most Enjoyable of the Season.

The second Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large audience that was highly enthusiastic throughout the evening, each orchestral number receiving great applause, as did the playing of Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, or rather assisting artist, of the evening.

Mr. Kreisler received an ovation on his appearance for the third number on the programme, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 77. The artist was at his best and the three movements were played with all the mobility of tone, marvelous technique and exquisite artistic conception that has placed Mr. Kreisler on the highest artistic plane. The applause was deafening and sustained at the end.

The orchestral numbers began with Mozart's Symphony in E flat and was followed by Rachmaninoff's "Die Toteninsel" (The Island of the Dead), a symphonic tone poem for full orchestra, to the picture of A. Backlin, opus 29, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," opus 27.

The degree of perfection attained by this body of artists was splendidly exemplified last night throughout. The magnificence of voice, precision in the difficult and involved harmonies in Rachmaninoff's tone poem, and the exquisite melodies of the symphony and overture made last night's concert one of the most enjoyable that has been heard in some time.

The orchestral part in th number was handled by Dr. masterly manner.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2 8 19

Establi

KREISLER AS SOLOIST

FRITZ KREISLER will make his first appearance of the year here on Wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else. In them his genius shines the brightest. His melodic inventon was never more wonderful and in his skill as a composer he so wrote that despite the small orchestra he uses, the symphonies are today full of modern feeling. There is little choice among the three. Some prefer the "Jupiter," some prefer the G minor and some the E flat, but they are all of ineffable beauty.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninoff is easily the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel." The chances are that this work will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The poem is one of extraordinary beauty and is well worthy of more frequent performances than it has. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Der Toteninsel."
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm Prosperous Voyage."

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2 7 1915

Estal

KREISLER TO APPEAR HERE WEDNESDAY

Will Be Soloist At Concert Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART WORK ON PROGRAM

Symphonic Poem By Rachmaninoff, Regarded As Greatest Living Russian Composer, To Be Played.

Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the year here next Wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D Major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543). Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else.

Regarded As Greatest Of Russians.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninff is regarded by many as the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany, the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel."

When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The concert will close with Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible] 1915

Estab

GOOD PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert at Lyric Well Attended; Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Baltimore series of the season at the Lyric last night. The program was quite interesting, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the special soloist, was applauded an unusually long time. The audience filled the house.

Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543) is heard seldom enough to have been enjoyable last night. Its comparative simplicity of construction, its brightness and Mozart's particular individualty made it much more welcome than another repetition at this time of the oft-repeated Beethoven symphonies. It would be well, particularly in these days of transition in musical art, if other such works were played more often.

The Island of the Dead, a symphonic poem by Rachmaninoff, suggested by the picture of that name by A Bocklin, is a tonal work from contemplation of which it is hard to turn. Here is modern music in keeping with the present age—neither an echo of ancient days nor, literally speaking, the shadow of coming events. To attempt to describe it would be far harder than to attempt to describe the gripping picture which inspired it. The simplicity of the emotion, yet its deep moving power defy words for communication of its full appreciation. When one hears such music he wonders how much further musical art is able to go along present lines, and if, after all, it will be necessary in future to resort to such a method as just suggested by the youthful Leo Ornstein.

It seemed a pity to have to turn immediately from such a work to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, fine as the concerto is. The concerto itself is moving music, and Kreisler played it exceedingly well and with excellent support by the orchestra.

Mendelssohn's overture, Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage, closed the program rather ineffectively. It seemed insipid after the other music.

J. N. H.

EWS
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 2 - 1915

PROGRAM PLEASES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard At Its Best.

Judicious Blending Of Ancient And Modern Schools; Kreisler Receives A Great Ovation.

It is doubtful whether any concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late years has been so heartily enjoyed as that at the Lyric last night, and this was the result of a most fortunate combination of circumstances. For one thing, Fritz Kreisler was the soloist; the playing of the orchestra was peculiarly finished and sympathetic even for this unique organization, and finally, the program was one of singular attraction and nicety of balance. For the last two years, indeed, Dr. Muck's programs have shown a consistent endeavor to give Baltimore a judicious blend of the best of both ancient and modern schools, and such criticisms as have been freely expressed in the past as to this conductor's seemingly careless flinging on to this city of whatever music happened to suit his mood at the moment must surely now, in common justice, cease.

The concert opened with Mozart's E-flat Symphony—one of the three which have, by universal consent, been rescued from the general internment of the composer's remaining 46 symphonies; but of these three the one performed last night is certainly the least striking.

Of its two contemporaries, that commonly known as the Jupiter Symphony has a pervading dignity and a certain godlike aloofness which more or less justifies its title, and, moreover, its finale stands for all time as a monument of orchestral counterpoint, while the other—the G minor, the first great emotional symphony given to the world—is full of a tender subtlety of feeling quite modern at times in its intensity. The E-flat Symphony, on the other hand, is bathed in almost uninterrupted sunshine and its claims to distinction lie in the unusual impressiveness of its introduction, the energy and individuality of its last movement and the exquisite grace and balance of its slender scoring throughout. This is, by the bye, the only symphony without oboe parts in the musical repertoire of today.

Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," which came next on the program, is in many respects the most inspired work that has yet issued from this composer's pen. There is a powerful weirdness of coloring, a curiously tense atmosphere and a peculiar suggestion of desolation, especially at the beginning, which made a profound impression on the audience. Many of the harmonic progressions are most original and beautiful, but never, as is the case with so many modern compositions, exaggerated or eccentric.

Fritz Kreisler, who played the now almost hackneyed Tschaikowsky concerto in D, was at his finest once again last night. There is in this artist a steady and perpetual flow of inspiration above and beyond his immense technical equipment, whic gives him a place altogether uniqu among executants of the present da and he was accorded such an ov tion both before and after his pe formance as has seldom been wi nessed even at these concerts.

H. D. P.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 1 - 1915

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Fritz Kreisler Will Be Soloist At Concert At Lyric.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 this evening, and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. The program is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Die Toteninsel" (symphonic poem).
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 24 191

Es 1884

SECOND CONCERT SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Hartley, Pianist, Pleased.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night and Infantry Hall was well filled with an appreciative audience. It was an all instrumental programme that was presented, with a pianist as soloist, and that combination does not always appeal as strongly to many as a more diversified arrangement of musicians. On this occasion, however, the audience left the hall quite satisfied with what had been heard in two hours of continuous pleasure.

The programme was carefully planned and well balanced, reflecting more than ordinarily the skill of Dr. Muck in that respect. The symphony was serious and difficult, while the remaining numbers were of the lighter sort, all being brilliant, bright and melodious. The programme was played in the following order:

Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; Berlioz, Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 22; Bizet, Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Music to Alphonse Daudet's play.

The Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor is not as popular as most compositions that are rendered more frequently. Dr. Muck, however, does not seem to share in that feeling concerning this selection, for he has shown evidence of keen admiration for Brahms in all his moods, and has been particularly successful in interpreting his music to the public. The marked feature of this symphony is its slow movement, and it possesses a beauty that cannot fail to be appreciated by real lovers of music of the highest grade. The unique character of the last part of the selection also marks it as distinctive, the composer having used as a basis the ancient Passacaglia dance. Altogether this symphony is well worth hearing when it is played as it should be, and there was nothing lacking in the expression with which it was rendered last night. It has still further charm for many because it is the last work of the kind that Brahms produced, and so forms in a sense a special memorial to his genius.

In the second half of the programme three French composers were represented, the trio who stand highest in musical honor in that land. Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Bizet are names to inspire any musician, and the grouping of the three as a section of a programme was a happy idea that worked to a charm.

Berlioz contributed the overture to the "Roman Carnival," which shows clearly and skillfully the gayety of the carnival time in ancient Rome when the population in light holiday mood sallied forth to enjoy the festival. There is a fanciful strain running through the muisc, and the great composer must have been in a happy frame when he created this masterpiece of wild, care-free melody.

The other orchestral number and the final one on the programme, was the Bizet selection, his first "L'Arlesienne" suite. This composer's name is associated inseparably with the music of "Carmen," but this selection, which is part of the incidental music which he wrote for Daudet's play, is as fine and rich in melody as any of his compositions. It is filled with the spirit of the Provence, and is exquisite in its colorful character. Each of the four parts, prelude, minuetto, adagietto and carillon, is a gem in itself, and the entire suite, played as it was last night, as an unfailing source of keenest pleasure.

The solosit was Miss Laeta Hartley, an American pianist who had never been heard in this city before. She made many friends, however, both by her simple, charming manner and by her ability at the piano. Her selection was Saint-Saen's second concerto in G minor, which requires special nimblenes and accuracy, and she played it with marked symphony, displaying a delicacy of touch combined with assurance of control that won immediate admiration and warm aproval from her audience. It is no mean test of ability, and it was rendered in a most satisfying manner by both the soloist and the orchestra.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 2 8 191

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler the great iolinist, who will then make his first ppearance of the season here. Kreis- er will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant oncerto in D Major.

The orchestral numbers will be the urth Symphony of Brahms, Bizet's quisite "L'Arlesienne" Suite. The ahms Symphony in E Minor No. 4, s been for a number of years in a ise the Cinderella of the symphonic aily. Pedants in the first place obted to the key in which it was writ- saying that it was improper to com- e a symphony in such a key. Oth- found it turgid and cryptic, al- igh the bitterest enemies of Brahms to admit that the slow movement one of ethereal beauty. The great uctors of the world, however, have always had great admiration for this symphony, and now the public is beginning rapidly to respond to its charm.

884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 4

Es

FRITZ KREISL RECEIVES OVA

Is Assisting Artist with Bostonp Symhony.

PLAYS BRAHMS' CONCERTO WITH NOBILITY OF TONE

Perfection Attained by Boston Orchestra Splendidly Exemplified Throughout the Programme —Concert One of the Most Enjoyable of the Season.

The second Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, was given last night at the Academy of Music, before a very large audience that was highly enthusiastic throughout the evening, each orchestral number receiving great applause, as did the playing of Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist, or rather assisting artist, of the evening.

Mr. Kreisler received an ovation on his appearance for the third number on the programme, Brahms' Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, opus 77. The artist was at his best and the three movements were played with all the mobility of tone, marvelous technique and exquisite artistic conception that has placed Mr. Kreisler on the highest artistic plane. The applause was deafening and sustained at the end.

The orchestral numbers began with Mozart's Symphony in E flat and was followed by Rachmaninoff's "Die Toteninsel" (The Island of the Dead), a symphonic tone poem for full orchestra, to the picture of A. Backlin, opus 29, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," opus 27.

The degree of perfection attained by this body of artists was splendidly exemplified last night throughout. The magnificence of voice, precision in the difficult and involved harmonies in Rachmaninoff's tone poem, and the exquisite melodies of the symphony and overture made last night's concert one of the most enjoyable that has been heard in some time.

The orchestral part in th number was handled by Dr.
masterly manner.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 2 8 19

Establi

KREISLER AS SOLOIST

FRITZ KREISLER will make his first appearance of the year here on Wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead;" Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else. In them his genius shines the brightest. His melodic inventon was never more wonderful and in his skill as a composer he so wrote that despite the small orchestra he uses, the symphonies are today full of modern feeling. There is little choice among the three. Some prefer the "Jupiter," some prefer the G minor and some the E flat, but they are all of ineffable beauty.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninoff is easily the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel." The chances are that this work will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The poem is one of extraordinary beauty and is well worthy of more frequent performances than it has. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Der Toteninsel."
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm a Prosperous Voyage."

From EVENING SU
Address: Baltim
Date

Estal

KREISLER TO HERE WED

Will Be Soloist At Concert O Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART WORK ON PROGRAM

Symphonic Poem By Rachmaninoff, Regarded As Greatest Living Russian Composer, To Be Played.

Fritz Kreisler will make his first appearance of the year here next Wednesday night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert in the Lyric Theatre. He will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D Major.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of extraordinary beauty and interest. It comprises Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543). Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "The Isle of the Dead," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and Mendelssohn's overture "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

The three great symphonies of Mozart, which were written in the space of less than a year, those in C major, G minor and E flat, would have been sufficient to insure him immortality had he written nothing else.

Regarded As Greatest Of Russians.

Of the living Russian composers Sergei Rachmaninff is regarded by many as the foremost, and despite the fact that he was for many years a resident of Germany, the racial traits of his music are very strong. In his symphonic poem that Dr. Muck is to play he has drawn his inspiration from that remarkable picture of the Swiss painter, Arnold Bocklin, "Der Toteninsel."

When Rachmaninoff came to this country a few years ago as a guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he conducted the poem in Boston, but at the Baltimore concert he simply appeared as the piano soloist. The concert will close with Mendelssohn's overture "Sea-
Calm and Prosperous V

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 1915

Estab

GOOD PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert at Lyric Well Attended; Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Baltimore series of the season at the Lyric last night. The program was quite interesting, and Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the special soloist, was applauded an unusually long time. The audience filled the house.

Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543) is heard seldom enough to have been enjoyable last night. Its comparative simplicity of construction, its brightness and Mozart's particular individualty made it much more welcome than another repetition at this time of the oft-repeated Beethoven symphonies. It would be well, particularly in these days of transition in musical art, if other such works were played more often.

The Island of the Dead, a symphonic poem by Rachmaninoff, suggested by the picture of that name by A Bocklin, is a tonal work from contemplation of which it is hard to turn. Here is modern music in keeping with the present age—neither an echo of ancient days nor, literally speaking, the shadow of coming events. To attempt to describe it would be far harder than to attempt to describe the gripping picture which inspired it. The simplicity of the emotion, yet its deep moving power defy words for communication of its full appreciation. When one hears such music he wonders how much further musical art is able to go along present lines, and if, after all, it will be necessary in future to resort to such a method as just suggested by the youthful Leo Ornstein.

It seemed a pity to have to turn immediately from such a work to Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, fine as the concerto is. The concerto itself is moving music, and Kreisler played it exceedingly well and with excellent support by the orchestra.

Mendelssohn's overture, Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage, closed the program rather ineffectively. It seemed insipid after the other music.

J. N. H.

From NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 2 - 1915

stablis

PROGRAM PLEASES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard At Its Best.

Judicious Blending Of Ancient And Modern Schools; Kreisler Receives A Great Ovation.

It is doubtful whether any concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late years has been so heartily enjoyed as that at the Lyric last night, and this was the result of a most fortunate combination of circumstances. For one thing, Fritz Kreisler was the soloist; the playing of the orchestra was peculiarly finished and sympathetic even for this unique organization, and finally, the program was one of singular attraction and nicety of balance. For the last two years, indeed, Dr. Muck's programs have shown a consistent endeavor to give Baltimore a judicious blend of the best of both ancient and modern schools, and such criticisms as have been freely expressed in the past as to this conductor's seemingly careless flinging on to this city of whatever music happened to suit his mood at the moment must surely now, in common justice, cease.

The concert opened with Mozart's E-flat Symphony—one of the three which have, by universal consent, been rescued from the general internment of the composer's remaining 46 symphonies; but of these three the one performed last night is certainly the least striking.

Of its two contemporaries, that commonly known as the Jupiter Symphony has a pervading dignity and a certain godlike aloofness which more or less justifies its title, and, moreover, its finale stands for all time as a monument of orchestral counterpoint, while the other—the G minor, the first great emotional symphony given to the world—is full of a tender subtlety of feeling quite modern at times in its intensity. The E-flat Symphony, on the other hand, is bathed in almost uninterrupted sunshine and its claims to distinction lie in the unusual impressiveness of its introduction, the energy and individuality of its last movement and the exquisite grace and balance of its slender scoring throughout. This is, by the bye, the only symphony without oboe parts in the musical repertoire of today.

Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," which came next on the program, is in many respects the most inspired work that has yet issued from this composer's pen. There is a powerful weirdness of coloring, a curiously tense atmosphere and a peculiar suggestion of desolation, especially at the beginning, which made a profound impression on the audience. Many of the harmonic progressions are most original and beautiful, but never, as is the case with so many modern compositions, exaggerated or eccentric.

Fritz Kreisler, who played the now almost hackneyed Tschaikowsky concerto in D, was at his finest once again last night. There is in this artist a steady and perpetual flow of inspiration above and beyond his immense technical equipment, which gives him a place altogether unique among executants of the present day, and he was accorded such an ovation both before and after his performance as has seldom been witnessed even at these concerts.

H. D. P.

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date DEC 1

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY TON

Fritz Kreisler Will Be Soloist Concert At Lyric.

The second concert of the Bos Symphony Orchestra will take place the Lyric Theatre at 8.15 this even and Fritz Kreisler will be the solo The program is as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in E flat.
Rachmaninoff—"Die Toteninsel" (symphonic poem).
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin and orchestra.
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 24 191

Es 1884

SECOND CONCERT SATISFYING

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Hartley, Pianist, Pleased.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night and Infantry Hall was well filled with an appreciative audience. It was an all instrumental programme that was presented, with a pianist as soloist, and that combination does not always appeal as strongly to many as a more diversified arrangement of musicians. On this occasion, however, the audience left the hall quite satisfied with what had been heard in two hours of continuous pleasure.

The programme was carefully planned and well balanced, reflecting more than ordinarily the skill of Dr. Muck in that respect. The symphony was serious and difficult, while the remaining numbers were of the lighter sort, all being brilliant, bright and melodious. The programme was played in the following order:

Brahms, Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; Berlioz, Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9; Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 22; Bizet, Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, Music to Alphonse Daudet's play.

The Brahms Fourth Symphony in E minor is not as popular as most compositions that are rendered more frequently. Dr. Muck, however, does not seem to share in that feeling concerning this selection, for he has shown evidence of keen admiration for Brahms in all his moods, and has been particularly successful in interpreting his music to the public. The marked feature of this symphony is its slow movement, and it possesses a beauty that cannot fail to be appreciated by real lovers of music of the highest grade. The unique character of the last part of the selection also marks it as distinctive, the composer having used as a basis the ancient Passacaglia dance. Altogether this symphony is well worth hearing when it is played as it should be, and there was nothing lacking in the expression with which it was rendered last night. It has still further charm for many because it is the last work of the kind that Brahms produced, and so forms in a sense a special memorial to his genius.

In the second half of the programme three French composers were represented, the trio who stand highest in musical honor in that land. Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Bizet are names to inspire any musician, and the grouping of the three as a section of a programme was a happy idea that worked to a charm.

Berlioz contributed the overture to the "Roman Carnival," which shows clearly and skillfully the gayety of the carnival time in ancient Rome when the population in light holiday mood sallied forth to enjoy the festival. There is a fanciful strain running through the muisc, and the great composer must have been in a happy frame when he created this masterpiece of wild, care-free melody.

The other orchestral number and the final one on the programme, was the Bizet selection, his first "L'Arlesienne" suite. This composer's name is associated inseparably with the music of "Carmen," but this selection, which is part of the incidental music which he wrote for Daudet's play, is as fine and rich in melody as any of his compositions. It is filled with the spirit of the Provence, and is iexquisite in its colorful character. Each of the four parts, prelude, minuetto, adagietto and carillon, is a gem in itself, and the entire suite, played as it was last night, as an unfailing source of keenest pleasure.

The solosit was Miss Laeta Hartley, an American pianist who had never been heard in this city before. She made many friends, however, both by her simple, charming manner and by her ability at the piano. Her selection was Saint-Saen's second concerto in G minor, which requires special nimblenes and accuracy, and she played it with marked symphony, displaying a delicacy of touch combined with assurance of control that won immediate admiration and warm aproval from her audience. It is no mean test of ability, and it was rendered in a most satisfying manner by both the soloist and the orchestra.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 2 8 191

Est 1884

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler the great violinist, who will then make his first appearance of the season here. Kreisler will play Tschaikowsky's brilliant Concerto in D Major.

The orchestral numbers will be the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, Bizet's exquisite "L'Arlesienne" Suite. The Brahms Symphony in E Minor No. 4, has been for a number of years in a sense the Cinderella of the symphonic family. Pedants in the first place objected to the key in which it was written saying that it was improper to compose a symphony in such a key. Others found it turgid and cryptic, although the bitterest enemies of Brahms had to admit that the slow movement was one of ethereal beauty. The great conductors of the world, however, have always had great admiration for this symphony, and now the public is beginning rapidly to respond to its charm.

[61]

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted its usual large and fashionable audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador was among the box holders, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Norman Williams and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt-Trachenberg. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had among the guests in their box Lady Spring-Rice and Mrs. Robert Lansing. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, in one of the stage boxes, entertained Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Mabel Johnson and the Misses Denys. In the stage box on the opposite side of the house were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. George Howard and Mrs. Rollins Morse. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, her guests including Mrs. Seaton Schroeder and Miss Patten. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had with them in their box Mrs. Charles H. Robb, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, Mrs. Frank Freeman and Miss Harpmann. Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. and Mrs. Myron Whitney and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. Henry Brown, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mr. Arnold Hague, Miss Alice Shepard, Mrs. James Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Marcus Hanna, Miss Phelps, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and her mother, Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Slater, Mrs. John H. Purdy, Mrs. Thomas Sweeney, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Mendeville Carlisle, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Sophie Siebert, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Keyser, Mrs. C. C. Clover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. Leutze, Miss Leutze, Mrs. De Frees Critten, Mrs. John C. Simpson, Mrs. A. W. Bagley, Mrs. Henry Fitch, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Miss Margaret Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Carpenter, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Lee, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Margaret Breckinridge, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mrs. Andrew Peters, Mr. Conti, Miss Sargent, Mrs. Rapley, Miss Hickey, Miss Cannon and Miss Julia Scott.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 5 - 1915

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted its usual large and fashionable audience to the National Theater. The German Ambassador was among the box holders, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Norman Williams and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt-Trachenberg. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had among the guests in their box Lady Spring-Rice and Mrs. Robe Lansing. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Wa Denys, in one of the stage boxes, entertained Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Mis Mabel Johnson and the Misses Denys. I the stage box on the opposite side of th house were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrenc Townsend, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mr George Howard and Mrs. Rollins Mors Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a par in Mrs. McMillan's box, her guests in cluding Mrs. Seaton Schroeder and Mi Patten. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had wi them in their box Mrs. Charles H. Rob Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, Mrs. Fran Freeman and Miss Harpmann. Mr Mahlon Pitney, Mr. and Mrs. Myr Whitney and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. Henry Brown, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mr. Arnold Hague, Miss Alice Shepard, Mrs. James Harlan Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Marcus Hanna, Miss Phelps, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and her mother, Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Slater, Mrs. John H. Purdy, Mrs. Thomas Sweeney, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Mendeville Carlisle, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Sophie Siebert, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Kyser, Mrs. C. C. Glover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. Leutze, Miss Leutze, Mrs. De Fress Critten, Mrs. John C. Simpson, Mrs. A. W. Bagley, Mrs. Henry Fitch, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Miss Margaret Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Carpenter, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Lee, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Margaret Breckinridge, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mrs. Andrew Peters, Mr. Conti, Miss Sargent, Mrs. Rapley, Miss Hickey, Miss Cannon and Miss Julia Scott.

[illegible] Franklin gave a tea Wed-

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

KREISLER CHARMS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Boston Orchestra and Violinist Heard in Program of Pleasing Numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's magnificent rendering of Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major was easily the feature of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, and Mr. Kreisler's surmounting of the technical difficulties was a triumph of virtuosity.

Moreover the applause which greeted him seemed to be the expression of sincere affection as well as a tribute to his power and charm as a musician. The finale, with its interwoven Russian folk songs was given in a particularly brilliant manner.

The second movement of Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, which was the closing number of the program, was easily the most delightful part of the orchestral program and was distinguished by delicacy and grace of execution. The symphony of the afternoon, Brahms' No. 4, in E minor, was of a character to appeal to the intellect rather than to the emotions.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 26 1915

PADEREWSKI AS COMPOSER.

Famous Pianist to Appear Here, December 1.

If Paderewski were not the astonishing pianist that he is, his fame would be secure as a composer. As it is, he is like Liszt; because he is the greatest virtuoso of his time, the public has been slow to appreciate his genius as composer. This is all the more interesting since he at one time gave up all idea of being a pianist and decided to devote himself entirely to composition. It was not until he was twenty-four that he set himself seriously at work to perfect the technique that has brought him fame and fortune; and then it was because he was urged to do so by his friend and countrywoman, Helena Modjeska. He has to his credit a concerto for piano and orchestra, a fantasia for the same, a sonata and a set of variations for piano alone, an opera, and a symphony. When he came to America in 1908 the errand which brought him was to have his symphony performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. By that organization it was played in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It has also been played with much success since in London, Paris, Leipsic, Warsaw and Philadelphia. Paderewski will give a concert in Foot Guard hall, Wednesday evening, December 1. Tickets are now on sale at Watkins Brothers, Inc., No. 239 Asylum street.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist at Orchestra Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, was given yesterday evening at the National theater.

The numbers on the program were Brahms' Symphony in E minor (No. 4.); Tschaikowski's Concert in D major for violin, and a suite (No. 1), of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne." Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist of the occasion, received a tremendous ovation.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave its second concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist as soloist. Brahms' "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 4), and Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," were the orchestral numbers of the program, with Tschaikowski's "Concerto in D Major" as the offering of the soloist, supported by the orchestra. The appearance of Mr. Kreisler was greeted with a great volume of applause, which was renewed with even greater vigor at the close of his number. There were those who declared that the symphony, which is said to be too profound for appreciation by the average audience, was, on this occasion, quite within reach of lovers of music, and really enjoyable. The Bizet selection, however, was thought to have possessed greater charm.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH KREISLER

Great Violinist Plays Beethoven Concerto After the Bruckner Symphony

PROGRAM:

Bruckner...........Symphony, E major, No. 7
Beethoven............Concerto for violin, op.61

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy last night, consisted of only two numbers. These were sufficient to provide two hours of undissembled enjoyment.

The Bruckner Symphony took about an hour and a quarter to play. Like the Fourth Symphony, played by our own orchestra a year ago, the work is easily chargeable with an overopulence of material, and with a lack of long-continued dominant motives—in other words, it may seem to be a succession of picturesque episodes lacking co-ordination. The lay listener is likely to feel that it is not easy for the ear to seize upon and remember any very definite themes; yet there certainly is plenty of melody and harmony and constant movement.

The first movement abounds in free and flowing melody for the strings, broken by the interpretation of flute and oboe. There is a vigorously independent use of the second violins, a marked characteristic of the whole work. The adagio is beautiful, and at times sublime. It is distinguished for the use of the four "Bayreuth tubas" that were seen in the background, and heard with their big and rich and solemn voices in the forefront. They resembled in outward aspect elongated French horns with the throats of slender tubas. Their presence emphasized the Wagnerian atmosphere and concept of parts of the symphony.

The Scherzo has the dimensions—though not the character—of similar movements in the symphonies of Brahms; its spirit is as playful as the starving muse of the master knew how to achieve, yet in dimensions the movement is built on the heroic model. The finale is enriched by splendid effects of the choral voices of the aforesaid tubas, against a marching dignity of the plucked strings of the basses and the cellos. It is a noble work—and one is a little bewildered that contemporary critics should have been so consistently cruel to the poor, humble composer who progressed from 75 cents a month to 60 cents an hour, in his long life as musical pedagogue. That his music could have kept so much of serenity and sweetness speaks for a nature not embittered by loneliness and unkind tongues, and should endear him with posterity, though he was so often denied and decried and disappointed in his lifetime.

Kreisler played gloriously. It was a man of sorrows that confronted the audience while the orchestra played the introductory passage—a man into whose soul the iron and blood of war have entered, whose nature was deeply seamed and seared by that of which he was a part at Lemberg in Galicia. The music he made grew more and more beautiful to hear as it proceeded. When he reached the cadenza, and the violin outsoared alone, the warm, throbbing, human voice of the instrument said the soul's inmost in tones of a luscious and melting eloquence: it was a movement within a movement, a little separate crown-jewel of loveliness encased by Kreisler's hand in a Beethoven setting.

The first theme, taken for the main idea, was elaborated upon and embroidered without gilding refined gold or painting the lily, but with supreme reticence and good taste, in the temper of the work whence it outgrew like a flower. The Larghetto, with the violin's running commentary upon the orchestral milieu, passed without a break into the inspired scamper of the Rondo with another dazzling cadenza of apeggios. Technically brilliant as the execution was from first to last, there was found not room for personal display: there was neither meretricious cunning nor vainglory. Here was a man with a message to deliver and a meaning to communicate, through the medium of the greatest music written for the violin with the orchestra, and the severest test of the character and ideals of the exponent.

Mr. Kreisler emerged from the ordeal a greater figure in his art—and not merely in the regard of his audience—than ever. He was applauded to the echo, it is needless to remark: and the sound that he called into being for his enraptured audience last evening lingers and is exquisite, still.

The accompaniment under Dr. Muck's hand was so finely graduated and adaptive that most of the time one was only subconsciously aware of it.

F. L. W.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted its usual large and fashionable audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador was among the box holders, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Norman Williams and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt-Trachenberg. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had among the guests in their box Lady Spring-Rice and Mrs. Robert Lansing. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, in one of the stage boxes, entertained Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Mabel Johnson and the Misses Denys. In the stage box on the opposite side of the house were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. George Howard and Mrs. Rollins Morse. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, her guests including Mrs. Seaton Schroeder and Miss Patten. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had with them in their box Mrs. Charles H. Robb, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, Mrs. Frank Freeman and Miss Harpmann. Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. and Mrs. Myron Whitney and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. Henry Brown, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mr. Arnold Hague, Miss Alice Shepard, Mrs. James Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Marcus Hanna, Miss Phelps, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and her mother, Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Slater, Mrs. John H. Purdy, Mrs. Thomas Sweeney, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Mendeville Carlisle, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Sophie Siebert, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Keyser, Mrs. C. C. Clover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. Leutze, Miss Leutze, Mrs. De Frees Critten, Mrs. John C. Simpson, Mrs. A. W. Bagley, Mrs. Henry Fitch, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Miss Margaret Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Carpenter, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Lee, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Margaret Breckinridge, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mrs. Andrew Peters, Mr. Conti, Miss Sargent, Mrs. Rapley, Miss Hickey, Miss Cannon and Miss Julia Scott.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 5 - 1915

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted its usual large and fashionable audience to the National Theater. The German Ambassador was among the box holders, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Norman Williams and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt-Trachenberg. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had among the guests in their box Lady Spring-Rice and Mrs. Robert Lansing. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, in one of the stage boxes, entertained Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Mabel Johnson and the Misses Denys. In the stage box on the opposite side of the house were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. George Howard and Mrs. Rollins Morse. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, her guests including Mrs. Seaton Schroeder and Miss Patten. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had with them in their box Mrs. Charles H. Robb, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, Mrs. Frank Freeman and Miss Harpmann. Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. and Mrs. Myron Whitney and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. Henry Brown, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mr. Arnold Hague, Miss Alice Shepard, Mrs. James Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Marcus Hanna, Miss Phelps, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and her mother, Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Slater, Mrs. John H. Purdy, Mrs. Thomas Sweeney, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Mendeville Carlisle, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Sophie Siebert, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Kyser, Mrs. C. C. Glover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. Leutze, Miss Leutze, Mrs. De Fress Critten, Mrs. John C. Simpson, Mrs. A. W. Bagley, Mrs. Henry Fitch, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Miss Margaret Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Carpenter, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Lee, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Margaret Breckinridge, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mrs. Andrew Peters, Mr. Conti, Miss Sargent, Mrs. Rapley, Miss Hickley, Miss Cannon and Miss Julia Scott.

[illegible] James Franklin gave a tea Wed-

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

KREISLER CHARMS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Boston Orchestra and Violinist Heard in Program of Pleasing Numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's magnificent rendering of Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major was easily the feature of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, and Mr. Kreisler's surmounting of the technical difficulties was a triumph of virtuosity.

Moreover the applause which greeted him seemed to be the expression of sincere affection as well as a tribute to his power and charm as a musician. The finale, with its interwoven Russian folk songs was given in a particularly brilliant manner.

The second movement of Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, which was the closing number of the program, was easily the most delightful part of the orchestral program and was distinguished by delicacy and grace of execution. The symphony of the afternoon, Brahms' No. 4, in E minor, was of a character to appeal to the intellect rather than to the emotions.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 26 1915

PADEREWSKI AS COMPOSER.

Famous Pianist to Appear Here, December 1.

If Paderewski were not the astonishing pianist that he is, his fame would be secure as a composer. As it is, he is like Liszt; because he is the greatest virtuoso of his time, the public has been slow to appreciate his genius as composer. This is all the more interesting since he at one time gave up all idea of being a pianist and decided to devote himself entirely to composition. It was not until he was twenty-four that he set himself seriously at work to perfect the technique that has brought him fame and fortune; and then it was because he was urged to do so by his friend and countrywoman, Helena Modjeska. He has to his credit a concerto for piano and orchestra, a fantasia for the same, a sonata and a set of variations for piano alone, an opera, and a symphony. When he came to America in 1908 the errand which brought him was to have his symphony performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. By that organization it was played in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It has also been played with much success since in London, Paris, Leipsic, Warsaw and Philadelphia. Paderewski will give a concert in Foot Guard hall, Wednesday evening, December 1. Tickets are now on sale at Watkins Brothers, Inc., No. 239 Asylum street.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist at Orchestra Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, was given yesterday evening at the National theater.

The numbers on the program were Brahms' Symphony in E minor (No. 4.); Tschaikowski's Concert in D major for violin, and a suite (No. 1), of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne." Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist of the occasion, received a tremendous ovation.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave its second concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist as soloist. Brahms' "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 4), and Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," were the orchestral numbers of the program, with Tschaikowski's "Concerto in D Major" as the offering of the soloist, supported by the orchestra. The appearance of Mr. Kreisler was greeted with a great volume of applause, which was renewed with even greater vigor at the close of his number. There were those who declared that the symphony, which is said to be too profound for appreciation by the average audience, was, on this occasion, quite within reach of lovers of music, and really enjoyable. The Bizet selection, however, was thought to have possessed greater charm.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH KREISLER

Great Violinist Plays Beethoven Concerto After the Bruckner Symphony

PROGRAM:

Bruckner...........Symphony, E major, No. 7
Beethoven............Concerto for violin, op.61

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy last night, consisted of only two numbers. These were sufficient to provide two hours of undissembled enjoyment.

The Bruckner Symphony took about an hour and a quarter to play. Like the Fourth Symphony, played by our own orchestra a year ago, the work is easily chargeable with an overopulence of material, and with a lack of long-continued dominant motives—in other words, it may seem to be a succession of picturesque episodes lacking co-ordination. The lay listener is likely to feel that it is not easy for the ear to seize upon and remember any very definite themes; yet there certainly is plenty of melody and harmony and constant movement.

The first movement abounds in free and flowing melody for the strings, broken by the interpretation of flute and oboe. There is a vigorously independent use of the second violins, a marked characteristic of the whole work. The adagio is beautiful, and at times sublime. It is distinguished for the use of the four "Bayreuth tubas" that were seen in the background, and heard with their big and rich and solemn voices in the forefront. They resembled in outward aspect elongated French horns with the throats of slender tubas. Their presence emphasized the Wagnerian atmosphere and concept of parts of the symphony.

The Scherzo has the dimensions—though not the character—of similar movements in the symphonies of Brahms; its spirit is as playful as the starving muse of the master knew how to achieve, yet in dimensions the movement is built on the heroic model. The finale is enriched by splendid effects of the choral voices of the aforesaid tubas, against a marching dignity of the plucked strings of the basses and the cellos. It is a noble work—and one is a little bewildered that contemporary critics should have been so consistently cruel to the poor, humble composer who progressed from 75 cents a month to 60 cents an hour, in his long life as musical pedagogue. That his music could have kept so much of serenity and sweetness speaks for a nature not embittered by loneliness and unkind tongues, and should endear him with posterity, though he was so often denied and decried and disappointed in his lifetime.

Kreisler played gloriously. It was a man of sorrows that confronted the audience while the orchestra played the introductory passage—a man into whose soul the iron and blood of war have entered, whose nature was deeply seamed and seared by that of which he was a part at Lemberg in Galicia. The music he made grew more and more beautiful to hear as it proceeded. When he reached the cadenza, and the violin outsoared alone, the warm, throbbing, human voice of the instrument said the soul's inmost in tones of a luscious and melting eloquence: it was a movement within a movement, a little separate crown-jewel of loveliness encased by Kreisler's hand in a Beethoven setting.

The first theme, taken for the main idea, was elaborated upon and embroidered without gilding refined gold or painting the lily, but with supreme reticence and good taste, in the temper of the work whence it outgrew like a flower. The Larghetto, with the violin's running commentary upon the orchestral milieu, passed without a break into the inspired scamper of the Rondo with another dazzling cadenza of apeggios. Technically brilliant as the execution was from first to last, there was found not room for personal display: there was neither meretricious cunning nor vainglory. Here was a man with a message to deliver and a meaning to communicate, through the medium of the greatest music written for the violin with the orchestra, and the severest test of the character and ideals of the exponent.

Mr. Kreisler emerged from the ordeal a greater figure in his art—and not merely in the regard of his audience—than ever. He was applauded to the echo, it is needless to remark: and the sound that he called into being for his enraptured audience last evening lingers and is exquisite, still.

The accompaniment under Dr. Muck's hand was so finely graduated and adaptive that most of the time one was only subconsciously aware of it.

F. L. W.

[62]

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915
Establi

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted its usual large and fashionable audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador was among the box holders, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Norman Williams and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt-Trachenberg. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had among the guests in their box Lady Spring-Rice and Mrs. Robert Lansing. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, in one of the stage boxes, entertained Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Mabel Johnson and the Misses Denys. In the stage box on the opposite side of the house were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. George Howard and Mrs. Rollins Morse. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, her guests including Mrs. Seaton Schroeder and Miss Patten. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had with them in their box Mrs. Charles H. Robb, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, Mrs. Frank Freeman and Miss Harpmann. Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. and Mrs. Myron Whitney and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. Henry Brown, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mr. Arnold Hague, Miss Alice Shepard, Mrs. James Harlan, Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Marcus Hanna, Miss Phelps, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and her mother, Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Slater, Mrs. John H. Purdy, Mrs. Thomas Sweeney, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Mendeville Carlisle, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Sophie Siebert, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Keyser, Mrs. C. C. Clover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. Leutze, Miss Leutze, Mrs. De Frees Critten, Mrs. John C. Simpson, Mrs. A. W. Bagley, Mrs. Henry Fitch, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Miss Margaret Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Carpenter, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Lee, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Margaret Breckinridge, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mrs. Andrew Peters, Mr. Conti, Miss Sargent, Mrs. Rapley, Miss Hickey, Miss Cannon and Miss Julia Scott.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 5 - 1915
Establish

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season attracted its usual large and fashionable audience to the National Theater. The German Ambassador was among the box holders, his guests including Mme. Hauge, Mrs. Norman Williams and Prince and Princess von Hatzfeldt-Trachenberg. Gen. and Mrs. Crozier had among the guests in their box Lady Spring-Rice and Mrs. Robert Lansing. The Rev. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, in one of the stage boxes, entertained Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Miss Mabel Johnson and the Misses Denys. In the stage box on the opposite side of the house were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. George Howard and Mrs. Rollins Morse. Mrs. Preston Gibson entertained a party in Mrs. McMillan's box, her guests including Mrs. Seaton Schroeder and Miss Patten. Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had with them in their box Mrs. Charles H. Robb, Mrs. D. Percy Hickling, Mrs. Frank Freeman and Miss Harpmann. Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mr. and Mrs. Myron Whitney and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe were among the guests in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box. Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Peabody Eustis, Mrs. Henry Brown, Dr. and Mrs. Duncan McKim, Mr. Arnold Hague, Miss Alice Shepard, Mrs. James Harlan Mme. Ekengren, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Edward Douglas White, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Marcus Hanna, Miss Phelps, Mrs. William Holland Wilmer and her mother, Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Slater, Mrs. John H. Purdy, Mrs. Thomas Sweeney, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. William Hammond, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Mendeville Carlisle, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Sophie Siebert, Mrs. Robert Taylor, Mrs. Beverly Williamson, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Miss Beatrice Clover, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Miss Kyser, Mrs. C. C. Glover, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Robert Chew, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. Leutze, Miss Leutze, Mrs. De Fress Critten, Mrs. John C. Simpson, Mrs. A. W. Bagley, Mrs. Henry Fitch, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. William Eaches Fendall, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Miss Margaret Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Carpenter, Mrs. Charles C. Walcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Lee, Mrs. John Blair, Miss Margaret Breckinridge, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mrs. Andrew Peters, Mr. Conti, Miss Sargent, Mrs. Rapley, Miss Hickey, Miss Cannon and Miss Julia Scott.

[illegible] James Franklin gave a tea Wed-

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915
Estal 84

KREISLER CHARMS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Boston Orchestra and Violinist Heard in Program of Pleasing Numbers.

Fritz Kreisler's magnificent rendering of Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major was easily the feature of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, and Mr. Kreisler's surmounting of the technical difficulties was a triumph of virtuosity.

Moreover the applause which greeted him seemed to be the expression of sincere affection as well as a tribute to his power and charm as a musician. The finale, with its interwoven Russian folk songs was given in a particularly brilliant manner.

The second movement of Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, which was the closing number of the program, was easily the most delightful part of the orchestral program and was distinguished by delicacy and grace of execution. The symphony of the afternoon, Brahms' No. 4, in E minor, was of a character to appeal to the intellect rather than to the emotions.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date NOV 26 1915
Esta 884

PADEREWSKI AS COMPOSER.

Famous Pianist to Appear Here, December 1.

If Paderewski were not the astonishing pianist that he is, his fame would be secure as a composer. As it is, he is like Liszt; because he is the greatest virtuoso of his time, the public has been slow to appreciate his genius as composer. This is all the more interesting since he at one time gave up all idea of being a pianist and decided to devote himself entirely to composition. It was not until he was twenty-four that he set himself seriously at work to perfect the technique that has brought him fame and fortune; and then it was because he was urged to do so by his friend and countrywoman, Helena Modjeska. He has to his credit a concerto for piano and orchestra, a fantasia for the same, a sonata and a set of variations for piano alone, an opera, and a symphony. When he came to America in 1908 the errand which brought him was to have his symphony performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. By that organization it was played in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It has also been played with much success since in London, Paris, Leipsic, Warsaw and Philadelphia. Paderewski will give a concert in Foot Guard hall, Wednesday evening, December 1. Tickets are now on sale at Watkins Brothers, Inc., No. 239 Asylum street.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
DEC 1 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Fritz Kreisler Is Soloist at Orchestra Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, was given yesterday evening at the National theater.

The numbers on the program were Brahms' Symphony in E minor (No. 4.); Tschaikowski's Concert in D major for violin, and a suite (No. 1), of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne." Fritz Kreisler, who was the soloist of the occasion, received a tremendous ovation.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date DEC 1 1915
Establ

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gave its second concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist as soloist. Brahms' "Symphony in E Minor" (No. 4), and Bizet's suite, "L'Arlesienne," were the orchestral numbers of the program, with Tschaikowski's "Concerto in D Major" as the offering of the soloist, supported by the orchestra. The appearance of Mr. Kreisler was greeted with a great volume of applause, which was renewed with even greater vigor at the close of his number. There were those who declared that the symphony, which is said to be too profound for appreciation by the average audience, was, on this occasion, quite within reach of lovers of music, and really enjoyable. The Bizet selection, however, was thought to have possessed greater charm.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 30 1915
Establ

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH KREISLER

Great Violinist Plays Beethoven Concerto After the Bruckner Symphony

PROGRAM:

Bruckner...........Symphony, E major, No. 7
Beethoven............Concerto for violin, op.61

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy last night, consisted of only two numbers. These were sufficient to provide two hours of undissembled enjoyment.

The Bruckner Symphony took about an hour and a quarter to play. Like the Fourth Symphony, played by our own orchestra a year ago, the work is easily chargeable with an overopulence of material, and with a lack of long-continued dominant motives—in other words, it may seem to be a succession of picturesque episodes lacking co-ordination. The lay listener is likely to feel that it is not easy for the ear to seize upon and remember any very definite themes; yet there certainly is plenty of melody and harmony and constant movement.

The first movement abounds in free and flowing melody for the strings, broken by the interpretation of flute and oboe. There is a vigorously independent use of the second violins, a marked characteristic of the whole work. The adagio is beautiful, and at times sublime. It is distinguished for the use of the four "Bayreuth tubas" that were seen in the background, and heard with their big and rich and solemn voices in the forefront. They resembled in outward aspect elongated French horns with the throats of slender tubas. Their presence emphasized the Wagnerian atmosphere and concept of parts of the symphony.

The Scherzo has the dimensions—though not the character—of similar movements in the symphonies of Brahms; its spirit is as playful as the starving muse of the master knew how to achieve, yet in dimensions the movement is built on the heroic model. The finale is enriched by splendid effects of the choral voices of the aforesaid tubas, against a marching dignity of the plucked strings of the basses and the cellos. It is a noble work—and one is a little bewildered that contemporary critics should have been so consistently cruel to the poor, humble composer who progressed from 75 cents a month to 60 cents an hour, in his long life as musical pedagogue. That his music could have kept so much of serenity and sweetness speaks for a nature not embittered by loneliness and unkind tongues, and should endear him with posterity, though he was so often denied and decried and disappointed in his lifetime.

Kreisler played gloriously. It was a man of sorrows that confronted the audience while the orchestra played the introductory passage—a man into whose soul the iron and blood of war have entered, whose nature was deeply seamed and seared by that of which he was a part at Lemberg in Galicia. The music he made grew more and more beautiful to hear as it proceeded. When he reached the cadenza, and the violin outsoared alone, the warm, throbbing, human voice of the instrument said the soul's inmost in tones of a luscious and melting eloquence: it was a movement within a movement, a little separate crown-jewel of loveliness encased by Kreisler's hand in a Beethoven setting.

The first theme, taken for the main idea, was elaborated upon and embroidered without gilding refined gold or painting the lily, but with supreme reticence and good taste, in the temper of the work whence it outgrew like a flower. The Larghetto, with the violin's running commentary upon the orchestral milieu, passed without a break into the inspired scamper of the Rondo with another dazzling cadenza of apeggios. Technically brilliant as the execution was from first to last, there was found not room for personal display: there was neither meretricious cunning nor vainglory. Here was a man with a message to deliver and a meaning to communicate, through the medium of the greatest music written for the violin with the orchestra, and the severest test of the character and ideals of the exponent.

Mr. Kreisler emerged from the ordeal a greater figure in his art—and not merely in the regard of his audience—than ever. He was applauded to the echo, it is needless to remark: and the sound that he called into being for his enraptured audience last evening lingers and is exquisite, still.

The accompaniment under Dr. Muck's hand was so finely graduated and adaptive that most of the time one was only subconsciously aware of it.

F. L. W.

[62]

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 0 1915

10

Boston Symphony

Kreisler Soloist of Program Including Bruckner's Seventh Symphony

Es 884

FRITZ Kreisler, making his first local appearance of the season, was the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of its series, at the Academy of Music last evening, on a program which consisted of only two numbers, the first part being devoted to the performance of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, in E major, and the second to the interpretation of Beethoven's D major concerto for violin and orchestra. The concert was somewhat longer than usually given by this organization, however, since the first work consumed about an hour and fifteen minutes and the other at least half that time.

The symphony, in fact, great as it undoubtedly is in the skill of its counterpoint, of which Bruckner was a master, and impressive in its elaborate instrumentation, is too long to sustain for the average listener the interest that a work of more simplicity and melodious appeal might maintain, and at its completion one is not likely to feel any stirring desire to hear it soon again.

The second movement—adagio—has been called Bruckner's masterpiece, and there is some belief that it was written as a funeral dirge for Richard Wagner, although it was completed nearly a year before the latter's death. It is, at any rate, a fine and impressive piece of orchestral writing, though even here the ear misses the appeal of direct melodization and there is a reiteration of idea and tonal effect that does not always escape tedium. The first movement, allegro moderato, is much given to piercing combination of high-pitched tone in strings and brasses, and while the Boston players gave of their brilliant best to make the music inspiring, it had neither the appeal of a Beethoven nor the impressiveness of a Wagner, though near to the close of the movement there was a brief suggestion of the fire music in "Die Walkure," and the ending has something of Wagnerian effect.

The adagio, however, with its nearer approach to rich melodization, was more satisfying, and the scherzo, while lacking much of the blithesome spirit of jocosity that this movement of a symphony may be expected to present, rose to a real height of lavish instrumentation, and was not unlike the thrilling third act of a play, which causes the fourth to come with the spent force of an anti-climax.

Not the least interesting of the four is the final movement, presenting as it does some fine passages of shimmering strings, a choral of real beauty, and at the last a full burst of triumphant crescendo, the end coming with a sharp chord which seems to leave something unsaid. But, as before mentioned, one scarcely feels inclined to wish for more. Great as the work is in many respects, and magnificently played as it was in every respect, under Dr. Muck's sedately effective leadership, an hour and fifteen minutes was quite enough of it.

The Beethoven violin concerto is one of the most beautiful in existence, even if not the greatest in the scope of achievement that it offers to an artist, and Kreisler was at his best. In fluency and accuracy of execution, purity of tone, lovely legato and birdlike flight of lofty trill, Kreisler's playing last evening was incomparable. In the first cadenza alone he seemed to do with marvelous skill about everything that can be done with his instrument, and the larghetto as he played it was enough to melt the traditional heart of stone. A prolonged reception was given the violinist when he first appeared, and when he had finished his number the applause was in the nature of a genuine ovation.

The Boston orchestra's third concert of the season is scheduled for Monday evening, January 3, when Mme. Melba will be the soloist.

Evening
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 0 1915

Established

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND KREISLER PLAY

Bruckner Symphony and Beethoven Concerto in Academy Program

The second series of Boston Symphony concerts, in a program consisting of but two numbers and with Fritz Kreisler as assisting artist, was given at the Academy last night. The symphony, Anton Bruckner's seventh, was long and was coolly received. The Beethoven concerto for violin, with which Kreisler's name is almost inevitably linked, made up in the appreciation of the audience.

One can hardly criticise Doctor Muck for bringing to this city in his limited appearances here such works as this one of Bruckner's. He can hardly limit himself to the established favorites, and it is well that he should bring his experiments on tour. Bruckner he played recently in Boston, and it was truly said there that this is music which a Mediterranean people would never forgive. If the perfervid Wagnerite, who attacked Brahms, could have looked about in his own camp and said of Bruckner that he

---

There are beautiful mom seventh, and there is a se as a funeral march, which passingly great were it no long drawn out. For the r have ears for tonal beauty consolation in the magnific the orchestra. For sheer more glowingly warm and been heard this year than the brass, nor were the en of the whole band less th The same smooth, rich ele quence of utterance which Boston Symphony an orga and precious in past seasons again.

But even if Bruckner had not been played in this way, even if all his works were set down in a program, it would be worth listening to if Fritz Kreisler were given as a reward at the end. He appeared last night more in possession of his health and of himself. The brave figure seemed again undismayed by adversity, and the magnificent head was still unbowed. He looked out at his audience with a strange sadness, but with triumph. And he played again.

From the witches' Sabbath which is called life Mr. Kreisler and his art redeem us eternally in the contemplation of serene beauty and of revelry which is lusty and cheerful and gay. There are tones in his most beautiful violin in the world which are not heard elsewhere, and there are passions which he suffers and transmits which are known everywhere not so poignantly, not so intensely, not so completely as in his playing. Tribute to him can only be a sad and stammering expression of what must be felt even by those to whom music and all the emotions it calls into being are a matter of every day. He is a great genius and there plays about him that mysterious flame which forbids inquiry and settles doubt. We cannot drink from the cup from which he has drunk.

G. V. S.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2 8 1915

Est 1884

MUSIC OF THE WEEK

Monday Evening.
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.
Tuesday Evening.
"Manon"—Metropolitan Opera House.
Wednesday Evening.
Le Coin d'Or Musical—251 South Camac Street.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening, November 29. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and at the same time, most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at the large sum of sixty cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower his genius.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 3 0 1915

67

KREISLER WITH THE BOSTON

Great Violinist Plays Beethoven on Bruckner Program at Academy.

884

Last season Fritz Kreisler played in Philadelphia five times. For even an unusually good artist, that would be about three times too many. But Mr. Kreisler, by chance of fortune, is not an unusually good artist. He is a superlatively splendid one. Such reflections were engendered last evening when the violinist stepped on the stage of the Academy of Music and played with matchless fire, delicacy and variety Beethoven's familiar D-major concerto, thereby putting joy into a night that had been devoted entirely to Bruckner and blatancy. For Dr. Muck, seduced either by an academic interest in submerged symphonies or the really admirable adagio, had elected to give that composer's seventh, prolix jig tunes, mirthless suavity, and all because it was "new to Philadelphia."

Mr. Kreisler plays Beethoven in the truly grand manner, with plenty of sane sentiment, bowing and fingering with a touch as light as dew, but with none of the maudlin "sympathetic" attack of certain younger artists. His capacity for a great number of tonal effects was simply marvelous; for him the violin is no mere toy of personality. He endows it, when fitting, with the sonority of an organ, the poignant sweetness of the clarinet, or the enchantment of the French horn of an Austrian elfland. One gentleman with a prominent brow said that the artist gave his own cadenza in the concerto. Perhaps he did; but for most of the audience such points were beyond the pale. It was simply a beautiful adventure, which no preceding Bruckner could wither or stale.

The symphony, extremely well played, had some flashes of fineness, but it would be vain to imagine that they were inherent, and not interpretative. One wonders vaguely what Felix Weingartner was driving at in his vaunting of Bruckner over Brahms. But Dr. Muck's auditors, filling the house, seemed to like it. And

[63]

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date DEC 3 1915

Established: L

MUSIC

Conducted by Sigmund Spaeth

A Bruckner Symphony and a Beethoven Concerto—Double Operatic Bill—Three Recitals.

The name of Anton Bruckner inevitably suggests uninspired pedantry and linked dullness long drawn out. There is a Bruckner tradition, based largely upon the contemporary judgment of Hanslick, which denies this "peasant composer" anything but a highly developed musical scholarship.

As played by the Boston orchestra last evening, however, Bruckner's seventh symphony seems to have much more than an academic value. It is not a work to thrill one, as does a symphony of Brahms, but something to which one might well return with interest and at least an intellectual pleasure, long after being satiated with the more obvious beauties of such a composer as Tschaikowsy, for instance.

In its thematic material, this seventh symphony of Bruckner is by no means dull, even though not always original. There are some labored imitations of Beethoven and many frank echoes from Wagner. But the stuff is truly symphonic, and the details of its workmanship show a marvelous skill.

A Great Adagio.

The adagio, with its dirge prematurely bewailing the death of Wagner, possesses real greatness. In the first and last movements also there are touches of genius, often obscured by the wearisome volubility of the over-enthusiastic workman.

The scherzo is heavy-footed, like all of Bruckner's fast movements. It is really an adagio played in rapid time.

1884

As a whole, however, the symphony is well worth a hearing, particularly when Dr. Muck and his orchestra are available for its interpretation.

Fritz Kreisler is one of a very few living violinists who know how the Beethoven concerto should be played. In its general effect his performance is always a noble one.

Last evening, however, his confidence seemed to desert him in the middle of the first movement, and thereafter he allowed a surprising number of petty slips, particularly of intonation, to mar his work. That he should have scored a huge success in spite of this temporary loss of control is a tribute to the bigness of Mr. Kreisler's artistic resources.

lovers of Italian melodrama as of old.

The feature of the first was the splendid singing and acting of Margarete Matzenauer, who succeeded in giving her Teutonic personality an extraordinarily Sicilian flavor. Luca Botta, as Turiddu, was also thoroughly convincing, and showed an encouraging improvement over his work of last season.

Giuseppe De Luca, in the part of Alfio, gave further indications of his great ability. A newcomer, Flora Perini, was an adequate Lola.

In the cast of "Pagliacci" were Ida Cajatti, a small-voiced but sprightly Nedda, Caruso, Amato, Bada and Tegani. Gaetano Bavagnoli conducted both operas.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 11, 1915

ORCHESTRA PLAYS SIXTH SYMPHONY OF BEETHOVEN

SYMPHONY HALL—Seventh program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Dec. 10. The program: Beethoven, sixth symphony ("Pastoral"); Dukas, "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vysehrad"; Enesco, Rumanian rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

A question arises about the reading of the sixth symphony. Did Dr. Muck present the work which Beethoven wrote? And before the question can be answered, it is necessary that there be some agreement as to what the composer intended this "Pastoral" study to be. Now if he meant it for a representation of out-of-doors, some will contend that any interpretation of it is incorrect which fails to have a country atmosphere. But if he did not seriously intend the work to be descriptive of hillsides and meadows, but in his heart thought of it as a piece of formal writing, like the second symphony or the eighth, then listeners will be content with a conductor who makes no pretense of putting in scenery. Again, supposing Beethoven actually believed he was painting a picture here, it is an entirely possible thing that he made a failure of it. There is, indeed, the argument that people in the past have accepted the representative meaning of the work without debate. The music will have to be taken as descriptive, of course, if any considerable number of listeners ever thought it so.

The majority of the house on Friday afternoon must have felt convinced of one thing. Whether or not Beethoven meant his symphony to be an example of rural landscape painting, the conductor did not mean his interpretation to be anything of that sort. In other words, if there ever was any descriptive quality in the work, it has, in his judgment, vanished. It is no longer vitally there. For the modern audience, that is to say, accustomed to late nineteenth and early twentieth century methods of scenic orchestration, the sixth symphony is sheer music, pure formalism. It is as abstract as all the rest of Beethoven.

The reading, then, considered in the light of program music, was to the last degree flat and commonplace. But not so musically. For the execution of the work was remarkable. The first violins were never put through their phrases with greater neatness and delicacy. They have done nothing all the season with lighter and surer hand than the subjects of the second movement. If Beethoven never wearied of developing them, the players never for a moment slackened in their zeal to give them lustrous tone and classic outline. And the woodwind choir was in like mood with the string section. It never did its part-singing more ingratiatingly.

And there it stands with the "Pastoral" symphony. It is taken from the shelf with such regudarity that the public must sometimes wonder if its presentation just so often is not one of the conditions on which the orchestra is founded. It gets performed with as much respect as a civic ceremonial. It is a part of the artistic routine of the community which nobody perhaps would care to have interrupted. It belongs in the active repertory of the Symphony orchestra, and let him dare to ask for its retirement who will. Schönberg pieces for orchestra may come and go again. But the sixth symphony came when the gilt shield was molded for the proscenium arch of Symphony hall and was inscribed with the name of Beethoven. And it stays.

The three short works in the list were read with clearer descriptive intent. Possibly the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" has had its humor more keenly revealed in former concerts. But the two compositions of national color, the Bohemian and the Rumanian tone pictures, had all their scenic import. The Enesco rhapsody was interpreted in the matchless dramatic manner of the symphony conductor, the rhythm having a vitality that seemed to demand a stage of Russian dancers to round out the composer's purpose.

TRAVELER,

DECEMBER 11,

BEETHOVEN GIVES PLEASURE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck and his players were right in their element at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert, not that that is an unusual condition, but even the best have exceptional days, and this was one for the orchestra. Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony seemed more interesting than ever as the players revealed its many charms.

Then followed the ever interesting, ever entertaining "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas, quite a contrast, to be sure, but most welcome when played by these artists. Another marked contrast was afforded in the third number, Smetana's "Vyserhad," to many the gem of the concert.

The final number, Enesco's "Rouma-

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 30 1915

70

Boston Symphony

Kreisler Soloist of Program Including Bruckner's Seventh Symphony

FRITZ Kreisler, making his first local appearance of the season, was the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of its series, at the Academy of Music last evening, on a program which consisted of only two numbers, the first part being devoted to the performance of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, in E major, and the second to the interpretation of Beethoven's D major concerto for violin and orchestra. The concert was somewhat longer than usually given by this organization, however, since the first work consumed about an hour and fifteen minutes and the other at least half that time.

The symphony, in fact, great as it undoubtedly is in the skill of its counterpoint, of which Bruckner was a master, and impressive in its elaborate instrumentation, is too long to sustain for the average listener the interest that a work of more simplicity and melodious appeal might maintain, and at its completion one is not likely to feel any stirring desire to hear it soon again.

The second movement—adagio—has been called Bruckner's masterpiece, and there is some belief that it was written as a funeral dirge for Richard Wagner, although it was completed nearly a year before the latter's death. It is, at any rate, a fine and impressive piece of orchestral writing, though even here the ear misses the appeal of direct melodization and there is a reiteration of idea and tonal effect that does not always escape tedium. The first movement, allegro moderato, is much given to piercing combination of high-pitched tone in strings and brasses, and while the Boston players gave of their brilliant best to make the music inspiring, it had neither the appeal of a Beethoven nor the impressiveness of a Wagner, though near to the close of the movement there was a brief suggestion of the fire music in "Die Walkure," and the ending has something of Wagnerian effect.

The adagio, however, with its nearer approach to rich melodization, was more satisfying, and the scherzo, while lacking much of the blithesome spirit of jocosity that this movement of a symphony may be expected to present, rose to a real height of lavish instrumentation, and was not unlike the thrilling third act of a play, which causes the fourth to come with the spent force of an anti-climax.

Not the least interesting of the four is the final movement, presenting as it does some fine passages of shimmering strings, a choral of real beauty, and at the last a full burst of triumphant crescendo, the end coming with a sharp chord which seems to leave something unsaid. But, as before mentioned, one scarcely feels inclined to wish for more. Great as the work is in many respects, and magnificently played as it was in every respect, under Dr. Muck's sedately effective leadership, an hour and fifteen minutes was quite enough of it.

The Beethoven violin concerto is one of the most beautiful in existence, even if not the greatest in the scope of achievement that it offers to an artist, and Kreisler was at his best. In fluency and accuracy of execution, purity of tone, lovely legato and birdlike flight of lofty trill, Kreisler's playing last evening was incomparable. In the first cadenza alone he seemed to do with marvelous skill about everything that can be done with his instrument, and the larghetto as he played it was enough to melt the traditional heart of stone. A prolonged reception was given the violinist when he first appeared, and when he had finished his number the applause was in the nature of a genuine ovation.

The Boston orchestra's third concert of the season is scheduled for Monday evening, January 3, when Mme. Melba will be the soloist.

Evening
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 30 1915

Established

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND KREISLER PLAY

Bruckner Symphony and Beethoven Concerto in Academy Program

The second series of Boston Symphony concerts, in a program consisting of but two numbers and with Fritz Kreisler as assisting artist, was given at the Academy last night. The symphony, Anton Bruckner's seventh, was long and was coolly received. The Beethoven concerto for violin, with which Kreisler's name is almost inevitably linked, made up in the appreciation of the audience.

One can hardly criticise Doctor Muck for bringing to this city in his limited appearances here such works as this one of Bruckner's. He can hardly limit himself to the established favorites, and it is well that he should bring his experiments on tour. Bruckner he played recently in Boston, and it was truly said there that this is music which a Mediterranean people would never forgive. If the perfervid Wagnerite, who attacked Brahms, could have looked about in his own camp and said of Bruckner that he

---

There are beautiful moments in the seventh, and there is a solemn adagio, as a funeral march, which would be surpassingly great were it not insufferably long drawn out. For the rest, those who have ears for tonal beauty found ample consolation in the magnificent playing of the orchestra. For sheer effects nothing more glowingly warm and beautiful has been heard this year than the tones in the brass, nor were the ensemble effects of the whole band less than anticipated. The same smooth, rich elegance and eloquence of utterance which has made the Boston Symphony an organization unique and precious in past seasons were heard again.

But even if Bruckner had not been played in this way, even if all his works were set down in a program, it would be worth listening to if Fritz Kreisler were given as a reward at the end. He appeared last night more in possession of his health and of himself. The brave figure seemed again undismayed by adversity, and the magnificent head was still unbowed. He looked out at his audience with a strange sadness, but with triumph. And he played again.

From the witches' Sabbath which is called life Mr. Kreisler and his art redeem us eternally in the contemplation of serene beauty and of revelry which is lusty and cheerful and gay. There are tones in his most beautiful violin in the world which are not heard elsewhere, and there are passions which he suffers and transmits which are known everywhere not so poignantly, not so intensely, not so completely as in his playing. Tribute to him can only be a sad and stammering expression of what must be felt even by those to whom music and all the emotions it calls into being are a matter of every day. He is a great genius and there plays about him that mysterious flame which forbids inquiry and settles doubt. We cannot drink from the cup from which he has drunk.

G. V. S.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 28 1915

MUSIC OF THE WEEK

Monday Evening.
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.
Tuesday Evening.
"Manon"—Metropolitan Opera House.
Wednesday Evening.
Le Coin d'Or Musical—251 South Camac Street.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening, November 29. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will then make his only appearance here during the current season. The program has only two numbers. The first part will be taken by Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major. The second part will be devoted to Beethoven's Concerto in D Major for violin, which Mr. Kreisler will play.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony will be played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is one of the most interesting and at the same time, most pathetic figures in the history of music. His life was one long struggle against poverty and to the end of his days he made his living by teaching in Vienna at the large sum of sixty cents a lesson. Nonetheless, he was a giant among composers. His symphonies, of which there are nine, are built on a large scale, and have made their way in public favor slowly. Almost from the beginning Bruckner has had the most loyal service from the great conductors of the world, but the public has been slower to recognize his genius.

* * *

F... EGRAM
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date NOV 30 1915

67

KREISLER WITH THE BOSTON

Great Violinist Plays Beethoven on Bruckner Program at Academy.

Last season Fritz Kreisler played in Philadelphia five times. For even an unusually good artist, that would be about three times too many. But Mr. Kreisler, by chance of fortune, is not an unusually good artist. He is a superlatively splendid one. Such reflections were engendered last evening when the violinist stepped on the stage of the Academy of Music and played with matchless fire, delicacy and variety Beethoven's familiar D-major concerto, thereby putting joy into a night that had been devoted entirely to Bruckner and blatancy. For Dr. Muck, seduced either by an academic interest in submerged symphonies or the really admirable adagio, had elected to give that composer's seventh, prolix jig tunes, mirthless suavity, and all because it was "new to Philadelphia."

Mr. Kreisler plays Beethoven in the truly grand manner, with plenty of sane sentiment, bowing and fingering with a touch as light as dew, but with none of the maudlin "sympathetic" attack of certain younger artists. His capacity for a great number of tonal effects was simply marvelous; for him the violin is no mere toy of personality. He endows it, when fitting, with the sonority of an organ, the poignant sweetness of the clarinet, or the enchantment of the French horn of an Austrian elfland. One gentleman with a prominent brow said that the artist gave his own cadenza in the concerto. Perhaps he did; but for most of the audience such points were beyond the pale. It was simply a beautiful adventure, which no preceding Bruckner could wither or stale.

The symphony, extremely well played, had some flashes of fineness, but it would be vain to imagine that they were inherent, and not interpretative. One wonders vaguely what Felix Weingartner was driving at in his vaunting of Bruckner over Brahms. But Dr. Muck's auditors, filling the house, seemed to like it. And

---

EC 3 1915

USIC Conducted by Sigmund Spaeth

A Bruckner Symphony and a Beethoven Concerto—Double Operatic Bill—Three Recitals.

The name of Anton Bruckner inevitably suggests uninspired pedantry and linked dullness long drawn out. There is a Bruckner tradition, based largely upon the contemporary judgment of Hanslick, which denies this "peasant composer" anything but a highly developed musical scholarship.

As played by the Boston orchestra last evening, however, Bruckner's seventh symphony seems to have much more than an academic value. It is not a work to thrill one, as does a symphony of Brahms, but something to which one might well return with interest and at least an intellectual pleasure, long after being satiated with the more obvious beauties of such a composer as Tschaikowsy, for instance.

In its thematic material, this seventh symphony of Bruckner is by no means dull, even though not always original. There are some labored imitations of Beethoven and many frank echoes from Wagner. But the stuff is truly symphonic, and the details of its workmanship show a marvelous skill.

A Great Adagio.

The adagio, with its dirge prematurely bewailing the death of Wagner, possesses real greatness. In the first and last movements also there are touches of genius, often obscured by the wearisome volubility of the over-enthusiastic workman.

The scherzo is heavy-footed, like all of Bruckner's fast movements. It is really an adagio played in rapid time.

As a whole, however, the symphony is well worth a hearing, particularly when Dr. Muck and his orchestra are available for its interpretation.

Fritz Kreisler is one of a very few living violinists who know how the Beethoven concerto should be played. In its general effect his performance is always a noble one.

Last evening, however, his confidence seemed to desert him in the middle of the first movement, and thereafter he allowed a surprising number of petty slips, particularly of intonation, to mar his work. That he should have scored a huge success in spite of this temporary loss of control is a tribute to the bigness of Mr. Kreisler's artistic resources.

lovers of Italian melodrama as of old.

The feature of the first was the splendid singing and acting of Margarete Matzenauer, who succeeded in giving her Teutonic personality an extraordinarily Sicilian flavor. Luca Botta, as Turiddu, was also thoroughly convincing, and showed an encouraging improvement over his work of last season.

Giuseppe De Luca, in the part of Alfio, gave further indications of his great ability. A newcomer, Flora Perini, was an adequate Lola.

In the cast of "Pagliacci" were Ida Cajatti, a small-voiced but sprightly Nedda, Caruso, Amato, Bada and Tegani. Gaetano Bavagnoli conducted both operas.

MONITOR,

DECEMBER 11, 1915

ORCHESTRA PLAYS SIXTH SYMPHONY OF BEETHOVEN

SYMPHONY HALL—Seventh program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Dec. 10. The program: Beethoven, sixth symphony ("Pastoral"); Dukas, "Sorcerer's Apprentice" scherzo; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vysehrad"; Enesco, Rumanian rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

A question arises about the reading of the sixth symphony. Did Dr. Muck present the work which Beethoven wrote? And before the question can be answered, it is necessary that there be some agreement as to what the composer intended this "Pastoral" study to be. Now if he meant it for a representation of out-of-doors, some will contend that any interpretation of it is incorrect which fails to have a country atmosphere. But if he did not seriously intend the work to be descriptive of hillsides and meadows, but in his heart thought of it as a piece of formal writing, like the second symphony or the eighth, then listeners will be content with a conductor who makes no pretense of putting in scenery. Again, supposing Beethoven actually believed he was painting a picture here, it is an entirely possible thing that he made a failure of it. There is, indeed, the argument that people in the past have accepted the representative meaning of the work without debate. The music will have to be taken as descriptive, of course, if any considerable number of listeners ever thought it so.

The majority of the house on Friday afternoon must have felt convinced of one thing. Whether or not Beethoven meant his symphony to be an example of rural landscape painting, the conductor did not mean his interpretation to be anything of that sort. In other words, if there ever was any descriptive quality in the work, it has, in his judgment, vanished. It is no longer vitally there. For the modern audience, that is to say, accustomed to late nineteenth and early twentieth century methods of scenic orchestration, the sixth symphony is sheer music, pure formalism. It is as abstract as all the rest of Beethoven.

The reading, then, considered in the light of program music, was to the last degree flat and commonplace. But not so musically. For the execution of the work was remarkable. The first violins were never put through their phrases with greater neatness and delicacy. They have done nothing all the season with lighter and surer hand than the subjects of the second movement. If Beethoven never wearied of developing them, the players never for a moment slackened in their zeal to give them lustrous tone and classic outline. And the woodwind choir was in like mood with the string section. It never did its part-singing more ingratiatingly.

And there it stands with the "Pastoral" symphony. It is taken from the shelf with such regudarity that the public must sometimes wonder if its presentation just so often is not one of the conditions on which the orchestra is founded. It gets performed with as much respect as a civic ceremonial. It is a part of the artistic routine of the community which nobody perhaps would care to have interrupted. It belongs in the active repertory of the Symphony orchestra, and let him dare to ask for its retirement who will. Schönberg pieces for orchestra may come and go again. But the sixth symphony came when the gilt shield was molded for the proscenium arch of Symphony hall and was inscribed with the name of Beethoven. And it stays.

The three short works in the list were read with clearer descriptive intent. Possibly the "Sorcerer's Apprentice" has had its humor more keenly revealed in former concerts. But the two compositions of national color, the Bohemian and the Rumanian tone pictures, had all their scenic import. The Enesco rhapsody was interpreted in the matchless dramatic manner of the symphony conductor, the rhythm having a vitality that seemed to demand a stage of Russian dancers to round out the composer's purpose.

TRAVELER,

DECEMBER 11,

BEETHOVEN GIVES PLEASURE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck and his players were right in their element at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert, not that that is an unusual condition, but even the best have exceptional days, and this was one for the orchestra. Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony seemed more interesting than ever as the players revealed its many charms.

Then followed the ever interesting, ever entertaining "Sorcerer's Apprentice" of Dukas, quite a contrast, to be sure, but most welcome when played by these artists. Another marked contrast was afforded in the third number, Smetana's "Vyserhad," to many the gem of the concert.

The final number, Enesco's "Rouma-

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 11.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LIGHT PROGRAMME OF AGREEABLE MUSIC

The Distinctions of Performance That Glorified It—Dukas's Tonal Tale in Perfection of Vivid Detail—Enesco's Fiery Rhapsody of Folk-Tune—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony as a "Disposition of the Soul"

Too much goes for granted with the public of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of the concert yesterday afternoon the audience departed highly pleased with a light programme of familiar pieces, easily comprehensible and readily entertaining—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Dukas's Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Smetana's tone-poem of the fallen Bohemian citadel, "Vysehrad," and one of Enesco's whirling Roumanian Rhadsodies: Repertory pieces all, as orchestral repertories run nowadays, but by no means played as such pieces often fare. It has been said—and not altogether justly—that Dr. Muck would rather polish to the last pitch of revealing and imparting perfection the performance of music with which he and the band are familiar than turn their mutual prowess into new and untried fields. It may also be true that the conductor puts on his programmes fewer novel numbers, especially by rising composers, than many of his hearers reasonably desire. On the other hand, it is in no spirit of sloth or of finicking preoccupation that he likes to refine—or in some instances to enlarge—upon such music as that of Dukas's Scherzo or of Enesco's Rhapsody.

Never has the tonal anecdote of the apprentice's adventures with the magic broom been told in our concerts with such clarity, precision and impeccable adjustment of harmonic, instrumental and rhythmic details as it was yesterday. Not a few may have been only for expert ears; but even casual listeners must have suspected that the mysterious voice and premonition of the music at the beginning; the working of the charm in the main body of the Scherzo as an inevitable and irresistible force; the perturbation, the relief and the final lifting of the spell—the serio-comic illusion of the whole, stimulating as so much music, fascinating as so much tonal suggestion and tonal narrative—sprang from a performance that far transcended routine.

Again, in Enesco's Rhapsody, what might easily seem rather monotonous repetitions and rehandlings of a few motives from Roumanian folk-song, Dr. Muck, by diversifying skill and intensifying imagination, transforms into flights of bravura intoxicating to hear. He modulates acutely and tingling; he makes shrewd play with suspensive pauses; he heightens color; he raises or diminishes emphases; he breaks or sustains rhythm. So played the Rhapsody sounds as though Enesco were pouring out the heady wine of Balkan folk-song—a vineyard in which few but him have begun to work—mixing it with the biting spice of instrumental coloring and orchestral virtuosity and finally heating the brew over the hot fires of stinging rhythms. Music that lacks seriousness as the mediocrities say, because they are prone, perhaps from long mediation over their own music, to confuse that useful quality with dulness. Music that lacks development that is no more than decked and re-decked iteration. cry the learned pundits with scorn in their voices.

Yet by this time, most of us know that Enesco is fertile of means and method and that he is wise enough and resourceful enough to choose and follow his own procedure. Color and reiteration best serve his purpose in the rhapsody; when counterpoint and development are more serviceable to his musical design he is expert with them. Moreover, there is an artistry of repetition in this music of native wildness, barely bridled for the concert-room that these same pundits and mediocrities are prone to overlook—the artistry that makes it whip ear and sensation until they tingle with these snapping rhythms, glow with this hot fire of speech and catch and crouch with the orchestra at the suspensive pauses that send it whirling more swiftly onward. Enesco knows this goading artistry that in him and in this particular rhapsody is half Roumanian instinct and half Viennese and Parisian sophistication. In general, it is the secret of the transformation of the wilder folk-music into an art-music that keeps the original thrill. Liszt knew it and applied it when he wrote his Hungarian rhapsodies.

Similarly, conductor and orchestra did much for Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. By this time most of those that hear it care little for the pictorial element in the music. They do not pursue the purling brook through the Andante as they are wont to do through certain passages in "The Creation" by ingenuous old Haydn. They do not listen for the sounds of the village musicians in the course of the scherzo. Tonal lightnings and thunders have long baen commonplaces of music. There is no need of either shepherd's songs or hymns of thanksgiving to savor the upswelling of one of Beethoven's finales. It may even be suspected that most auditors yesterday cared not one pin whether Beethoven was fortunate enough to see and feel nature with the eyes and the temper of Mr. d'Indy and so gain the approval of a chapter in a monograph that more extols Beethoven the more closely he approaches the ideals and the ways of the eminent Parisian himself. Usually Beethoven's delineation in the Pastoral Symphony is so transparently clear and so savory in momentary suggestion that the hearer takes hardly a passing thought of it. Rather he listens to an absolute music that is born of what Rubinstein aptly [illegible] "the disposition of the composer's Beethoven, writing the symphony, was minded to instrumental song as fresh of melody, as flowing of fancy, as fecund in serene grace upon serene grace, as luminous as the day and as warm as sunshine and so he made the first movement. Attuned to as serene, fanciful and graceful a revery, he wrote the second movement of tranquil and songful musing. He made merry in the scherzo with his rustic dances, because such was his "disposition of soul" whereas it ran sometimes to rough and even fierce play with these bold and pounding rhythms. The thunderstorm, even to this day, is a little feat of ingenious interweaving of delineation into a symphonic web. The finale is Beethoven tranquilly and not turbulently exultant. If musing wanderings in the woods about Vienna quickened to him these moods, impulses and inventions, if his whole reflective love for the face and the suggestion of nature was background, as it were, to them, so much the better for the woods. But without "the dispositon of the soul" and of such a soul as Beethoven's, the Pastoral Symphony would hardly have been written. It is music of the spirit and not music of the scene.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAYS POPULAR PROGRAM

Delights Big Audience Present at Pension Fund Concert.

Seldom is the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard in a program of so popular a character as the one presented at yesterday's pension fund concert, and it was undoubtedly on this account that Symphony Hall was almost sold out. Financially, as well as artistically, the concert was a big success.

The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony—and this composer's music is always popularly received—Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, Lalo's "Namouna" ballet suite and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. All but the symphony might fairly be classified as "Pop" music. For this reason the concert was welcomed by the crowd and heartily enjoyed.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is hardly less notable than the "Pathic" symphony, by the same composer. It does not bear a title, yet it is obviously program music, with a sombre, fateful leading theme and with a general air of tragedy brooding over scenes of splendor and merriment. It is music intensely dramatic and richly melodious. It is much to be preferred to many works more frequently heard at the regular Symphony concerts. It suggests no problems in geometry, no excursions into the realms of psychology. Futurist music would probably have driven the audience back into the streets. The glowing, throbbing, passionate music of Tschaikowsky stirred the emotions, and the brilliancy of the performance aroused great applause.

The "Namouna" suite would also adorn any orchestra program, but it is so rarely played that probably most of those present yesterday heard it for the first time. Several parts of it are beautifully and picturesquely written. There are fine solo passages, permitting display of the virtuoso merits of many of the Symphony players. Yesterday, in fact, the audience interrupted the performance of the suite with applause for Mr. Maquarre's flute solo.

The "Blue Danube" waltz and the "William Tell" overture were reminiscent of the good old summer time and its "light refreshments."

After both the sympathy and the overture the applause continued until Dr. Muck, who was in his best form all the afternoon, invited the orchestra to share the honors with him.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 13,

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Gives First of Two Annual Affairs

The first of the two annual concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, in aid of its pension fund, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. For the first time in Boston Dr. Muck conducted the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, a symphony rated by many even higher than the sixth or "Pathetic" symphony, and this symphony was given a most dramatic and impressive reading.

In the second part of the programme the orchestra played with incomparable euphony and virtuosity Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz; a delightful suite of Lalo's "Namouna," which has seldom [illegible] "William Tell" overture of Rossini. The beautiful waltz of Strauss, an acknowledged masterpiece of the first rank, was done exceptional justice by this wonderful band. The music of Lalo, with its exotic color and its piquant instrumentation, was an immediate success, justifying its brilliant renewal by Dr. Muck. The overture of Rossini again asserted its right to live even in days of such orchestral development as the present. The music holds its own and speaks to all by reason of its dramatic character and its expressive melodies.

The audience was a large one. It represented the enthusiastic response of the public of this city to any announcement of a concert by the Boston Symphony.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 13,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Benefit Concert Enjoyed by Large Number

The concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a programme composed of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64; Strauss' Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube;" Lalo's Suite, "Namouna," and Rossini's "William Tell" overture.

Each season Boston's public looks forward to these concerts gratuitously given in so good a cause. And yesterday's programme was well up to the usual standard from a point of interest and popularity to the large audience which was present.

It surely is a pleasure and an unusual occurrence to see the great conductor so graciously unbend in the effort to please. Dr. Muck wisely chose the "Blue Danube" waltz and the "William Tell" overture. Probably no two compositions are more widely known or appreciated by the general public, and although performed under so many conditions as to give a widely diffused familiarity, they never again quite satisfy unless given by this great orchestra.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony is not conceded to be a particularly strong work, nevertheless it is a striking one. The introduction is conceived in that mood of sadness sa common to Tschaikowsky, followed in the main theme of the movement by modes of alternating melancholy and brightness.

The second movement, Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza, takes the form of a romance. A graceful and poetical waltz with the chief theme fitfully returning is the development in the third, Allegro moderato, while in the Finale, the Andante maestoso, the theme returns penetrated with religious feeling. The Allegro vivace, the Finale itself, grows gradually clearer, as if a load of suffering had been cast off. This entire symphony seems permeated with some heavy condition of mind which waits until the very close to clear away.

Most prominent as characteristics of Lalo's music are a sense of color and atmosphere. His command of harmonic effects and a skilful handling of the orchestra are prominently shown in the "Namouna" Suite.

There might be criticisms to make, but they would be hardly in keeping with the benevolent spirit of the concert which gave pleasure to so many people. A. E. W.

BOSTON HERALD,

DECEMBLR 13,

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR FUND

Dr. Muck Directs Notable Program Enjoyed by Great Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the season in aid of its pension fund yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64; Strauss, waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"; Lalo, suite, "Namouna"; Rossini, overture, "William Tell."

The cause for which the concert was given, the nature of the program, the fact that Dr. Muck conducted a famous symphony for the first time in Boston, drew a very large and brilliant audience. The hall was filled in every part by those who welcomed the opportunity to hear this superb orchestra with its distinguished leader. Many stood.

All the compositions played with one exception were familiar. This exception was Lalo's "Namouna" suite, which has not appeared on a symphony program for many years. It was last given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch, (10 years ago).

The Ballet of Namouna, produced in 1882 at the Paris Opera, is founded on an episode in the memoirs of Casanova. Namouna, a Greek slave, is won at dice from a corsair, Adriani, by Don Ottavio. After many adventures the corsair is slain and the lovers united.

Lalo wrote the ballet against his will and while he was fevrishly waiting for his opera "Le Roi d'ys" to be produced by Vaucorbeil. He worked at his task 12 hours a day. One night he had a stroke of paralysis. This, for the moment, put an end to his labors. His friend Gounod finished the orchestration. The ballet was a dire failure. Lalo was then known chiefly as the composer of orchestral pieces and chamber music. The audience at the first performance refused to accept him as a writer of ballet and, seeing Delibes in the house, voiced its protest in furious applause for the composer of "Coppelia" and "Sylvia."

Yet this suite in four movements, Prelude, Serenade, Theme and Variations, Market-Day Shows and Festival, has been successfully performed abroad and in America. The music is charming and interesting. It has color and enchanting rhythms. Lalo's orchestration is ingenious and, in the Variations, his use of the brass extraordinary. The fourth movement is the most striking, has the most character.

Dr. Muck's conducting of Tschaikowsky's Symphony, was dramatic, noble, impressive, a great reading of a great work. In his choice of tempi; in his control of rhythm; in his infinite wealth of dynamic gradations; in his sense of continuity; in his expression of detail without checking the melodic flow; in his obtaining powerful effects without the sacrifice of tone; in these and many other respects he excited admiration.

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 13,

BLUE DANUBE WALTZ FOR PENSION FUND

Popular Program Fills Symphony Hall.

Recalling the list of novelties, few compositions played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have given more pleasure than "The Beautiful Blue Danube." Waltzes do not commonly appear upon its Friday and Saturday programs. Except for a surreptitious and fleeting moment, as that of Mr Carpenter's hurdy-gurdy in his "Adventures in a Perambulator," soon to be played by Dr Muck, they are rare. Nor have the concerts for the Pension Fund until now admitted them.

Yesterday afternoon the Blue Danube waltz and "William Tell" overture both were promised, and not by an orchestra of the size of the Pops, but by the complete organization. Some of the men in the leading chairs must have been reminded of the days of their boyhood. If the size and enthusiasm of the audience make a criterion, the experiment was a great success. Of the two Strausses, Johann's waltz is far more conducive to good cheer and a tranquil mind than Richard's Festival prelude, and Rossini's old overture, still fresh and sparkling, is a draught to be preferred to some tone poems made in Germany.

Tschaikowsky, who has divided honors with Wagner as patron of the pension fund, was drawn upon for his Fifth Symphony. It has escaped the sensational favoritism which has both spread and tarnished the Sixth. Dr Muck avoided hysteria and sentimentalism. Pages which upon occasion have sounded banal, were given noble expression, yet the barbaric fury of the finale was not sacrificed.

The concert suite of five numbers from the grand ballet of Lalo's opera, "Namouna" received a brilliant performance. Music distinctive for the piquancy of the themes, for the variety and virility of rhythm, the rich and colorful orchestration redolent of the Orient, it is admirable for such a program. Several surviving movements for violin and piano together with this suite make the hearer interested in the fate of Lalo's opera produced March 6, 1882, at the Opera in Paris, performed but 15 times, then withdrawn. The pictures of the market place were gay with color and life, music in which one could see Pavlowa dancing.

The first violin part of the finale of the "Tell" overture probably has not been played as cleanly or at as furious pace on many occasions. Nor should Mr Maquarre's flute be forgotten here in the obbligato to the song by English horn, or in the Oriental rhapsody in the "Market Day Shows" of the Lalo, which brought interrupting applause.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 11.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LIGHT PROGRAMME OF AGREEABLE MUSIC

The Distinctions of Performance That Glorified It—Dukas's Tonal Tale in Perfection of Vivid Detail—Enesco's Fiery Rhapsody of Folk-Tune—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony as a "Disposition of the Soul"

TOO much goes for granted with the public of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of the concert yesterday afternoon the audience departed highly pleased with a light programme of familiar pieces, easily comprehensible and readily entertaining—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Dukas's Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Smetana's tone-poem of the fallen Bohemian citadel, "Vysehrad," and one of Enesco's whirling Roumanian Rhadsodies: Repertory pieces all, as orchestral repertories run nowadays, but by no means played as such pieces often fare. It has been said—and not altogether justly—that Dr. Muck would rather polish to the last pitch of revealing and imparting perfection the performance of music with which he and the band are familiar than turn their mutual prowess into new and untried fields. It may also be true that the conductor puts on his programmes fewer novel numbers, especially by rising composers, than many of his hearers reasonably desire. On the other hand, it is in no spirit of sloth or of finicking preoccupation that he likes to refine—or in some instances to enlarge—upon such music as that of Dukas's Scherzo or of Enesco's Rhapsody.

Never has the tonal anecdote of the apprentice's adventures with the magic broom been told in our concerts with such clarity, precision and impeccable adjustment of harmonic, instrumental and rhythmic details as it was yesterday. Not a few may have been only for expert ears; but even casual listeners must have suspected that the mysterious voice and premonition of the music at the beginning; the working of the charm in the main body of the Scherzo as an inevitable and irresistible force; the perturbation, the relief and the final lifting of the spell—the serio-comic illusion of the whole, stimulating as so much music, fascinating as so much tonal suggestion and tonal narrative—sprang from a performance that far transcended routine.

Again, in Enesco's Rhapsody, what might easily seem rather monotonous repetitions and rehandlings of a few motives from Roumanian folk-song, Dr. Muck, by diversifying skill and intensifying imagination, transforms into flights of bravura intoxicating to hear. He modulates acutely and tingling; he makes shrewd play with suspensive pauses; he heightens color; he raises or diminishes emphases; he breaks or sustains rhythm. So played the Rhapsody sounds as though Enesco were pouring out the heady wine of Balkan folk-song—a vineyard in which few but him have begun to work—mixing it with the biting spice of instrumental coloring and orchestral virtuosity and finally heating the brew over the hot fires of stinging rhythms. Music that lacks seriousness as the mediocrities say, because they are prone, perhaps from long mediation over their own music, to confuse that useful quality with dulness. Music that lacks development that is no more than decked and re-decked iteration, cry the learned pundits with scorn in their voices.

Yet by this time, most of us know that Enesco is fertile of means and method and that he is wise enough and resourceful enough to choose and follow his own procedure. Color and reiteration best serve his purpose in the rhapsody; when counterpoint and development are more serviceable to his musical design he is expert with them. Moreover, there is an artistry of repetition in this music of native wildness, barely bridled for the concert-room that these same pundits and mediocrities are prone to overlook—the artistry that makes it whip ear and sensation until they tingle with these snapping rhythms, glow with this hot fire of speech and catch and crouch with the orchestra at the suspensive pauses that send it whirling more swiftly onward. Enesco knows this goading artistry that in him and in this particular rhapsody is half Roumanian instinct and half Viennese and Parisian sophistication. In general, it is the secret of the transformation of the wilder folk-music into an art-music that keeps the original thrill. Liszt knew it and applied it when he wrote his Hungarian rhapsodies.

Similarly, conductor and orchestra did much for Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. By this time most of those that hear it care little for the pictorial element in the music. They do not pursue the purling brook through the Andante as they are wont to do through certain passages in "The Creation" by ingenuous old Haydn. They do not listen for the sounds of the village musicians in the course of the scherzo. Tonal lightnings and thunders have long been commonplaces of music. There is no need of either shepherd's songs or hymns of thanksgiving to savor the upswelling of one of Beethoven's finales. It may even be suspected that most auditors yesterday cared not one pin whether Beethoven was fortunate enough to see and feel nature with the eyes and the temper of Mr. d'Indy and so gain the approval of a chapter in a monograph that more extols Beethoven the more closely he approaches the ideals and the ways of the eminent Parisian himself. Usually Beethoven's delineation in the Pastoral Symphony is so transparently clear and so savory in momentary suggestion that the hearer takes hardly a passing thought of it. Rather he listens to an absolute music that is born of what Rubinstein aptly called "the disposition of the composer's Beethoven, writing the symphony, was minded to instrumental song as fresh of melody, as flowing of fancy, as fecund in serene grace upon serene grace, as luminous as the day and as warm as sunshine and so he made the first movement. Attuned to as serene, fanciful and graceful a revery, he wrote the second movement of tranquil and songful musing. He made merry in the scherzo with his rustic dances, because such was his "disposition of soul" whereas it ran sometimes to rough and even fierce play with these bold and pounding rhythms. The thunderstorm, even to this day, is a little feat of ingenious interweaving of delineation into a symphonic web. The finale is Beethoven tranquilly and not turbulently exultant. If musing wanderings in the woods about Vienna quickened to him these moods, impulses and inventions, if his whole reflective love for the face and the suggestion of nature was background, as it were, to them, so much the better for the woods. But without "the dispositon of the soul" and of such a soul as Beethoven's, the Pastoral Symphony would hardly have been written. It is music of the spirit and not music of the scene.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAYS POPULAR PROGRAM

Delights Big Audience Present at Pension Fund Concert.

Seldom is the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard in a program of so popular a character as the one presented at yesterday's pension fund concert, and it was undoubtedly on this account that Symphony Hall was almost sold out. Financially, as well as artistically, the concert was a big success.

The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony—and this composer's music is always popularly received—Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, Lalo's "Namouna" ballet suite and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. All but the symphony might fairly be classified as "Pop" music. For this reason the concert was welcomed by the crowd and heartily enjoyed.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is hardly less notable than the "Pathic" symphony, by the same composer. It does not bear a title, yet it is obviously program music, with a sombre, fateful leading theme and with a general air of tragedy brooding over scenes of splendor and merriment. It is music intensely dramatic and richly melodious. It is much to be preferred to many works more frequently heard at the regular Symphony concerts. It suggests no problems in geometry, no excursions into the realms of psychology. Futurist music would probably have driven the audience back into the streets. The glowing, throbbing, passionate music of Tschaikowsky stirred the emotions, and the brilliancy of the performance aroused great applause.

The "Namouna" suite would also adorn any orchestra program, but it is so rarely played that probably most of those present yesterday heard it for the first time. Several parts of it are beautifully and picturesquely written. There are fine solo passages, permitting display of the virtuoso merits of many of the Symphony players. Yesterday, in fact, the audience interrupted the performance of the suite with applause for Mr. Maquarre's flute solo.

The "Blue Danube" waltz and the "William Tell" overture were reminiscent of the good old summer time and its "light refreshments."

After both the sympathy and the overture the applause continued until Dr. Muck, who was in his best form all the afternoon, invited the orchestra to share the honors with him.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 13,

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Gives First of Two Annual Affairs

The first of the two annual concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, in aid of its pension fund, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. For the first time in Boston Dr. Muck conducted the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, a symphony rated by many even higher than the sixth or "Pathetic" symphony, and this symphony was given a most dramatic and impressive reading.

In the second part of the programme the orchestra played with incomparable euphony and virtuosity Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, a delightful suite of Lalo's "Namouna," which has seldom [illegible] "William Tell" overture of Rossini. The beautiful waltz of Strauss, an acknowledged masterpiece of the first rank, was done exceptional justice by this wonderful band. The music of Lalo, with its exotic color and its piquant instrumentation, was an immediate success, justifying its brilliant renewal by Dr. Muck. The overture of Rossini again asserted its right to live even in days of such orchestral development as the present. The music holds its own and speaks to all by reason of its dramatic character and its expressive melodies.

The audience was a large one. It represented the enthusiastic response of the public of this city to any announcement of a concert by the Boston Symphony.

ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 13,

BOSTON SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

Benefit Concert Enjoyed by Large Number

The concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with a programme composed of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64; Strauss' Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube;" Lalo's Suite, "Namouna," and Rossini's "William Tell" overture.

Each season Boston's public looks forward to these concerts gratuitously given in so good a cause. And yesterday's programme was well up to the usual standard from a point of interest and popularity to the large audience which was present.

It surely is a pleasure and an unusual occurrence to see the great conductor so graciously unbend in the effort to please. Dr. Muck wisely chose the "Blue Danube" waltz and the "William Tell" overture. Probably no two compositions are more widely known or appreciated by the general public, and although performed under so many conditions as to give a widely diffused familiarity, they never again quite satisfy unless given by this great orchestra.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony is not conceded to be a particularly strong work, nevertheless it is a striking one. The introduction is conceived in that mood of sadness sa common to Tschaikowsky, followed in the main theme of the movement by modes of alternating melancholy and brightness.

The second movement, Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza, takes the form of a romance. A graceful and poetical waltz with the chief theme fitfully returning is the development in the third, Allegro moderato, while in the Finale, the Andante maestoso, the theme returns penetrated with religious feeling. The Allegro vivace, the Finale itself, grows gradually clearer, as if a load of suffering had been cast off. This entire symphony seems permeated with some heavy condition of mind which waits until the very close to clear away.

Most prominent as characteristics of Lalo's music are a sense of color and atmosphere. His command of harmonic effects and a skilful handling of the orchestra are prominently shown in the "Namouna" Suite.

There might be criticisms to make, but they would be hardly in keeping with the benevolent spirit of the concert which gave pleasure to so many people.

A. E. W.

BOSTON HERALD,

DECEMBER 13,

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR FUND

Dr. Muck Directs Notable Program Enjoyed by Great Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the season in aid of its pension fund yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64; Strauss, waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"; Lalo, suite, "Namouna"; Rossini, overture, "William Tell."

The cause for which the concert was given, the nature of the program, the fact that Dr. Muck conducted a famous symphony for the first time in Boston, drew a very large and brilliant audience. The hall was filled in every part by those who welcomed the opportunity to hear this superb orchestra with its distinguished leader. Many stood.

All the compositions played with one exception were familiar. This exception was Lalo's "Namouna" suite, which has not appeared on a symphony program for many years. It was last given here by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch, (10 years ago).

The Ballet of Namouna, produced in 1882 at the Paris Opera, is founded on an episode in the memoirs of Casanova. Namouna, a Greek slave, is won at dice from a corsair, Adriani, by Don Ottavio. After many adventures the corsair is slain and the lovers united.

Lalo wrote the ballet against his will and while he was fevrishly waiting for his opera "Le Roi d'ys" to be produced by Vaucorbell. He worked at his task 18 hours a day. One night he had a stroke of paralysis. This, for the moment, put an end to his labors. His friend Gounod finished the orchestration. The ballet was a dire failure. Lalo was then known chiefly as the composer of orchestral pieces and chamber music. The audience at the first performance refused to accept him as a writer of ballet and, seeing Delibes in the house, voiced its protest in furious applause for the composer of "Coppelia" and "Sylvia."

Yet this suite in four movements, Prelude, Serenade, Theme and Variations, Market-Day Shows and Festival, has been successfully performed abroad and in America. The music is charming and interesting. It has color and enchanting rhythms. Lalo's orchestration is ingenious and, in the Variations, his use of the brass extraordinary. The fourth movement is the most striking, has the most character.

Dr. Muck's conducting of Tschaikowsky's Symphony, was dramatic, noble, impressive, a great reading of a great work. In his choice of tempi; in his control of rhythm; in his infinite wealth of dynamic gradations; in his sense of continuity; in his expression of detail without checking the melodic flow; in his obtaining powerful effects without the sacrifice of tone; in these and many other respects he excited admiration.

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 13,

BLUE DANUBE WALTZ FOR PENSION FUND

Popular Program Fills Symphony Hall.

Recalling the list of novelties, few compositions played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have given more pleasure than "The Beautiful Blue Danube." Waltzes do not commonly appear upon its Friday and Saturday programs. Except for a surreptitious and fleeting moment, as that of Mr Carpenter's hurdy-gurdy in his "Adventures in a Perambulator," soon to be played by Dr Muck, they are rare. Nor have the concerts for the Pension Fund until now admitted them.

Yesterday afternoon the Blue Danube waltz and "William Tell" overture both were promised, and not by an orchestra of the size of the Pops, but by the complete organization. Some of the men in the leading chairs must have been reminded of the days of their boyhood. If the size and enthusiasm of the audience make a criterion, the experiment was a great success. Of the two Strausses, Johann's waltz is far more conducive to good cheer and a tranquil mind than Richard's Festival prelude, and Rossini's old overture, still fresh and sparkling, is a draught to be preferred to some tone poems made in Germany.

Tschaikowsky, who has divided honors with Wagner as patron of the pension fund, was drawn upon for his Fifth Symphony. It has escaped the sensational favoritism which has both spread and tarnished the Sixth. Dr Muck avoided hysteria and sentimentalism. Pages which upon occasion have sounded banal, were given noble expression, yet the barbaric fury of the finale was not sacrificed.

The concert suite of five numbers from the grand ballet of Lalo's opera, "Namouna" received a brilliant performance. Music distinctive for the piquancy of the themes, for the variety and virility of rhythm, the rich and colorful orchestration redolent of the Orient, it is admirable for such a program. Several surviving movements for violin and piano together with this suite make the hearer interested in the fate of Lalo's opera produced March 6, 1882, at the Opera in Paris, performed but 15 times, then withdrawn. The pictures of the market place were gay with color and life, music in which one could see Pavlowa dancing.

The first violin part of the finale of the "Tell" overture probably has not been played as cleanly or at as furious pace on many occasions. Nor should Mr Maquarre's flute be forgotten here in the obbligato to the song by English horn, or in the Oriental rhapsody in the "Market Day Shows" of the Lalo, which brought interrupting applause.

[64]

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 19,

America Needs Music

So Says Dr. Muck, Who Advises Giving Young People the Best Music Possible and Calls Ragtime Poison —Other Musical News of Interest

The Craftsman has been publishing a series of important and interesting interviews with noted European conductors who occupy positions of the first rank at present in this country, as formerly in Europe, interviews concerned especially with these conductors' estimates of musical conditions as they are now in America and as they may possibly develop in later years. Dr. Karl Muck is the last conductor to have been so interviewed, and he expressed his opinions of music in America with his wonted brilliancy and clearness in reasoning. His statements are particularly valuable, for Dr. Muck is a man of exceptional penetration; he is a thoughtful student of men as well as things; he is unflinchingly and unflatteringly sincere, and his opinion is the more valuable and interesting since it reflects characteristically the esthetic attitude of a great musician who is a representative product of centuries of European culture

"In America," said Dr. Muck, "you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way, you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not as a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, where there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions, when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests, when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballade or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy and settled in America in their own special ways, with their own special attitude and religion already made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines, whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry have time to take deep root in the hearts of the people. . .

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity . . . You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have their great idea of music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy, the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your rag-time is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start, I should say, give your young people the best music the world has known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of the musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical deevlopment and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as [illegible] are producing in America today [illegible] the cabaret and the second-rate [illegible] comedy is not folk music. It [illegible] the expression of a restless de- [illegible] the people for excitement, for improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitment. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation."

Of the musical unions: "A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; that he could make a little more money as a carpenter, and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the greatest musician who has the best salary."

Musical institutions, said Dr. Muck, should be fathered by the state and subsidized in such a way that they could, without depending upon public patronage, give productions of the highest rank. He found—and it certainly was a penetrating discovery, going to the root of much that affects standards of art in this country—that "politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern." Among other injurious effects, said Dr. Muck, this "places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy." This condition is "one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth."

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned; to be independent when they are young and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres, and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are doing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more clothes, more houses, more playthings, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

What would Mr. Henry F. Gilbert, Mr. Arthur Farwell and others of the devoted band of young American composers say to Dr. Muck's estimate of rag-time? Important compositions have appeared, of serious artistic value, with rag-time themes as a basis. One of the most significant compositions in this genre is Henry Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," a delightful work, in its freshness, its hilarity, its alternating passages of nature poetry, of the glory of pine forests and golden sunsets in a new land, and Mr. Gilbert has produced other compositions, in the same vein, of no less distinction and value. W. L. Humiston has produced a lively overture based on American folk themes. Much farther back, an admirable pianist, one Louis Moreau Gottschalk, produced some piano pieces of value, founded on Creole songs and dances. In the great West of which Dr. Muck speaks there is a wealth of cowboy and Indian folk song, much of which is wild and beautiful. As for the South and its distinctive musical product, the much abused "rag-time"—has not this rag-time become a popular musical idiom which must be recognized as an authentic expression of certain inherent qualities of American character? Every nation produces its cabaret music, its cheap music of the town, but even from this welter and confusion there has always emerged, in the course of the musical development of older countries than our own, a residuum of genuine, vital melody, expressive of the race. The subject is a big one. Many will agree with the views of the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as set forth above, in every particular. As to his estimate of social tendencies in this country and their influence upon art, who can fail to say, with deep regret, "Amen"? Dr. Muck has contributed importantly to the discussion of a very living issue in this country, and to those who have the actual work of making American music on their shoulders, his opinions will not be without a measure of practical value.

MONITOR, BOSTON

DECEMBER 18.

DEBUSSY "SEA" SKETCHES PLAYED BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Eighth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; Miss Ruth Deyo, soloist; afternoon of Dec. 17. The program: Debussy, "La Mer," three symphonic sketches; Tschaikowsky, piano concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor (Miss Deyo); Haydn, symphony in E-flat major (B. & H. No. 1).

The Symphony conductor, it seems, has lost his power to interpret program music. From being a brilliant exemplar of the art of orchestral description he has of late become an ineffective one. He no longer shows the knack of making his concerts tell a story or paint a picture. His gift for narrating adventure and for defining locality, which once distinguished him, has now left him. Just as in bringing out the illustrative qualities of the "Pastoral" symphony last week he was like one helpless, so he was, too, in setting forth the scenic detail of the "Sea" sketched this week. The excuse was found for him in his Beethoven reading that the music was of too remote a date to carry its illusion of a country holiday, that it could not under any circumstances persuade sophisticated listeners of today of its brookside, its gathering of peasants and of its succession of rising storm and clearing skies. But the conductor has failed quite as signally in bringing into realization the modern seaside excursion of Debussy.

Twice in succession, then, reading standard pieces composed in the program manner, pieces of widely separated dates and schools, Dr. Muck has proved unconvincing. And who among his listeners particularly cares? He may have lost his cunning as a symphonic showman and as a dictator of tone pageants, but very likely few will regret it. The question arises whether the Boston Symphony public is not ready for a respite from emphasis on the spectacular side of music, whether it is not ready to give its faculty of aural vision, which has been provoked to so much exertion in recent seasons, a period of rest. It has been invited to witness the exploits of a good many heroes, to visit a great number of art galleries and to cover a long itinerary of oriental cities, all in its tonal imagination. Perhaps it is ready for a change and is willing for a while just to hear some orchestral playing.

At all events the Symphony conductor, according to his behavior at the last two concerts seems to think his public wants such a change. He has presented notable examples of program music and has interpreted them with no attention whatever to the program and with a great deal of thought for the music. Thus the first of the three "Sea" sketches was no picture of the east reddening behind the islands out in the bay, but just melody, harmony and instrumental coloring of a Parisian composer. And in some way this composer took his place among his French contemporaries in a way he has never taken it before. He was far less a man of revolutionary ways and far more one of Gallic conventions that he has been hitherto. He was for a good part of the time only a new version of Massenet. His ideas were in many essentials those of the writers of opera comique.

Thus did the conductor take all strangeness out of the composition of Debussy and make it companionable with the concerto of Tschaikowsky and the symphony of Haydn. With the admirable assistance of Miss Deyo he made the concerto a work of great formal charm, divesting it of all adventitious interest as a medium for solo display and giving it character as a purely orchestral piece. In the Haydn number he showed that a full modern sonority is not incompatible with early classic elegance of design. A lightness of phrasing and an elasticity of rhythm in his baton kept the symphony in correct historic perspective.

TRANSCRI

DECEMBER 18,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TSCHAIKOVSKI'S SUPERB PIANO CONCERTO

Once More the Music Asserts Beyond Peradventure Its Beauty and Its Power —Miss Deyo's Share in the Performance —The Audience and Its Haydn — The Old Sea in Debussy's New Imagery

WHOEVER plays Tschaikovski's piano concerto in B-flat minor, it carries all before it. For the first time in almost four years it was heard anew at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon and to Miss Goodson, who undertook it in January of 1912, now succeeded Miss Deyo. After the manner of their singular but, in this instance, hardly superior sex, women pianists are ambitious of this concerto and for a transparent reason. Above all else the music demands power—power in the magnificent proclamation and return of the melody of the introduction; power in the rich songfulness and the nervous play of the melodies of the first movement; and power yet again in the fiery motives, the wild advances and recessions, the thrilling return of the theme of the beginning, in nearly all its splendor, and to cap the climax of a whirling finale. Beyond all other attainment, women, unless they are exceptionally wise and poised, crave power, whether they invent or whether they "execute" music. Augusta Holmès, the Parisian composer, was fain to write with the strength of a man; but her assumption of it has not saved her music from oblivion. Ethel Smyth, who has been wont to make operas for the English and the German stages and who numbered her late Britannic Majesty, Queen Victoria, and his present Teutonic Majesty, the Emperor William, among her exalted patrons, has never ceased to court it. Mme. Carreño used to seek power, beyond any other attribute with the piano; Mme. Zeisler seeks and gains it—beyond the average of her sex—in her playing today; Sophie Menter in her time volleyed and thundered with it; Mme. Samaroff wore herself down in eager quest of it; Miss Goodson would have it; Miss Deyo has seemed in her own concerts, no less than in those in which she has been only "assisting artist," to pursue it unrelaxingly. The "note" of this concerto of Tschaikovski is the note of power; from the first measure of the introduction to the last measure of the finale it is a masculine music. Therefore the women lust to play it.

Not they nor any pianist whatsoever can much darken or devitalize the piece, especially when there are a Muck and his band at hand to sustain and invigorate the orchestral part. Perhaps Bülow was right when he called the concerto the "fullest" of all the compositions by Tschaikovski that he knew, presumably meaning thereby that there was hardly an empty, a routine or a merely repeated measure in it. Prophecy has its obvious perils; but perhaps those prophets will be justified in the winnowing of time who predict that it—and mayhap the concerto for the violin—will survive all the Russian's symphonies and tone-poems.

The future is the future, and none may penetrate it. For the actual and the living present the concerto in itself is elation enough. In the whole body of Tschaikovski's music is there any such superb melody as the "great" theme—for long and now traditionally so labelled—of the introduction? How magnificently orchestra and piano proclaim the far-flung sweep of it; how gloriously it returns in those eloquent octaves. It is inspiration, if there ever was inspiration, and forthwith the prodigal Tschaikovski, careless in these his fertile days, tosses it aside, not to use it again until he clothes with its splendor the final measures of the whole concerto.. "I will not alter a note of it," snapped Tschaikovski at Nicholas Rubinstein, when the pianist misliked the whole concerto, and the composer was right.

So doing, perhaps the Russian knew the richness of his young invention. Out of it springs the tingling tune that begins the ardent Allegro; to it succeeds the warmly sensuous melody—of Tschaikovski to the core in its wistful and languorous voice—that makes the counter-theme. The "working-out" is equally imaginative and plentiful for piano and orchestra. The listening ear rejoices in the richness and variety, the spontaneity and felicity of the music.

The slow movement begins and the gently fanciful and sentimentalized melody caresses piano, orchestra and listeners. A second melody adds its reedy tang. The mood shifts and the light tune of the pseudo-Scherzo, exquisitely fused between piano and orchestra, woos new sensibilities. There is pause and the Finale crackles and swinges with glorified Slavic folk-tune in circling rondo. Then, of a sudden, as though it came striding, parting, stilling into all this wildness the "great" theme returns to sweep into the opulent and thrilling close.

What a concerto, even if Dr. Muck and Miss Deyo were not exactly one in this final reëntry of that mighty and majestic melody; if her tone was lamentably bodiless and colorless through almost the whole course of the introduction and the first movement! But within the limits of that tone, she struck rhythmic fire in the Finale and she perceived and imparted the lyric beauty and the insinuating euphonies of the Andantino and the pseudo-Scherzo. Moreover, how ingeniously and unobtrusively Dr. Muck scaled the orchestral part of the concerto to the resource and the power of the pianist. He can be considerate as well as severe and in more

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 19,

America Needs Music

So Says Dr. Muck, Who Advises Giving Young People the Best Music Possible and Calls Ragtime Poison —Other Musical News of Interest

The Craftsman has been publishing a series of important and interesting interviews with noted European conductors who occupy positions of the first rank at present in this country, as formerly in Europe, interviews concerned especially with these conductors' estimates of musical conditions as they are now in America and as they may possibly develop in later years. Dr. Karl Muck is the last conductor to have been so interviewed, and he expressed his opinions of music in America with his wonted brilliancy and clearness in reasoning. His statements are particularly valuable, for Dr. Muck is a man of exceptional penetration; he is a thoughtful student of men as well as things; he is unflinchingly and unflatteringly sincere, and his opinion is the more valuable and interesting since it reflects characteristically the esthetic attitude of a great musician who is a representative product of centuries of European culture

"In America," said Dr. Muck, "you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way, you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not as a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, where there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions, when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests, when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballade or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy and settled in America in their own special ways, with their own special attitude and religion already made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines, whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry have time to take deep root in the hearts of the people. . . .

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity . . . . You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have their great idea of music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy, the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your rag-time is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start, I should say, give your young people the best music the world has known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of the musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical deevlopment and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America today for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitment. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation."

Of the musical unions: "A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him to do his o work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; that he could make a little more money as a carpenter, and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the greatest musician who has the best salary."

Musical institutions, said Dr. Muck, should be fathered by the state and subsidized in such a way that they could, without depending upon public patronage, give productions of the highest rank. He found—and it certainly was a penetrating discovery, going to the root of much that affects standards of art in this country—that "politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern." Among other injurious effects, said Dr. Muck, this "places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy." This condition is "one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth."

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned; to be independent when they are young and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres, and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are doing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more clothes, more houses, more playthings, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

What would Mr. Henry F. Gilbert, Mr. Arthur Farwell and others of the devoted band of young American composers say to Dr. Muck's estimate of rag-time? Important compositions have appeared, of serious artistic value, with rag-time themes as a basis. One of the most significant compositions in this genre is Henry Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," a delightful work, in its freshness, its hilarity, its alternating passages of nature poetry, of the glory of pine forests and golden sunsets in a new land, and Mr. Gilbert has produced other compositions, in the same vein, of no less distinction and value. W. L. Humiston has produced a lively overture based on American folk themes. Much farther back, an admirable pianist, one Louis Moreau Gottschalk, produced some piano pieces of value, founded on Creole songs and dances. In the great West of which Dr. Muck speaks there is a wealth of cowboy and Indian folk song, much of which is wild and beautiful. As for the South and its distinctive musical product, the much abused "rag-time"—has not this rag-time become a popular musical idiom which must be recognized as an authentic expression of certain inherent qualities of American character? Every nation produces its cabaret music, its cheap music of the town, but even from this welter and confusion there has always emerged, in the course of the musical development of older countries than our own, a residuum of genuine, vital melody, expressive of the race. The subject is a big one. Many will agree with the views of the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as set forth above, in every particular. As to his estimate of social tendencies in this country and their influence upon art, who can fail to say, with deep regret, "Amen"? Dr. Muck has contributed importantly to the discussion of a very living issue in this country, and to those who have the actual work of making American music on their shoulders, his opinions will not be without a measure of practical value.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

DECEMBER 18,

DEBUSSY "SEA" SKETCHES PLAYED BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL—Eighth program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; Miss Ruth Deyo, soloist; afternoon of Dec. 17. The program: Debussy, "La Mer," three symphonic sketches; Tschaikowsky, piano concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor (Miss Deyo); Haydn, symphony in E-flat major (B. & H. No. 1).

The Symphony conductor, it seems, has lost his power to interpret program music. From being a brilliant exemplar of the art of orchestral description he has of late become an ineffective one. He no longer shows the knack of making his concerts tell a story or paint a picture. His gift for narrating adventure and for defining locality, which once distinguished him, has now left him. Just as in bringing out the illustrative qualities of the "Pastoral" symphony last week he was like one helpless, so he was, too, in setting forth the scenic detail of the "Sea" sketched this week. The excuse was found for him in his Beethoven reading that the music was of too remote a date to carry its illusion of a country holiday, that it could not under any circumstances persuade sophisticated listeners of today of its brookside, its gathering of peasants and of its succession of rising storm and clearing skies. But the conductor has failed quite as signally in bringing into realization the modern seaside excursion of Debussy.

Twice in succession, then, reading standard pieces composed in the program manner, pieces of widely separated dates and schools, Dr. Muck has proved unconvincing. And who among his listeners particularly cares? He may have lost his cunning as a symphonic showman and as a dictator of tone pageants, but very likely few will regret it. The question arises whether the Boston Symphony public is not ready for a respite from emphasis on the spectacular side of music, whether it is not ready to give its faculty of aural vision, which has been provoked to so much exertion in recent seasons, a period of rest. It has been invited to witness the exploits of a good many heroes, to visit a great number of art galleries and to cover a long itinerary of oriental cities, all in its tonal imagination. Perhaps it is ready for a change and is willing for a while just to hear some orchestral playing.

At all events the Symphony conductor, according to his behavior at the last two concerts seems to think his public wants such a change. He has presented notable examples of program music and has interpreted them with no attention whatever to the program and with a great deal of thought for the music. Thus the first of the three "Sea" sketches was no picture of the east reddening behind the islands out in the bay, but just melody, harmony and instrumental coloring of a Parisian composer. And in some way this composer took his place among his French contemporaries in a way he has never taken it before. He was far less a man of revolutionary ways and far more one of Gallic conventions that he has been hitherto. He was for a good part of the time only a new version of Massenet. His ideas were in many essentials those of the writers of opera comique.

Thus did the conductor take all strangeness out of the composition of Debussy and make it companionable with the concerto of Tschaikowsky and the symphony of Haydn. With the admirable assistance of Miss Deyo he made the concerto a work of great formal charm, divesting it of all adventitious interest as a medium for solo display and giving it character as a purely orchestral piece. In the Haydn number he showed that a full modern sonority is not incompatible with early classic elegance of design. A lightness of phrasing and an elasticity of rhythm in his baton kept the symphony in correct historic perspective.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 18,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TSCHAIKOVSKI'S SUPERB PIANO CONCERTO

Once More the Music Asserts Beyond Peradventure Its Beauty and Its Power —Miss Deyo's Share in the Performance —The Audience and Its Haydn — The Old Sea in Debussy's New Imagery

WHOEVER plays Tschaikovski's piano concerto in B-flat minor, it carries all before it. For the first time in almost four years it was heard anew at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon and to Miss Goodson, who undertook it in January of 1912, now succeeded Miss Deyo. After the manner of their singular but, in this instance, hardly superior sex, women pianists are ambitious of this concerto and for a transparent reason. Above all else the music demands power—power in the magnificent proclamation and return of the melody of the introduction; power in the rich songfulness and the nervous play of the melodies of the first movement; and power yet again in the fiery motives, the wild advances and recessions, the thrilling return of the theme of the beginning, in nearly all its splendor, and to cap the climax of a whirling finale. Beyond all other attainment, women, unless they are exceptionally wise and poised, crave power, whether they invent or whether they "execute" music. Augusta Holmès, the Parisian composer, was fain to write with the strength of a man; but her assumption of it has not saved her music from oblivion. Ethel Smyth, who has been wont to make operas for the English and the German stages and who numbered her late Britannic Majesty, Queen Victoria, and his present Teutonic Majesty, the Emperor William, among her exalted patrons, has never ceased to court it. Mme. Carreño used to seek power, beyond any other attribute with the piano; Mme. Zeisler seeks and gains it—beyond the average of her sex—in her playing today; Sophie Menter in her time volleyed and thundered with it; Mme. Samaroff wore herself down in eager quest of it; Miss Goodson would have it; Miss Deyo has seemed in her own concerts, no less than in those in which she has been only "assisting artist," to pursue it unrelaxingly. The "note" of this concerto of Tschaikovski is the note of power; from the first measure of the introduction to the last measure of the finale it is a masculine music. Therefore the women lust to play it.

Not they nor any pianist whatsoever can much darken or devitalize the piece, especially when there are a Muck and his band at hand to sustain and invigorate the orchestral part. Perhaps Bülow was right when he called the concerto the "fullest" of all the compositions by Tschaikovski that he knew, presumably meaning thereby that there was hardly an empty, a routine or a merely repeated measure in it. Prophecy has its obvious perils; but perhaps those prophets will be justified in the winnowing of time who predict that it—and mayhap the concerto for the violin—will survive all the Russian's symphonies and tone-poems.

The future is the future, and none may penetrate it. For the actual and the living present the concerto in itself is elation enough. In the whole body of Tschaikovski's music is there any such superb melody as the "great" theme—for long and now traditionally so labelled—of the introduction? How magnificently orchestra and piano proclaim the far-flung sweep of it; how gloriously it returns in those eloquent octaves. It is inspiration, if there ever was inspiration, and forthwith the prodigal Tschaikovski, careless in these his fertile days, tosses it aside, not to use it again until he clothes with its splendor the final measures of the whole concerto. "I will not alter a note of it," snapped Tschaikovski at Nicholas Rubinstein, when the pianist misliked the whole concerto, and the composer was right.

So doing, perhaps the Russian knew the richness of his young invention. Out of it springs the tingling tune that begins the ardent Allegro; to it succeeds the warmly sensuous melody—of Tschaikovski to the core in its wistful and languorous voice—that makes the counter-theme. The "working-out" is equally imaginative and plentiful for piano and orchestra. The listening ear rejoices in the richness and variety, the spontaneity and felicity of the music.

The slow movement begins and the gently fanciful and sentimentalized melody caresses piano, orchestra and listeners. A second melody adds its reedy tang. The mood shifts and the light tune of the pseudo-Scherzo, exquisitely fused between piano and orchestra, woos new sensibilities. There is pause and the Finale crackles and swinges with glorified Slavic folk-tune in circling rondo. Then, of a sudden, as though it came striding, parting, stilling into all this wildness the "great" theme returns to sweep into the opulent and thrilling close.

What a concerto, even if Dr. Muck and Miss Deyo were not exactly one in this final reëntry of that mighty and majestic melody; if her tone was lamentably bodiless and colorless through almost the whole course of the introduction and the first movement! But within the limits of that tone, she struck rhythmic fire in the Finale and she perceived and imparted the lyric beauty and the insinuating euphonies of the Andantino and the pseudo-Scherzo. Moreover, how ingeniously and unobtrusively Dr. Muck scaled the orchestral part of the concerto to the resource and the power of the pianist. He can be considerate as well as severe and in more ways than perhaps Miss Deyo suspected [illegible] to the concerto was the little symphony by Haydn that ended the concert to an obbligato of departing auditors with whom in the pauses between the movements the conductor was ironically and even sardonically patient. Moreover, it was painful to the mere observer to note that many of these early goers were of those who often sigh for the "good old music of melody that they love." Yesterday, they received it and in a performance that would have warmed the cockles of their ears; but so small a matter as a two-hour concert seemed to dampen their ostentatious affection. So much the worse for them, since they missed the strange note of mystery that Hadyn strikes in the introduction, as though he were something graver than a fertile, adroit and smiling symphonist according to the ways of the eighteenth century; the light and shadow of the ensuing Allegro like sunshine on a floor when a curtain sways in a breeze; the precision of phrase and rhythm with which the string choir in absolute unity and elasticity sang the melody of the Andante; the variation that Mr. Witek, with exquisite suavity of tone and modulation, wrought in solo upon it; the melodious stateliness of the minuet; and the biting contrasts in the harmonic vesture of the Finale. Elsewhere than in Boston, the perfections of the orchestra and Dr. Muck in these little symphonies of Haydn are occasion for felicitation and not for flight. They set free the imagination of the composer and he had more than those that call him merely tuneful believe; they disclose the nicety of his means, his strokes, his adjustments; and they reveal, beyond much modern music, the deft and suave exactitude and the impeccable taste and style of conductor and band with this music. Can it be that our audiences prefer Haydn, if they listen to him at all, merely "run off" in the day's work?

Perhaps, however, the company of yesterday believed that it had enjoyed and applauded sufficiently the collective and individual distinctions of the orchestra in the three sea-pieces of Debussy that began the concert. They teem with opportunities for them. From the very tapping of the tamtam and the chromatic flickers of Mr. Holy's and Mr. Cella's harps, through the rich sonorities of the brass, the penetrating or the songful voices of the wood-winds and the coalescing or divided mass, the incisive accents or the sustained shimmer, of the strings, Debussy is incessantly dependent upon instrumental timbres for his suggestion of color and light, of changeful and suffusing atmosphere. He asks in these three "symphonic sketches" a most sensitive and illusory orchestra and conductor. He received both and they were as alert and imaginative to rhythm as they were to timbres. For it is rhythm more than aught else that gives to the music as such in the "absolute" sense of the word unity and progression. Yet in all this atmospheric play of instrumental and harmonic color, in all this dependence upon the elastic bond of rhythm, there are clear motives. The oboe sings one unmistakably in the first sketch; the trumpets sound forth another in the third; the horns have their turn in the second. One and another of these motives is frankly songful; none lacks its clear profile. Yet in Debussy's and his sympathetic listeners' incessant pursuit of movement and color, of delineative suggestion and imaginative implication, only too insistent and a little pedantic minds take thought of the structure and the evolution of the music. Long since the most sceptical have granted the Parisian a well-grounded scholarship of his own.

"The Sea," however, is not music of formal fact but of pictorial and poetized illusion served by highly adroit, exceedingly subtle and often exquisitely imaginative means. Through all the first and the second sketches it is music of sustained atmosphere and insinuating suggestion. The sea lies darkling and listless The light of the dawn begins to glint it; the breeze of the morning to stir it. Reflections traverse the surface of the waters and ripple and wavelet ruffle it as the light and the winds wax with the advancing day. Soon it shines and swings. There is suggestion—as in the melody of the oboe—of haunting beauty and solitude. The quickening of the morning yields to the gentle calm of noon. Then, may be, as in the second sketch, the waves stir into flashing play. The instruments of percussion rhythm it; the wood-winds scatter spray; the horns lend rich depths of color; the strings crinkle and flash. There are gusts of dissonance. There is melody again of solitude and mystery. The breeze dies; the sea slowly stills itself. Yet only to rise again when the trumpets fling out its might and the other choirs of the orchestra set wind and waves in lustier and lustier dialogue. The wind sweeps; the waves surge. Clearly Debussy would summon in tones a tumultous as well as a listless, a stirring or a playful sea. He has his Gallic liking for rounded composition and by the middle years in which "The Sea" was written, he is ready to add power to subtlety. Dr. Muck and the orchestra obey to the letter the word "tumultueux" that he has written over a tonal tempest that is the more illusory for its disdain of the conventions of sea-music and the substitution of a new tonal imagery. It is in such novel imagery again that light and life quicken the waters or that they leap and laugh in their play. Of the age-old sea Debussy has raised new vision.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

DECEMBER 18,

MISS DEYO AROUSES ENTHUSIASM AT THE SYMPHONY

Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist and soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, rather carried off the honors of the afternoon. The program was: Debussy, "The Sea: Three Orchestral Sketches"; Tschaikowsky, concerto for piano, B flat minor, No. 1; Haydn, symphony in E flat major (B. and H. No. 1.)

Debussy is not particularly successful in his sea pictures. The music is interesting, but scarcely conveys the meaning sought by the composer. The selection was, however, received with more enthusiasm, particularly the second and third movements, than has been the case heretofore.

Miss Deyo was right in the vein, and was enthusiastically applauded at every opportunity, being recalled and recalled at the close of the number. Evidently not a few in the audience came to hear the soloist rather than the concert, for there was quite an exodus as the pianist left the platform.

Haydn's symphony afforded a decided contrast to the Tschaikowsky number, and would have afforded greater pleasure had there been less interruption from people leaving the hall during its playing. This may be the holiday shopping season, and the concert may have been a trifle long, but that affords no excuse for interruptions which compel the conductor to delay the concert for people to leave the hall.

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 18,

DEBUSSY'S SKETCHES OF THE SEA PLAYED

Performance Eloquent With Nature's Moods.

Orchestra Gorgeous in Concerto—Miss Deyo Immature Pianist.

Debussy's three symphonic sketches of the sea were played at the Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon. The fluidity of this music, its remoteness from all that suggests the literal and the obvious, its unfettered vision, born out of dreams, its kinship with the bleak wild ways of nature, as if through it nature had told her secrets, all reminds of the lonely, incomparable beauty of this speech, as it is known in "Pelleas and Melisande," in this and other poems for orchestra.

Shimmering in the dawn, reflecting the noonday glory, capricious, caressing, turbulent, torrential, a monster of destruction, partner to the fury of the wind, the great deep is unfolded as a scroll. It is a creature of whims and fancies. There are no attempts at absolute or photographic realism. It is music of the most untrammeled imagination. It lacks the stereotyped form of the analyst, but it possesses that noble repose of the sea, a repose of ceaseless motion, transformed into a thousand shapes and visions. The second picture, the frolics of the waves, might ask yet lighter treatment, but the suite was played throughout with kindling imagination, with gorgeous colors.

The beauty of Tschaikowsky's orchestra in the B-flat minor concerto for piano was never more apparent. Dr Muck and the players gave a magnificent performance. The piano part is not a miniature to be played with pretty facility. Miss Deyo, whatever her abilities as a pianist in recital or in the drawing room, undertook music for which she is unsuited in physical strength, in technic and in temperament.

Haydn's symphony in E-flat, played with fine spirit, closed the program.

BOSTON HERALD,

DECEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY GIVES "SEA" OF DEBUSSY

Superb Performance Stirs Enthusiasm— Miss Ruth Deyo Pianist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Debussy, "The Sea: Three Orchestral Sketches"; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for piano, B flat minor, No. 1; Haydn, Symphony in E flat major (B and H. No. 1.)

[66]

When Dr. Muck first conducted Debussy's "Sea" in 1907 at a public rehearsal, hardly a hand was heard in applause. Yesterday he was recalled after the third sketch; there was hearty applause after the second; there was moderate appreciation of the first. The times change and we change with them. The idiom of Debussy is by this time familiar. His orchestral compositions are no longer thought formless and incoherent. Quotations from his works are admitted into even grave treatises on harmony. In comparison with Schoenberg, Stravinsky and young Mr. Ornstein, his Muse now wears a high-neck dress and a cameo brooch; her hair is plastered on her forehead.

As these Sketches are frankly impressionistic, the enjoyment of the hearer depends largely on his own susceptibility and imagination. There are persons who do not like the ocean. Oscar Wilde was disappointed in the Atlantic; but there are more normal beings, far from being poseurs, who cannot exclaim with Jules Laforgue, "the sea, always new, always respectable!" We know a man who was doomed to spend a vacation in a summer hotel on a bluff looking down on Nantucket Sound. Whenever he sat on a bench he turned his back to the ocean and faced pine trees, giving as an excuse that "the sea got on his nerves."

Debussy's "Sea" is not for them, neither is it for those who find pleasure in Mendelssohn's overture to "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." For Debussy knows a wilder ocean, many-faced, now exulting in Aeschylean laughter, now spasmodic, sinister, terrible, and never so terrible as when calm, or inviting mortals to sport with it, and smiling, as though it were forgetful of rotting ships and sunken treasure and the drowned far down that were for a time regarded curiously by monsters of the deep.

No one has painted in music so vividly and with such varied coloring the phases of the ocean as Debussy. Hanslick maintained that there is music that "stinks." There are pages of Debussy that smell of brine.

Others recall to the hearer the ripples rustling up "hoarse and sibilant," waves moaning or angry.

Some vast heart, like a planet's, chain'd and
chafing in those breakers,
By lengthen'd swell and spasm, and panting
breath,
And rhythm's rasping of thy sands and waves,
And serpent hiss, and savage peals of laughter,
And undertones of distant lion roar,
Sounding, appealing to the sky's deaf ear.

This music of Debussy surpasses even [illegible] description of the storm that wrecked the Comprachicos, of the whirlwind issuing from the Nothing which is All. "It is a shapeless howling. It is the inarticulate spoken by the indefinite. At intervals it is a complaint; space laments and justifies itself."

Tschaikowsky's concerto has now been played at these concerts by 12 pianists, including Miss Ruth Deyo, the pianist yesterday; and of them five were women. We all feel that this concerto is eminently for a strong man. For this reason, no doubt, women are anxious to play it. There have been amazonian pianists, as Sophie Menter, Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mme. Carreno in her younger days, Adele aus der Ohe, who played Liszt's concerto in E flat with amazing dash and brillianee, and in other concertos was a Diana, cool, chaste, shooting inexorable darts with fatal aim.

Was Miss Deyo's choice a wise one? We associate her with music of a more refined, more poetic, subtler, vaporous character. Her performance yesterday was musical, charming in the purely lyrical passages, clear in bravura, surprisingly masculine in the pompous chords of the introduction, but there were times when we missed the vigor that in a performance of this work should approach drunken frenzy if not sheer brutality. For there are pages that are brutal, with the strange melancholy of the Russian that seeks relief and forgetfulness in vodka.

The performance of Debussy's "Sea" was superb in every way, and the symphony of Haydn was played with the polished vitality that only this orchestra led by Dr. Muck can give to it. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Carpenter, suite "Adventures in a Perambulator" (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saens, concerto in A minor for 'cello (Mr. Malkin, 'cellist); Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings (Mr. Marshall, organist).

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SHARP CONTRAST

IN WHICH DR. MUCK TAKES ESPECIAL DELIGHT

Miss Ruth Deyo Scores Triumph as Soloist—Debussy and Haydn

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME.

Debussy—Three Orchestral Sketches, "La Mer."
Tschaikowsky—Piano Concerto, B-flat minor. Solist, Ruth Deyo.
Haydn—Symphony in E flat major.

We have heard Debussy's views upon the sea several times now and are still not convinced that he is a good tone-poet in maritime affairs. He does not, to be sure, deal with submarines or sea-serpents, but on the other hand he does not picture real sailors or salt breezes. One cannot write upon this work the words of Walt Whitman:—

"Today a rude [illegible]
Of ships sailing the seas,
Each with its special flag, or ship-signal,
Of unnamed heroes in the ships,
Of waves spreading and spreading
Far as the eye can reach,
Of dashing spray, and the winds piping and
blowing,
And out of these a song, for the sailors
of all nations,
Fitful, like a surge."

There is more of the salt sea in ten measures of the "Flying Dutchman Overture" than in this work from beginning to end.

The title of the first movement, "From Dawn to Noon Upon the Ocean," suggests that it is going to run at least through two watches, but it is considerably less than eight hours long, although very baleful while it lasts. There was muted horn enough in this to suggest that every sailor aboard had touches of seasickness.

Nevertheless there were moments of impressiveness, too, but everything seemed fragmentary and disjointed. One might place such a work above Mendelssohn's "Seal-calm and Prosperous Voyage," but much below his "Hebrides," or the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony."

The second movement has a fine glow of color and viewed purely as orchestral music might be commended, but it comes no nearer to its subject than the rest of the work. There is much brilliancy in the finale and perhaps some of the recreations of the second dog-watch lifted the composer out of his oceanic woes, but it was only temporary. The work is a libel on Father Neptune. Its many oboe wailings and muted horn groans suggest that Debussy was not picturing the sea of Wagner, or Rubinstein, or Mendelssohn, but Shakespeare's "Sea of Troubles," or else that very unpleasant ocean portrayed by Coleridge in his "Ancient Mariner:"—

"The very deep did rot; O Christ!
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea."

That is the kind of sea which occupies the greater part of this orchestral picture, so far as we can discover. Skill in orchestration and much originality is there, but beyond that there is nothing to commend. We can only regard the work as a "frightful example," a warning of how not to write marine tone-pictures. The excellent performance deserved what applause the composition received.

Then came Tschaikowsky's concerto with Miss Ruth Deyo at the piano. This is the work which Nicolas Rubinstein found fault with and which Hanslick found unpleasant. All that is changed and the critics have reversed their opinions. It is a composition which has a wild and frenzied finale, which suggests a bacchanalian orgie. Therefore, almost all the lady pianists try to play it. There are direct folk-song reminiscences in the work, especially in the first and last movements. The second movement embodies the vein of both Scherzo and Slow movement in its treatment. The concerto belongs in some degree to Boston, since it was in this city that Von Buelow first played it and it was from here that the success of the work was cabled to the composer.

Miss Deyo did very much with the concerto. She played the difficult first movement with commendable technical skill and superb breadth, and she gave becoming muscularity to the finale. But for all that, it is a work which we much prefer to hear from masculine hands. One would as soon think of a female pianist picturing the dissipations of Nijni-Novgorod in fair-time as of her giving full expression to the orgie of this particular concerto. Nevertheless, we must hasten to add that Miss Deyo made more of it than any female pianist that we have yet heard in the work, and there was elasticity as well as power in the performance. The ensemble was excellent and Miss Deyo was recalled and re-recalled with great enthusiasm.

Then followed one of those very sharp contrasts in which Dr. Muck seems to take especial delight. To go from Tschaikowsky's revelry to Haydn's naive prattle was like going direct from Zola to Wordsworth, or from Vodka to milk. Nevertheless we generally enjoy Haydn's symphonies better than any 18th century works in this form. Mozart attempts dramatic effects, and these shrivel up somewhat when compared with the tremendous dramatic compositions of the present. But Haydn never tries to become too intense. He gives most of his themes "a la Watteau," in simple and direct prettiness, and is as restful as a reclining chair.

Of course there is nothing of technical difficulty in such a work as this symphony, at least not for our orchestra, but it is to their credit that they do not slight the interpretation of the work. They gave as careful an ensemble as would be found in more ambitious works, and the light airiness and grace lent a peculiar charm to the final work even if the fiery concerto neutralized it somewhat.

We are glad that Dr. Muck does not allow the auditor, in the midst of so much that is modern, to forget that there were simpler, calmer days in music, once upon a time.

The conservative critic and composer, Hiller, once said to the present writer: "The danger in America is that your audiences get at once the most advanced and sensational modern music. They do not grow up to it by degrees, as we have done in Germany." It is well that we have such an educator as Dr. Muck

The foil to the concerto was the little symphony by Haydn that ended the concert to an obbligato of departing auditors with whom in the pauses between the movements the conductor was ironically and even sardonically patient. Moreover, it was painful to the mere observer to note that many of these early goers were of those who often sigh for the "good old music of melody that they love." Yesterday, they received it and in a performance that would have warmed the cockles of their ears; but so small a matter as a two-hour concert seemed to dampen their ostentatious affection. So much the worse for them, since they missed the strange note of mystery that Hadyn strikes in the introduction, as though he were something graver than a fertile, adroit and smiling symphonist according to the ways of the eighteenth century; the light and shadow of the ensuing Allegro like sunshine on a floor when a curtain sways in a breeze; the precision of phrase and rhythm with which the string choir in absolute unity and elasticity sang the melody of the Andante; the variation that Mr. Witek, with exquisite suavity of tone and modulation, wrought in solo upon it; the melodious stateliness of the minuet; and the biting contrasts in the harmonic vesture of the Finale. Elsewhere than in Boston, the perfections of the orchestra and Dr. Muck in these little symphonies of Haydn are occasion for felicitation and not for flight. They set free the imagination of the composer and he had more than those that call him merely tuneful believe; they disclose the nicety of his means, his strokes, his adjustments; and they reveal, beyond much modern music, the deft and suave exactitude and the impeccable taste and style of conductor and band with this music. Can it be that our audiences prefer Haydn, if they listen to him at all, merely "run off" in the day's work?

Perhaps, however, the company of yesterday believed that it had enjoyed and applauded sufficiently the collective and individual distinctions of the orchestra in the three sea-pieces of Debussy that began the concert. They teem with opportunities for them. From the very tapping of the tam-tam and the chromatic flickers of Mr. Holy's and Mr. Cella's harps, through the rich sonorities of the brass, the penetrating or the songful voices of the wood-winds and the coalescing or divided mass, the incisive accents or the sustained shimmer, of the strings, Debussy is incessantly dependent upon instrumental timbres for his suggestion of color and light, of changeful and suffusing atmosphere. He asks in these three "symphonic sketches" a most sensitive and illusory orchestra and conductor. He received both and they were as alert and imaginative to rhythm as they were to timbres. For it is rhythm more than aught else that gives to the music as such in the "absolute" sense of the word unity and progression. Yet in all this atmospheric play of instrumental and harmonic color, in all this dependence upon the elastic bond of rhythm, there are clear motives. The oboe sings one unmistakably in the first sketch; the trumpets sound forth another in the third; the horns have their turn in the second. One and another of these motives is frankly songful; none lacks its clear profile. Yet in Debussy's and his sympathetic listeners' incessant pursuit of movement and color, of delineative suggestion and imaginative implication, only too insistent and a little pedantic minds take thought of the structure and the evolution of the music. Long since the most sceptical have granted the Parisian a well-grounded scholarship of his own.

"The Sea," however, is not music of formal fact but of pictorial and poetized illusion served by highly adroit, exceedingly subtle and often exquisitely imaginative means. Through all the first and the second sketches it is music of sustained atmosphere and insinuating suggestion. The sea lies darkling and listless The light of the dawn begins to glint it; the breeze of the morning to stir it. Reflections traverse the surface of the waters and ripple and wavelet ruffle it as the light and the winds wax with the advancing day. Soon it shines and swings. There is suggestion—as in the melody of the oboe—of haunting beauty and solitude. The quickening of the morning yields to the gentle calm of noon. Then, may be, as in the second sketch, the waves stir into flashing play. The instruments of percussion rhythm it; the wood-winds scatter spray; the horns lend rich depths of color; the strings crinkle and flash. There are gusts of dissonance. There is melody again of solitude and mystery. The breeze dies; the sea slowly stills itself. Yet only to rise again when the trumpets fling out its might and the other choirs of the orchestra set wind and waves in lustier and lustier dialogue. The wind sweeps; the waves surge. Clearly Debussy would summon in tones a tumultous as well as a listless, a stirring or a playful sea. He has his Gallic liking for rounded composition and by the middle years in which "The Sea" was written, he is ready to add power to subtlety. Dr. Muck and the orchestra obey to the letter the word "tumultueux" that he has written over a tonal tempest that is the more illusory for its disdain of the conventions of sea-music and the substitution of a new tonal imagery. It is in such novel imagery again that light and life quicken the waters or that they leap and laugh in their play. Of the age-old sea Debussy has raised new vision.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

DECEMBER 18,

MISS DEYO AROUSES ENTHUSIASM AT THE SYMPHONY

Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist and soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, rather carried off the honors of the afternoon. The program was: Debussy, "The Sea: Three Orchestral Sketches"; Tschaikowsky, concerto for piano, B flat minor, No. 1; Haydn, symphony in E flat major (B. and H. No. 1.)

Debussy is not particularly successful in his sea pictures. The music is interesting, but scarcely conveys the meaning sought by the composer. The selection was, however, received with more enthusiasm, particularly the second and third movements, than has been the case heretofore.

Miss Deyo was right in the vein, and was enthusiastically applauded at every opportunity, being recalled and recalled at the close of the number. Evidently not a few in the audience came to hear the soloist rather than the concert, for there was quite an exodus as the pianist left the platform.

Haydn's symphony afforded a decided contrast to the Tschaikowsky number, and would have afforded greater pleasure had there been less interruption from people leaving the hall during its playing. This may be the holiday shopping season, and the concert may have been a trifle long, but that affords no excuse for interruptions which compel the conductor to delay the concert for people to leave the hall.

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 18,

DEBUSSY'S SKETCHES OF THE SEA PLAYED

Performance Eloquent With Nature's Moods.

Orchestra Gorgeous in Concerto—Miss Deyo Immature Pianist.

Debussy's three symphonic sketches of the sea were played at the Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon. The fluidity of this music, its remoteness from all that suggests the literal and the obvious, its unfettered vision, born out of dreams, its kinship with the bleak wild ways of nature, as if through it nature had told her secrets, all reminds of the lonely, incomparable beauty of this speech, as it is known in "Pelleas and Melisande," in this and other poems for orchestra.

Shimmering in the dawn, reflecting the noonday glory, capricious, caressing, turbulent, torrential, a monster of destruction, partner to the fury of the wind, the great deep is unfolded as a scroll. It is a creature of whims and fancies. There are no attempts at absolute or photographic realism. It is music of the most untrammeled imagination. It lacks the stereotyped form of the analyst, but it possesses that noble repose of the sea, a repose of ceaseless motion, transformed into a thousand shapes and visions. The second picture, the frolics of the waves, might ask yet lighter treatment, but the suite was played throughout with kindling imagination, with gorgeous colors.

The beauty of Tschaikowsky's orchestra in the B-flat minor concerto for piano was never more apparent. Dr Muck and the players gave a magnificent performance. The piano part is not a miniature to be played with pretty facility. Miss Deyo, whatever her abilities as a pianist in recital or in the drawing room, undertook music for which she is unsuited in physical strength, in technic and in temperament.

Haydn's symphony in E-flat, played with fine spirit, closed the program.

BOSTON HERALD,

DECEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY GIVES "SEA" OF DEBUSSY

Superb Performance Stirs Enthusiasm— Miss Ruth Deyo Pianist.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Debussy, "The Sea: Three Orchestral Sketches"; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for piano, B flat minor, No. 1; Haydn, Symphony in E flat major (B. and H. No. 1.)

When Dr. Muck first conducted Debussy's "Sea" in 1907 at a public rehearsal, hardly a hand was heard in applause. Yesterday he was recalled after the third sketch; there was hearty applause after the second; there was moderate appreciation of the first. The times change and we change with them. The idiom of Debussy is by this time familiar. His orchestral compositions aer no longer thought formless and incoherent. Quotations from his works are admitted into even grave treatises on harmony. In comparison with Schoenberg, Stravinsky and young Mr. Ornstein, his Muse now wears a high-neck dress and a cameo brooch; her hair is plastered on her forehead.

As these Sketches are frankly impressionistic, the enjoyment of the hearer depends largely on his own susceptibility and imagination. There are persons who do not like the ocean. Oscar Wilde was disappointed in the Atlantic; but there are more normal beings, far from being poseurs, who cannot exclaim with Jules Laforgue, "the sea, always new, always respectable!" We know a man who was doomed to spend a vacation in a summer hotel on a bluff looking down on Nantucket Sound. Whenever he sat on a bench he turned his back to the ocean and faced pine trees, giving as an excuse that "the sea got on his nerves."

Debussy's "Sea" is not for them, neither is it for those who find pleasure in Mendelssohn's overture to "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." For Debussy knows a wilder ocean, many-faced, now exulting in Aeschylean laughter, now spasmodic, sinister, terrible, and never so terrible as when calm, or inviting mortals to sport with it, and smiling, as though it were forgetful of rotting ships and sunken treasure and the drowned far down that were for a time regarded curiously by monsters of the deep.

No one has painted in music so vividly and with such varied coloring the phases of the ocean as Debussy. Hanslick maintained that there is music that "stinks." There are pages of Debussy that smell of brine.

Others recall to the hearer the ripples rustling up "hoarse and sibilant," waves moaning or angry.

Some vast heart, like a planet's, chain'd and
chafing in those breakers,
By lengthen'd swell and spasm, and panting
breath,
And rhythm's rasping of thy sands and waves,
And serpent hiss, and savage peals of laughter,
And undertones of distant lion roar,
Sounding, appealing to the sky's deaf ear.

This music of Debussy surpasses ever description of the storm that wrecked the Comprachicos, of the whirlwind issuing from the Nothing which is All. "It is a shapeless howling. It is the inarticulate spoken by the indefinite. At intervals it is a complaint; space laments and justifies itself."

Tschaikowsky's concerto has now been played at these concerts by 12 pianists, including Miss Ruth Deyo, the pianist yesterday; and of them five were women. We all feel that this concerto is eminently for a strong man. For this reason, no doubt, women are anxious to play it. There have been amazonian pianists, as Sophie Menter, Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mme. Carreno in her younger days, Adele aus der Ohe, who played Liszt's concerto in E flat with amazing dash and brilliance, and in other concertos was a Diana, cool, chaste, shooting inexorable darts with fatal aim.

Was Miss Deyo's choice a wise one? We associate her with music of a more refined, more poetic, subtler, vaporous character. Her performance yesterday was musical, charming in the purely lyrical passages, clear in bravura, surprisingly masculine in the pompous chords of the introduction, but there were times when we missed the vigor that in a performance of this work should approach drunken frenzy if not sheer brutality. For there are pages that are brutal, with the strange melancholy of the Russian that seeks relief and forgetfulness in vodka.

The performance of Debussy's "Sea" was superb in every way, and the symphony of Haydn was played with the polished vitality that only this orchestra led by Dr. Muck can give to it. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Carpenter, suite "Adventures in a Perambulator" (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saens, concerto in A minor for 'cello (Mr. Malkin, 'cellist); Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings (Mr. Marshall, organist).

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SHARP CONTRAST

IN WHICH DR. MUCK TAKES ESPECIAL DELIGHT

Miss Ruth Deyo Scores Triumph as Soloist—Debussy and Haydn

BY LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAMME.

Debussy—Three Orchestral Sketches. "La Mer."
Tschaikowsky—Piano Concerto, B-flat minor. Solist, Ruth Deyo.
Haydn—Symphony in E flat major.

We have heard Debussy's views upon the sea several times now and are still not convinced that he is a good tone-poet in maritime affairs. He does not, to be sure, deal with submarines or sea-serpents, but on the other hand he does not picture real sailors or salt breezes. One cannot write upon this work the words of Walt Whitman:—

"Today a rude [illegible]
Of ships sailing the seas,
Each with its special flag, or ship-signal,
Of unnamed heroes in the ships,
Of waves spreading and spreading
Far as the eye can reach,
Of dashing spray, and the winds piping and
blowing,
And out of these a song, for the sailors
of all nations,
Fitful, like a Surge."

There is more of the salt sea in ten measures of the "Flying Dutchman Overture" than in this work from beginning to end.

The title of the first movement, "From Dawn to Noon Upon the Ocean," suggests that it is going to run at least through two watches, but it is considerably less than eight hours long, although very baleful while it lasts. There was muted horn enough in this to suggest that every sailor aboard had touches of seasickness.

Nevertheless there were moments of impressiveness, too, but everything seemed fragmentary and disjointed. One might place such a work above Mendelssohn's "Seal-calm and Prosperous Voyage," but much below his "Hebrides," or the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony."

The second movement has a fine glow of color and viewed purely as orchestral music might be commended, but it comes no nearer to its subject than the rest of the work. There is much brilliancy in the finale and perhaps some of the recreations of the second dog-watch lifted the composer out of his oceanic woes, but it was only temporary. The work is a libel on Father Neptune. Its many oboe wailings and muted horn groans suggest that Debussy was not picturing the sea of Wagner, or Rubinstein, or Mendelssohn, but Shakespeare's "Sea of Troubles," or else that very unpleasant ocean portrayed by Coleridge in his "Ancient Mariner:"—

"The very deep did rot; O Christ!
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea."

That is the kind of sea which occupies the greater part of this orchestral picture, so far as we can discover. Skill in orchestration and much originality is there, but beyond that there is nothing to commend. We can only regard the work as a "frightful example," a warning of how not to write marine tone-pictures. The excellent performance deserved what applause the composition received.

Then came Tschaikowsky's concerto with Miss Ruth Deyo at the piano. This is the work which Nicolas Rubinstein found fault with and which Hanslick found unpleasant. All that is changed and the critics have reversed their opinions. It is a composition which has a wild and frenzied finale, which suggests a bacchanalian orgie. Therefore, almost all the lady pianists try to play it. There are direct folk-song reminiscences in the work, especially in the first and last movements. The second movement embodies the vein of both Scherzo and Slow movement in its treatment. The concerto belongs in some degree to Boston, since it was in this city that Von Buelow first played it and it was from here that the success of the work was cabled to the composer.

Miss Deyo did very much with the concerto. She played the difficult first movement with commendable technical skill and superb breadth, and she gave becoming muscularity to the finale. But for all that, it is a work which we much prefer to hear from masculine hands. One would as soon think of a female pianist picturing the dissipations of Nijni-Novgorod in fair-time as of her giving full expression to the orgie of this particular concerto. Nevertheless, we must hasten to add that Miss Deyo made more of it than any female pianist that we have yet heard in the work, and there was elasticity as well as power in the performance. The ensemble was excellent and Miss Deyo was recalled and re-recalled with great enthusiasm.

Then followed one of those very sharp contrasts in which Dr. Muck seems to take especial delight. To go from Tschaikowsky's revelry to Haydn's naive prattle was like going direct from Zola to Wordsworth, or from Vodka to milk. Nevertheless we generally enjoy Haydn's symphonies better than any 18th century works in this form. Mozart attempts dramatic effects, and these shrivel up somewhat when compared with the tremendous dramatic compositions of the present. But Haydn never tries to become too intense. He gives most of his themes "a la Watteau," in simple and direct prettiness, and is as restful as a reclining chair.

Of course there is nothing of technical difficulty in such a work as this symphony, at least not for our orchestra, but it is to their credit that they do not slight the interpretation of the work. They gave as careful an ensemble as would be found in more ambitious works, and the light airiness and grace lent a peculiar charm to the final work even if the fiery concerto neutralized it somewhat.

We are glad that Dr. Muck does not allow the auditor, in the midst of so much that is modern, to forget that there were simpler, calmer days in music, once upon a time.

The conservative critic and composer, Hiller, once said to the present writer: "The danger in America is that your audiences get at once the most advanced and sensational modern music. They do not grow up to it by degrees, as we have done in Germany." It is well that we have such an educator as Dr. Muck at the helm.

BOSTON JOURNAL
DECEMBER 18

SYMPHONY PLAYS CLASSIC PROGRAM

Ruth Deyo, the Soloist, Performs Tschaikowsky Concerto Brilliantly.

Haydn, Debussy and Tschaikowsky contribute to the Symphony program this week, representing three musical epochs and satisfying all the open-minded lovers of music. The program, in fact, is noteworthy for its diversity and its historical character.

Debussy's "La Mer" sketches, impressionistic pastels somewhat more graspable and melodious than most of the Debussy symphonic pieces, lead off. After the intermission comes the Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B-flat minor, with Ruth Deyo as soloist; and finally there is Haydn's first symphony, with one with the drum-roll.

The interest in Debussy is still timid, but unquestionably there is a growing appreciation of the many beauties to be found in his misty landscapes and seascapes. The performance yesterday showed these sketches in the most favorable light, for Dr. Muck conducted with an enthusiasm that would satisfy the most captious modernist.

Equally enthusiastic, on the part of both soloist and orchestra, was the performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto, which has many brilliant moments and also much of the lyric sweetness beloved of the majority of Symphony patrons. Doubtless many more soloists would play it if they could. There was rapturous applause for Miss Deyo's playing, which brilliantly met the great technical demand of the work. The sweet lavendar atmosphere of the Haydn symphony was also well brought out.

There will be the usual concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, holiday or no holiday. The novelty on the coming program will be the John Alden Carpenter suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," the realistic joys and humors of which were so hugely relished when the work was played here a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, the Saint-Saens concerto for 'cello and orchestra and Rheinberger's concerto for organ, horns and strings will also be played, with Joseph Malkin and John P. Marshall as soloists.

BOSTON POST,
DECEMBER 18,

DEBUSSY'S PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Impressionism in the Extreme Played and Enjoyed

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. She played the Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B-flat minor.

The orchestral compositions were Debussy's "Trois Esquisse Symphoniques," "La Mer" and Haydn's Symphony in E flat (B. & H. No. 1).

EXTREME OF DEBUSSY

Dr. Muck was the first to introduce in Boston, in 1907, these orchestral pieces of Debussy, which represent the extreme boundaries of Debussy's impressionism. The pieces are not to be analyzed, nor are they easily described. How intimate is Debussy's communion with the sea in these compositions? Some find in the last of the three "Nocturnes" for orchestra—the piece called "Sirenes" —a more definite suggestion of the sea, a more pervasive mood. It is further true that Debussy employs in "La Mer" two important motives which he first discovered when he composed the "Sirenes."

In the performance of "La Mer" one may hear the wash of the sea, the swish of the winds or the rustle of a forest, or a hundred other things. Debussy might easily have intended to mislead his audiences by means of this title. He might easily have said to himself: "I will now indulge to the full my passion for the play of sheer sonorities, tone colors, subtle and complex textures. What shall I call it all? I [illegible] call it 'The Sea.'"

Marvellously Made

The pieces are marvellously made, with incomparable virtuosity. The orchestration offers an endless succession of the most ingenious and beautiful combination of instruments. The composer modulates in every measure. His music seems utterly free and joyous. In this, at least, it suggests nature which moralizes not, and is glad even when it witnesses death. The rythmic development of the ideas is most wonderful of all. Here is counterpoint and development by means of rhythm. The rhythm combinations are endless and they are entirely suggestive.

This music commences where not only speech, but dreams, come to an end. It is wholly impersonal. It is of all or of nothing, as one chooses. When Dr. Muck first played "La Mer" it was coldly received. Yesterday there was hearty applause, especially after the second piece, "Frolics of the Waves."

Miss Deyo's performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto was carefully planned and consistently carried out, but she would have done better, with her limited strength, to have chosen a work demanding less virility in execution.

A Chopin concerto, a concerto by Mozart—these works also require gifted interpretors, and they might have been more fortunate in their interpretations at the hands of Miss Deyo.

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 13,

DR. MUCK IN NEW FIELDS

"POPULAR CLASSICS" FOR THE PENSION FUND

Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" Waltz and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell" from the Conductor and the Symphony Orchestra — Lalo's Resurrected Ballet-Music Proves None Too Interesting, and Tschaikovski's Fifth Symphony Conquers as of Old

AFTER all, there are more ways than one to assemble a programme that will fill Symphony Hall with the audience that the Symphony Orchestra deserves when it gives a concert for the increase of its Pension Fund. The readiest way, of course, is to set the overtures and the preludes of Wagner's operas and music-drama in chronological array as Dr. Muck has done often in his two terms as the conductor of the band. The next readiest is to diversify these pieces with other fragments of those operas and music-dramas that will best endure transfer from the theatre, again as Dr. Muck has done, yielding a conviction or two about the wisdom of such shiftings, when he began to discover that Boston seldom receives Wagner in the opera house. However eager the public, conductor and orchestra repine occasionally at an unbroken succession of "Wagner Concerts" for the Pension Fund and fear that some day the essential audience will be like-minded with them.

The next recourse is a symphony by Tschaikowski—preferably the popular "Pathetic." Yet even that may not be played whenever the conductor would put aside the convenient "Wagner Programme"; for the public is much more quickly sated with the melody and morbidezza of Petrograd, than it is with the richer and more various eloquence of Baireuth. Tschaikowski's fourth, fifth and "Manfred" symphonies remain; but an audience is certain only with the fifth. Accordingly, that piece began the concert of yesterday afternoon—the first of the two that the orchestra will undertake this year for its own treasury. But what was to fill the rest of the customary two hours?

In the past Dr. Muck has tried various expedients. This autumn he pitched upon a new one—the playing of two "popular classics" in one of which, Strauss's waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," many have long been eager to hear the orchestra. The other was the overture to Rossini's "William Tell," a piece in which Dr. Muck conducted a score of times when it was revived at the Royal Opera in Berlin. Between the two, seeking ingratiating ballet music, he placed a suite from Lalo's "Namouna" after he had rejected for various reasons fragments of Delibes's "Sylvia" and Rubinstein's "Feramors." All four pieces met the chief necessity of the occasion. They filled the hall after those that seek the Pension-Fund Concerts out of loyalty to the orchestra and those that like to hear it occasionally in any programme had reserved their places. Besides, they were interesting in themselves to hear from the band that, as usual when the Pension-Fund is in question, was on its mettle.

The Viennese say that Johann Strauss preferred the waltz of "The Blue Danube" —which river is by no means always "blue" or always "beautiful"—to all the rest that he wrote, even if other ears find "Wine, Women and Song" and one or two more quite as engaging. They also say that no one conducted in that waltz of the Danube as did the composer himself, even if he was his own worst enemy in his operettas in which he was wont to forget the stage for the orchestra. There were not many in the audience yesterday —if there was even one—who could draw a comparison between the elder Strauss and Dr. Muck in the music; but it is safe to say that the composer hardly commanded such an orchestra as that which sat under the conductor yesterday. The introduction, for example, owed much to the richness of tone that the horns lent it; the strings were as apt to the second beat of the measure—the secret of the fascination of Viennese waltzes—as was Dr. Muck himself; and only such an instrument as is the band could have been as sensitive to the light graduations of pace, rhythm and body of tone, to the sustained flow and to the graceful or the suspensive transitions to which the conductor kept the waltz running. And none other could so have clothed it with luminous, opulent and edgeless tone. For once, a piece of music that is more truly a work of fine and individual fancy and of plentiful and cunning resource than many a more pretentious composition shone in heightened but wisely tempered glories. For never once did Dr. Muck in his free handling of it cloud or distort it. Yet even the Castles might not dance to "The Blue Danube" played as a tone-poem in little and Miss Pavlova herself would have needed rehearsals.

Perhaps the overture to "William Tell" sounded less unusual from Dr. Muck and the orchestra than some of their hearers expected, for the sound reason that it offered them less opportunity for finesse of performance and tonal and interpretative distinction. Yet the full-voiced song of the violoncellos at the beginning, as Mr. Warnke, Mr. Malkin and the rest of the choir sustained, warmed and deepened it, might have rejoiced Rossini's exacting ears and the audiences of the twenties and the thirties would have heard in the finale such a "grand crescendo" as they demanded and admired in their operatic overtures. As Dr. Muck has been wont to prove in the close of Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," the secret of incessant and adroit quickening and cumulation in these showy endings did not die with the generation that cultivated and applauded them.

For the novel number of the afternoon, the fragments of Lalo's ballet-music were of uneven interest. The final pieces in the suite—the music of the Carnival at Corfu, curiously called on the programme "Market-Day Shows" and "Market-Day Festival"—obviously needed the background of the spectacle for full suggestion and illusion. Without the sun-supped square, the incessant moement of the crowd, the din of the incoming entertainers and the interludes of their feats and diversions, the music seems only well-made in itself and insistent, but rather pointless, with its characterizing and atmospheric purpose. In a measure, too, the Theme and Variations suffer from a like absence of the pictured scene and the mimed action. In place in the second act of the ballet, they mirror the surrender of the amorous Namouna to the awakened Othavio. Heard as such they do not lack glamor and wile; but heard as "absolute music," the ear found pleasure—and none too much—only in the freshness of the melody, Mr. Maquarre's skill with the long passage for the first flute and the richer and the richer harmonic dress of an ecstatic climax. Per contra, the serenade was charming to hear in the fanciful play of the strings with the two sprightfully motives and in the pretty coloring that oboes and clarinets shed upon it. And the Prelude might well have claimed the public of the Opéra in Paris in 1882 as a true symphonic piece. The vague beginnings touch the listening ear; to them ensues a thrilling passage in stark harmonic simplicity that unfolds the motive of Namouna's devotion; the succeeding measures for her charm are contrastingly and insinuatingly graceful; the climax "working-out" the two melodies and bearing them into fuller and fuller eloquence might well have seemed to those same Parisians an introduction to music-drama and not to a ballet-pantomime. It is trnasfiguring music; but there was no transfiguring, even for a Lalo, of much that "Namourna," according to Nuitter's prescribed libretto, must contain. Perhaps a superfluous tear or two has been shed in the last thirty years over this ill-fated ballet.

"Blue Danube" or no "Blue Danube," Tschaihovski's symphony remained the chief pleasure of the concert to many an hearer and by far the most applauded piece of the day. The Russian had his melodic inspirations and, though it is the custom of the time to belittle his music, there is no doubling them in the show movement of this fifth symphony, in the first movement of the familiar concerto for piano, in one and another "high point" in his music. Moreover, they are none the worse because they are unusually such that the average ear understand and feels them in the on the instant and keeps them through all the handling they may undergo. Better still, they are proof apart all sorts of repition. Not often is the prolonged song of this Andanti—for Tschaikovski was humanly loth to let it go until he had wrung the last drop from it—sung with such suffused and opalescent be only of tone with such sustained yet various voice, with such warmth of feeling and grace of motion as it was yesterday. Such music and such playing of it held the audience of Sunday rapt and truly moved; but man an inferior performance has done almost as much. much. Final and crowning proof of the virtue of that same melody—how often at Tschaikovski's hands, it hovers on the very edge of sentmentality and yet never descends into it. The vague longing thating that infiltrates it quite as much of Peter Iltisch Tscraikovski, man or composer, as of the Slav temperament in general—always ready to save.

On this score the mood of the Andante is near kin to the melancholy of disillusion, of like twofold origin, that impregnates the short, languid scherzo that sighs and chokes itself away—the wan ghost of a waltz and not the doleful mockery of it like the waltz "that never waltzes" of the second movement of the Pathetic Symphony. The rest—the first movement and the finale—are of the familiar Tschaikowski that delighted to contrast a supersensuous melody or a vivid "motto-motive" with the writings and the thrashings of a super-excited orchestra or else raced away into tonal tumults of ardent folk-song made "art-music" by his plentiful resources of glaring color, sharp progression and rhythmic force. Perhaps they are of a mannered, rather out-moded and shallow Tschaikovski, the victim for the time in the ears of a sated world, of his own idiosyncracies of temperament and procedure. But the slow song and the ghostly waltz endure by intrinsic virtue. H. T. P.

SUNDAY GLOBE—
JANUARY 2, 1916

"Music & Musicians

Dr. Muck On a Great Foe to Musical Art.

The holiday lull in concert giving offers a favorable moment to consider phases of the interview with Dr Muck in the current number of the Craftsman. The full text without abridgement is well worth the serious and receptive attention of musicians, and of American citizens. It is significant to read this saying of Dr Muck, a factor in Prussian bureaucracy: "In America, I should say, you will have for your later-day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people."

Following the epoch marking appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Panama Exposition last June, Dr Muck spent some time in travel through the wonders of Western scenery. He was impressed by the picturesque grandeur of the Grand Canyon. "This idea (that of democracy in American music)" continues he, "is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that ever has seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains, veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight, can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced?"

It is the opinion of Dr Muck that the American painters have captured something of this glory and beauty in their canvases, but he has yet to hear poetry and music which reflects it. He credits Americans with liberality surpassed by few in bringing music to this country, but "as yet you have not stopped long enough to cherish the birth of great art here. It seems to me you are constantly putting it off to the future."

Dr Muck's rebuke of the American greed for money and money-getting is tactfully and gracefully given. He probably would call it merely an expression of personal opinion. He says we reason after this manner as a people: "We will have art, some day, when we want it, for we have all things as we want them We are busy now making money." He credits Americans with a great genius for money-making, and here the learned doctor, whose learning is that of the philosopher as of the musician, speaks words of insight and of wisdom—"but you appear too busy to use it."

Money-Making First.

Then, hastening to qualify or explain what may seem a blunt statement he adds: "At least, to use it in a way that seems most valuable to me. You do buy many, many things that enable you to get about quickly, not only things that will make your homes beautiful, but things that will enable you to get away from your homes—swifter steamers, swifter railroads, swifter motor cars. It is a Nation hurrying from one generation to another, one century to another, seeking always means of haste, pressing past with an ideal of haste rather than some definite goal.

"Isn't it just as good to stop today as tomorrow to spend beautiful leisure in your beautiful homes, into which to bring beautiful art? This is the lovely present I wish for America. I want leisure now for your music, your painters want it for art, your young geniuses want it for poetry. Stop now and make this the greatest century America has ever known for the birth of great National art."

Dr Muck's sense of the too distracting, the vitiating American passion for diversion, for this, then that nervous stimulant, is a significant element in his diagnosis. His proposed course, one of education of the youth, of active cultivation of music in the schools, in the employment of choruses and of orchestras, and of the careful choice of teachers for the young in their individual instruction, all is sound and not strange to American educators. As to the development of orchestral music in the public schools of our cities, there is an activity which probably would surprise the eminent conductor did he know of its seriousness and extent.

But it is in regard to the use of the so-called "popular" music as one of the most vicious manifestations of this love of diversion, that these observations upon our musical customs should be arresting. Dr Muck makes a clean and sharp distinction between the folk music, the songs that have grown up out of the life of a people as expression of their joy, sorrow, triumph, despair, and are transmitted from mouth to mouth, between music of this nature, of which France, Germany, Russia, Britain and Ireland for example have a wealth and the music now bearing the name "popular" in common parlance as distinguished from "classic."

"Ragtime" Is Poison.

These statements now following will, if they have not already, raise thundering protest: "I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"You ask me how the American Nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a Nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all [illegible]

BOSTON JOURNAL—

DECEMBER 18,

SYMPHONY PLAYS CLASSIC PROGRAM

Ruth Deyo, the Soloist, Performs Tschaikowsky Concerto Brilliantly.

Haydn, Debussy and Tschaikowsky contribute to the Symphony program this week, representing three musical epochs and satisfying all the open-minded lovers of music. The program, in fact, is noteworthy for its diversity and its historical character.

Debussy's "La Mer" sketches, impressionistic pastels somewhat more graspable and melodious than most of the Debussy symphonic pieces, lead off. After the intermission comes the Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B-flat minor, with Ruth Deyo as soloist; and finally there is Haydn's first symphony, with one with the drum-roll.

The interest in Debussy is still timid, but unquestionably there is a growing appreciation of the many beauties to be found in his misty landscapes and seascapes. The performance yesterday showed these sketches in the most favorable light, for Dr. Muck conducted with an enthusiasm that would satisfy the most captious modernist.

Equally enthusiastic, on the part of both soloist and orchestra, was the performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto, which has many brilliant moments and also much of the lyric sweetness beloved of the majority of Symphony patrons. Doubtless many more soloists would play it if they could. There was rapturous applause for Miss Deyo's playing, which brilliantly met the great technical demand of the work. The sweet lavendar atmosphere of the Haydn symphony was also well brought out.

There will be the usual concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, holiday or no holiday. The novelty on the coming program will be the John Alden Carpenter suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," the realistic joys and humors of which were so hugely relished when the work was played here a few weeks ago by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, the Saint-Saens concerto for 'cello and orchestra and Rheinberger's concerto for organ, horns and strings will also be played, with Joseph Malkin and John P. Marshall as soloists.

Marvellously Made

The pieces are marvellously made, with incomparable virtuosity. The orchestration offers an endless succession of the most ingenious and beautiful combination of instruments. The composer modulates in every measure. His music seems utterly free and joyous. In this, at least, it suggests nature which moralizes not, and is glad even when it witnesses death. The rythmic development of the ideas is most wonderful of all. Here is counterpoint and development by means of rhythm. The rhythm combinations are endless and they are entirely suggestive.

This music commences where not only speech, but dreams, come to an end. It is wholly impersonal. It is of all or of nothing, as one chooses. When Dr. Muck first played "La Mer" it was coldly received. Yesterday there was hearty applause, especially after the second piece, "Frolics of the Waves."

Miss Deyo's performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto was carefully planned and consistently carried out, but she would have done better, with her limited strength, to have chosen a work demanding less virility in execution.

A Chopin concerto, a concerto by Mozart—these works also require gifted interpretors, and they might have been more fortunate in their interpretations at the hands of Miss Deyo.

BOSTON POST,

DECEMBER 18,

DEBUSSY'S PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Impressionism in the Extreme Played and Enjoyed

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. She played the Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B-flat minor.

The orchestral compositions were Debussy's "Trois Esquisse Symphoniques," "La Mer" and Haydn's Symphony in E flat (B. & H. No. 1).

EXTREME OF DEBUSSY

Dr. Muck was the first to introduce in Boston, in 1907, these orchestral pieces of Debussy, which represent the extreme boundaries of Debussy's impressionism. The pieces are not to be analyzed, nor are they easily described. How intimate is Debussy's communion with the sea in these compositions? Some find in the last of the three "Nocturnes" for orchestra—the piece called "Sirenes"—a more definite suggestion of the sea, a more pervasive mood. It is further true that Debussy employs in "La Mer" two important motives which he first discovered when he composed the "Sirenes."

In the performance of "La Mer" one may hear the wash of the sea, the swish of the winds or the rustle of a forest, or a hundred other things. Debussy might easily have intended to mislead his audiences by means of this title. He might easily have said to himself: "I will now indulge to the full my passion for the play of sheer sonorities, tone colors, subtle and complex rhythms. What shall I call it all? I will call it 'The Sea.'"

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 13,

DR. MUCK IN NEW FIELDS

"POPULAR CLASSICS" FOR THE PENSION FUND

Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" Waltz and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell" from the Conductor and the Symphony Orchestra — Lalo's Resurrected Ballet-Music Proves None Too Interesting, and Tschaikovski's Fifth Symphony Conquers as of Old

AFTER all, there are more ways than one to assemble a programme that will fill Symphony Hall with the audience that the Symphony Orchestra deserves when it gives a concert for the increase of its Pension Fund. The readiest way, of course, is to set the overtures and the preludes of Wagner's operas and music-drama in chronological array as Dr. Muck has done often in his two terms as the conductor of the band. The next readiest is to diversify these pieces with other fragments of those operas and music-dramas that will best endure transfer from the theatre, again as Dr. Muck has done, yielding a conviction or two about the wisdom of such shiftings, when he began to discover that Boston seldom receives Wagner in the opera house. However eager the public, conductor and orchestra repine occasionally at an unbroken succession of "Wagner Concerts" for the Pension Fund and fear that some day the essential audience will be like-minded with them.

The next recourse is a symphony by Tschaikowski—preferably the popular "Pathetic." Yet even that may not be played whenever the conductor would put aside the convenient "Wagner Programme"; for the public is much more quickly sated with the melody and morbidezza of Petrograd, than it is with the richer and more various eloquence of Baireuth. Tschaikowski's fourth, fifth and "Manfred" symphonies remain; but an audience is certain only with the fifth. Accordingly, that piece began the concert of yesterday afternoon—the first of the two that the orchestra will undertake this year for its own treasury. But what was to fill the rest of the customary two hours?

In the past Dr. Muck has tried various expedients. This autumn he pitched upon a new one—the playing of two "popular classics" in one of which, Strauss's waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," many have long been eager to hear the orchestra. The other was the overture to Rossini's "William Tell," a piece in which Dr. Muck conducted a score of times when it was revived at the Royal Opera in Berlin. Between the two, seeking ingratiating ballet music, he placed a suite from Lalo's "Namouna" after he had rejected for various reasons fragments of Delibes's "Sylvia" and Rubinstein's "Feramors." All four pieces met the chief necessity of the occasion. They filled the hall after those that seek the Pension-Fund Concerts out of loyalty to the orchestra and those that like to hear it occasionally in any programme had reserved their places. Besides, they were interesting in themselves to hear from the band that, as usual when the Pension-Fund is in question, was on its mettle.

The Viennese say that Johann Strauss preferred the waltz of "The Blue Danube"—which river is by no means always "blue" or always "beautiful"—to all the rest that he wrote, even if other ears find "Wine, Women and Song" and one or two more quite as engaging. They also say that no one conducted in that waltz of the Danube as did the composer himself, even if he was his own worst enemy in his operettas in which he was wont to forget the stage for the orchestra. There were not many in the audience yesterday—if there was even one—who could draw a comparison between the elder Strauss and Dr. Muck in the music; but it is safe to say that the composer hardly commanded such an orchestra as that which sat under the conductor yesterday. The introduction, for example, owed much to the richness of tone that the horns lent it; the strings were as apt to the second beat of the measure—the secret of the fascination of Viennese waltzes—as was Dr. Muck himself; and only such an instrument as is the band could have been as sensitive to the light graduations of pace, rhythm and body of tone, to the sustained flow and to the graceful or the suspensive transitions to which the conductor kept the waltz running. And none other could so have clothed it with luminous, opulent and edgeless tone. For once, a piece of music that is more truly a work of fine and individual fancy and of plentiful and cunning resource than many a more pretentious composition shone in heightened but wisely tempered glories. For never once did Dr. Muck in his free handling of it cloud or distort it. Yet even the Castles might not dance to "The Blue Danube" played as a tone-poem in little and Miss Pavlova herself would have needed rehearsals.

Perhaps the overture to "William Tell" sounded less unusual from Dr. Muck and the orchestra than some of their hearers expected, for the sound reason that it offered them less opportunity for finesse of performance and tonal and interpretative distinction. Yet the full-voiced song of the violoncellos at the beginning, as Mr. Warnke, Mr. Malkin and the rest of the choir sustained, warmed and deepened it, might have rejoiced Rossini's exacting ears and the audiences of the twenties and the thirties would have heard in the finale such a "grand crescendo" as they demanded and admired in their operatic overtures. As Dr. Muck has been wont to prove in the close of Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," the secret of incessant and adroit quickening and cumulation in these showy endings did not die with the generation that cultivated and applauded them.

For the novel number of the afternoon, the fragments of Lalo's ballet-music were of uneven interest. The final pieces in the suite—the music of the Carnival at Corfu, curiously called on the programme "Market-Day Shows" and "Market-Day Festival"—obviously needed the background of the spectacle for full suggestion and illusion. Without the sun-supped square, the incessant moement of the crowd, the din of the incoming entertainers and the interludes of their feats and diversions, the music seems only well-made in itself and insistent, but rather pointless, with its characterizing and atmospheric purpose. In a measure, too, the Theme and Variations suffer from a like absence of the pictured scene and the mimed action. In place in the second act of the ballet, they mirror the surrender of the amorous Namouna to the awakened Othavio. Heard as such they do not lack glamor and wile; but heard as "absolute music," the ear found pleasure—and none too much—only in the freshness of the melody, Mr. Maquarre's skill with the long passage for the first flute and the richer and the richer harmonic dress of an ecstatic climax. Per contra, the serenade was charming to hear in the fanciful play of the strings with the two sprightfully motives and in the pretty coloring that oboes and clarinets shed upon it. And the Prelude might well have claimed the public of the Opéra in Paris in 1882 as a true symphonic piece. The vague beginnings touch the listening ear; to them ensues a thrilling passage in stark harmonic simplicity that unfolds the motive of Namouna's devotion; the succeeding measures for her charm are contrastingly and insinuatingly graceful; the climax "working-out" the two melodies and bearing them into fuller and fuller eloquence might well have seemed to those same Parisians an introduction to music-drama and not to a ballet-pantomime. It is trnasfiguring music; but there was no transfiguring, even for a Lalo, of much that "Namourna," according to Nuitter's prescribed libretto, must contain. Perhaps a superfluous tear or two has been shed in the last thirty years over this ill-fated ballet.

"Blue Danube" or no "Blue Danube," Tschaihovski's symphony remained the chief pleasure of the concert to many an hearer and by far the most applauded piece of the day. The Russian had his melodic inspirations and, though it is the custom of the time to belittle his music, there is no doubling them in the show movement of this fifth symphony, in the first movement of the familiar concerto for piano, in one and another "high point" in his music. Moreover, they are none the worse because they are unusually such that the average ear understand and feels them in the on the instant and keeps them through all the handling they may undergo. Better still, they are proof apart all sorts of repition. Not often is the prolonged song of this Andanti—for Tschaikovski was humanly loth to let it go until he had wrung the last drop from it—sung with such suffused and opalescent be only of tone with such sustained yet various voice, with such warmth of feeling and grace of motion as it was yesterday. Such music and such playing of it held the audience of Sunday rapt and truly moved; but man an inferior performance has done almost as much. much. Final and crowning proof of the virtue of that same melody—how often at Tschaikovski's hands, it hovers on the very edge of sentmentality and yet never descends into it. The vague longing thating that infiltrates it quite as much of Peter Iltisch Tscraikovski, man or composer, as of the Slav temperament in general—always ready to save.

On this score the mood of the Andante is near kin to the melancholy of disillusion, of like twofold origin, that impregnates the short, languid scherzo that sighs and chokes itself away—the wan ghost of a waltz and not the doleful mockery of it like the waltz "that never waltzes" of the second movement of the Pathetic Symphony. The rest—the first movement and the finale—are of the familiar Tschaikowski that delighted to contrast a supersensuous melody or a vivid "motto-motive" with the writings and the thrashings of a super-excited orchestra or else raced away into tonal tumults of ardent folk-song made "art-music" by his plentiful resources of glaring color, sharp progression and rhythmic force. Perhaps they are of a mannered, rather out-moded and shallow Tschaikovski, the victim for the time in the ears of a sated world, of his own idiosyncracies of temperament and procedure. But the slow song and the ghostly waltz endure by intrinsic virtue. H. T. P.

SUNDAY GLOBE—

JANUARY 2, 1916

[illegible] Musicians

Dr. Muck On a Great Foe to Musical Art.

The holiday lull in concert giving offers a favorable moment to consider phases of the interview with Dr Muck in the current number of the Craftsman. The full text without abridgement is well worth the serious and receptive attention of musicians, and of American citizens. It is significant to read this saying of Dr Muck, a factor in Prussian bureaucracy: "In America, I should say, you will have for your later-day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people."

Following the epoch marking appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Panama Exposition last June, Dr Muck spent some time in travel through the wonders of Western scenery. He was impressed by the picturesque grandeur of the Grand Canyon. "This idea (that of democracy in American music)" continues he, "is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that ever has seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains, veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight, can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced?"

It is the opinion of Dr Muck that the American painters have captured something of this glory and beauty in their canvases, but he has yet to hear poetry and music which reflects it. He credits Americans with liberality surpassed by few in bringing music to this country, but "as yet you have not stopped long enough to cherish the birth of great art here. It seems to me you are constantly putting it off to the future."

Dr Muck's rebuke of the American greed for money and money-getting is tactfully and gracefully given. He probably would call it merely an expression of personal opinion. He says we reason after this manner as a people: "We will have art, some day, when we want it, for we have all things as we want them. We are busy now making money." He credits Americans with a great genius for money-making, and here the learned doctor, whose learning is that of the philosopher as of the musician, speaks words of insight and of wisdom—"but you appear too busy to use it."

Money-Making First.

Then, hastening to qualify or explain what may seem a blunt statement he adds: "At least, to use it in a way that seems most valuable to me. You do buy many, many things that enable you to get about quickly, not only things that will make your homes beautiful, but things that will enable you to get away from your homes—swifter steamers, swifter railroads, swifter motor cars. It is a Nation hurrying from one generation to another, one century to another, seeking always means of haste, pressing past with an ideal of haste rather than some definite goal.

"Isn't it just as good to stop today as tomorrow to spend beautiful leisure in your beautiful homes, into which to bring beautiful art? This is the lovely present I wish for America. I want leisure now for your music, your painters want it for art, your young geniuses want it for poetry. Stop now and make this the greatest century America has ever known for the birth of great National art."

Dr Muck's sense of the too distracting, the vitiating American passion for diversion, for this, then that nervous stimulant, is a significant element in his diagnosis. His proposed course, one of education of the youth, of active cultivation of music in the schools, in the employment of choruses and of orchestras, and of the careful choice of teachers for the young in their individual instruction, all is sound and not strange to American educators. As to the development of orchestral music in the public schools of our cities, there is an activity which probably would surprise the eminent conductor did he know of its seriousness and extent.

But it is in regard to the use of the so-called "popular" music as one of the most vicious manifestations of this love of diversion, that these observations upon our musical customs should be arresting. Dr Muck makes a clean and sharp distinction between the folk music, the songs that have grown up out of the life of a people as expression of their joy, sorrow, triumph, despair, and are transmitted from mouth to mouth, between music of this nature, of which France, Germany, Russia, Britain and Ireland for example have a wealth and the music now bearing the name "popular" in common parlance as distinguished from "classic."

"Ragtime" Is Poison.

These statements now following will, if they have not already, raise thundering protest: "I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"You ask me how the American Nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a Nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the [illegible]

[illegible] the people and the foundation [illegible] the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America today for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people.

"You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical Nation. You ask me frankly and I tell you frankly.

"One instance came to my notice in regard to the deadly influence of the ragtime music which I will cite to show the insidious effect it may have even on people whose first impulse is toward the right thing.

"I dined one evening with a family devoted to the interests of Symphony music. They had been subscribers for years. After the dinner I was very tired and strolled in the library alone to rest for a moment. To my astonishment I saw a music machine in one corner of the room. I said possibly they may have some records of good music and singers, and so glanced over the records. Then, to my horror I discovered that they were of the most deadly, vulgar ragtime music; not only was the music of the worst character, but in some instances there were records of vulgar cafe chantant songs, a collection of all the things that it seemed to me the real music lover would be opposed to.

"It was a terrible shock to me. I felt as though I had lost friends. I wondered how much I was to blame for it. How was it possible that I could have put into my work in the symphony my heart and soul and most earnest desire for the best results from such work and [illegible] among those I had [illegible] music [illegible] comes early in [illegible] a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later, and civilization is full fledged, it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. The early music wells up out of great love, great joy, great, splendid response to nature. In the later life of a nation art comes from an appreciation of what it adds to life, from a sense of its decorative importance. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea. Wagner, strangely enough, combined both the traditional and the modern point of view in his music. He had the great idea of a new religion for the world, a religion that could no longer be held in the grasp of the gods, that must be reborn through the splendor and tragedy of human love and sacrifice. In the music of Strauss you feel the pounding of a great idea, you feel suddenly that he is breaking down conventional barriers that have held people away from the intoxication and joy of music. Beethoven had the great idea of bringing close to the people all pastoral beauty from the beginning of days. Whatever has been joyous in pastoral lives, whatever has been sad or thrilling or tender or peaceful Beethoven has reproduced for the world's joy and strength.

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, of those great, limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free

From TRIBUNE

Addres New York City

Date DEC 12 1915

Estab

Dr. Karl Muck Writes On Music of the Democrac

He Calls Ragtime Poison and Says America Cannot Hope to Produce Music of the Type of the Old World Countries.

Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has in the current number of "The Craftsman" a most interesting contribution to the subject of music in America. Dr. Muck's article is entitled "The Music of the Democracy," and it does not attempt to pour molasses over our national consciousness. The conductor declares that as America never had a childhood, it cannot hope to produce music of the type possessed by the countries of the Old World.

"When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later and civilization is full-fledged it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea."

Not a very comforting thought to those who desire to see an American school of music and who believe that music is primarily a product of the emotions. If a real American music is to be produced, continues Dr. Muck, it will not be through ragtime, but despite of it, and a cultivation of the musical taste must be endowed.

"I do not in the least believe in popular music; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. What you call here ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young."

This is Dr. Muck's uncompromising doctrine, and in conclusion he vehemently assails the ideals of Young America, declaring that our youth is everywhere seeking for pleasure with a background of half-baked ideas. This state, he declares, is fatal to art and to beauty. The article in "The Craftsman" is in part as follows:

"A music-loving people! Why not—living in such a marvellous country, a country that should be the source of splendid inspiration for every art. It is different in Europe; the inspiration is not needed. Music continues and thrives in the Old World because it is a part of the existence of the people. They are all brought up with music in their homes and in their schools. They know it as they know their A B C's; they do not have to seek new and tremendous inspiration—influences powerful enough to cut a channel through prevailing interests.

"But in America you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way, you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, when there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions, when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests, when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballad or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy, and settled in America with their own specialized ways, with their own social attitude and religion all ready-made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry [illegible] time to take deep [illegible] spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of its soul.

"It is hopeless to attempt to do anything for middle age. No nation has ever developed art through its grown-up people. It has developed much enjoyment, much culture, it has shown appreciation of art, as America has done, for there is an ever increasing love of good music in this country, an ever growing audience for grand opera and for symphony concerts, but that is not what you are asking about in America. You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have the great idea for music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy—the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start, I should say, give your young people the best music the world has ever known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of the musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical development and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America to-day for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation.

"As yet the people do not seem willing to make the effort to support grand opera and symphony concerts. The question resolves itself into this: If you do not endow these institutions you cannot have this music. If you wish the music at this present stage of your civilization, it must be endowed. So far as I am aware no musical institution of any description is supported by state or government in America. The only endowments that are made are individual, and those in some instances are lavish to a degree. In New York your grand opera is supported by subscription and frequently by additional endowment as well—always personal. This is true of every grand opera in America. It is also true, so far as I am able to state, of the symphony orchestra. I know it is true of the New York Symphony, of the Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Seattle and so on indefinitely.

"And right here it is important to note that the interest in the symphony orchestra is spreading. It is no small matter for America to realize that there is a successful symphony orchestra in Seattle as well as in San Francisco, Chicago and so on toward the East. But these orchestras are not supported by the voluntary contributions of the mass of people. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically the gift to the people of one great music lover, Mr. Higginson. It is Mr. Higginson who has made it possible for the Boston Symphony to work without joining the music union, so that it is an absolutely free institution. And in this free country I find that the trade unions do not always leave the people quite free either in the arts or crafts. I think that if you are not careful, through them you will greatly mar musical opportunity and you will possibly kill the development of craft work.

"A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him how to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; but he could make a little more money as a carpenter and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the man who is the greatest musician who has the best salary.

"But to return to the endowment of music. You will see that at present it is necessary for certain kinds of musical development. After you have put music in all your schools, in the biggest, most impersonal way, I firmly believe that you will be cultivating a generation of people who will be eager to support symphony concerts, grand opera, who will be writing music for both.

"The question of endowment does not seem to trouble any one in Germany; it is universal. In every place of forty or fifty thousand inhabitants there is a symphony orchestra supported by the town. In Berlin the Emperor gives 3,000,000 marks a year out of his private income for the advancement of music; in Vienna, music is supported by the government. There seems to be no question in the world but what the people who have the greatest opportunity for enjoying music should really be the supporters. The idea of endowing music in Germany came about through Frederick the Great, some two hundred years ago. He was a music lover. He and the dukes of his court decided that they would pay for it themselves, and this sentiment has continued in Germany ever since, although if it were not done there is, in my mind, no question in the world but what the people by voluntary contributions would hold music in their midst.

"You have asked me just what quality in your civilization I find most detrimental to the development and progress of the arts. It seems to me that the most serious handicap to art that I have been able to discover in America, and, of course, there are serious handicaps in every nation to its best growth, is the fact that politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern. I believe that politics should be absolutely separated from business activities. Politics is the machinery of running a nation. A man should not be in politics to make money, to make his living, but to work for the welfare of the nation. There should be no opportunity whatever for him to have to face financial questions. He should be supported by the government. But in America I find in every state people in politics for their own interest—not to build up a finer, stronger, purer nation, not to insure the development of art-loving people, not to add to the beauty of the country, the delight of it, but for their own aggrandizement. Naturally this brings about a state restless, uncertain and separated from the betterment of the country. Also, it places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy, and one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth.

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned; to be independent when they are young, and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres, and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are losing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more houses, more clothes, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

Dr. Muck surely does not flatter us, but in this day of Henry Fords and easy money and unpreparedness, his words may well be taken to heart, not only in regard to music, but for all the arts, and indeed for life itself.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 13.

WAR SPIRIT AND THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Transcript:

While hearing the Pension Fund concert on Sunday, the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dwelt in my mind, and a few sentences about these affairs may interest your readers.

When in September, 1914, Dr. Muck turned up from Germany, a doubt existed as to whether the orchestra would play together, for the members hailed from ten different nations which were at war with one another.

Therefore, it was settled that a few words should be said to the members, and the words were said—counselling kindness and pleasant looks between man and man and only such. The men of the orchestra listened quietly and seemed pleased. Since that day fourteen months have passed, during which harmony has prevailed; yet rehearsals, concerts, monthly journeys, the trip to San Francisco, with their trials, have come and gone. It is a fine instance of self-control and gentle behavior. These members of the orchestra are men with red blood in their veins, and must feel keenly the great struggle. With their birth and education, they cannot well understand our views of life, and must be puzzled with our opposition to their inherited beliefs and principles, while at the same time we esteem and like them and their fellow-countrymen as individuals, and admire many things in their native countries. Especially to Germany the orchestra owes much, and that means the schools, the music, and the members from Germany and Austria.

It is a serious task to practise afresh the old music, and to study and play the new music which the later composers have made so complicated—to find the hidden meaning and beauty of a great symphony—in short, to render such a beautiful service as that of yesterday. It is the result of careful, intelligent labor through years, and of obedience to the will of honest, able, gifted conductors such as we have had and have. Nevertheless, all this work tries the patience and the nerves of men. Moreover, these musicians are not our countrymen, but foreigners who came here to give us delight and comfort. How different from the position of a native-born man who, by working for his own country, simply does his duty and no more than his duty! He only adorns his own house.

I say all these things only to lay before a public which has been always steadfast, loyal and kind, the high deserts of these artists and especially of their wonderful conductor, Dr. Muck—to remind our friends of the audiences that the conduct of the artists under trying conditions has been excellent—a conduct without which the orchestra could not have existed for one day—and to express aloud my own deep, strong admiration and affection for these artists, and particularly for Dr. Muck, who never [illegible] in giving [illegible] each [illegible] ment and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested.

"But such music as you are producing in America today for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people.

"You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical Nation. You ask me frankly and I tell you frankly.

"One instance came to my notice in regard to the deadly influence of the ragtime music which I will cite to show the insidious effect it may have even on the people whose first impulse is toward the right thing.

"I dined one evening with a family devoted to the interests of Symphony music. They had been subscribers for years. After the dinner I was very tired and strolled in the library alone to rest for a moment. To my astonishment I saw a music machine in one corner of the room. I said possibly they may have some records of good music and singers, and so glanced over the records. Then, to my horror I discovered that they were of the most deadly, vulgar ragtime music: not only was the music of the worst character, but in some instances there were records of vulgar cafe chantant songs, a collection of all the things that it seemed to me the real music lover would be opposed to.

"It was a terrible shock to me. I felt as though I had lost friends. I wondered how much I was to blame for it. How was it possible that I could have put into my work in the symphony my heart and soul and most earnest desire for the best results from such work and [illegible] among those I had [illegible] music

---

[illegible] comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later, and civilization is full fledged, it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. The early music wells up out of great love, great joy, great, splendid response to nature. In the later life of a nation art comes from an appreciation of what it adds to life, from a sense of its decorative importance. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea. Wagner, strangely enough, combined both the traditional and the modern point of view in his music. He had the great idea of a new religion for the world, a religion that could no longer be held in the grasp of the gods, that must be reborn through the splendor and tragedy of human love and sacrifice. In the music of Strauss you feel the pounding of a great idea, you feel suddenly that he is breaking down conventional barriers that have held people away from the intoxication and joy of music. Beethoven had the great idea of bringing close to the people all pastoral beauty from the beginning of days. Whatever has been joyous in pastoral lives, whatever has been sad or thrilling or tender or peaceful Beethoven has reproduced for the world's joy and strength.

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great, limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date DEC 1 2 1915
Established

Dr. Karl Muck Writes On Music of the Democrac

He Calls Ragtime Poison and Says America Cannot Hope to Produce Music of the Type of the Old World Countries.

Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has in the current number of "The Craftsman" a most interesting contribution to the subject of music in America. Dr. Muck's article is entitled "The Music of the Democracy," and it does not attempt to pour molasses over our national consciousness. The conductor declares that as America never had a childhood, it cannot hope to produce music of the type possessed by the countries of the Old World.

"When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later and civilization is full-fledged it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea."

Not a very comforting thought to those who desire to see an American school of music and who believe that music is primarily a product of the emotions. If a real American music is to be produced, continues Dr. Muck, it will not be through ragtime, but despite of it, and a cultivation of the musical taste must be endowed.

"I do not in the least believe in popular music; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. What you call here ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young."

This is Dr. Muck's uncompromising doctrine, and in conclusion he vehemently assails the ideals of Young America, declaring that our youth is everywhere seeking for pleasure with a background of half-baked ideas. This state, he declares, is fatal to art and to beauty. The article in "The Craftsman" is in part as follows:

"A music-loving people! Why not—living in such a marvellous country, a country that should be the source of splendid inspiration for every art. It is different in Europe; the inspiration is not needed. Music continues and thrives in the Old World because it is a part of the existence of the people. They are all brought up with music in their homes and in their schools. They know it as they know their A B C's; they do not have to seek new and tremendous inspiration—influences powerful enough to cut a channel through prevailing interests.

"But in America you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way, you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, when there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions, when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests, when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballad or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy, and settled in America with their own specialized ways, with their own social attitude and religion all ready-made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry have time to take deep root in the spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of its soul.

"It is hopeless to attempt to do anything for middle age. No nation has ever developed art through its grown-up people. It has developed much enjoyment, much culture, it has shown appreciation of art, as America has done, for there is an ever increasing love of good music in this country, an ever growing audience for grand opera and for symphony concerts, but that is not what you are asking about in America. You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have the great idea for music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy—the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start, I should say, give your young people the best music the world has ever known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of the musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical development and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America to-day for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation.

"As yet the people do not seem willing to make the effort to support grand opera and symphony concerts. The question resolves itself into this: If you do not endow these institutions you cannot have this music. If you wish the music at this present stage of your civilization, it must be endowed. So far as I am aware no musical institution of any description is supported by state or government in America. The only endowments that are made are individual, and those in some instances are lavish to a degree. In New York your grand opera is supported by subscription and frequently by additional endowment as well—always personal. This is true of every grand opera in America. It is also true, so far as I am able to state, of the symphony orchestra. I know it is true of the New York Symphony, of the Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Seattle and so on indefinitely.

"And right here it is important to note that the interest in the symphony orchestra is spreading. It is no small matter for America to realize that there is a successful symphony orchestra in Seattle as well as in San Francisco, Chicago and so on toward the East. But these orchestras are not supported by the voluntary contributions of the mass of people. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically the gift to the people of one great music lover, Mr. Higginson. It is Mr. Higginson who has made it possible for the Boston Symphony to work without joining the music union, so that it is an absolutely free institution. And in this free country I find that the trade unions do not always leave the people quite free either in the arts or crafts. I think that if you are not careful, through them you will greatly mar musical opportunity and you will possibly kill the development of craft work.

"A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him how to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; but he could make a little more money as a carpenter and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the man who is the greatest musician who has the best salary.

"But to return to the endowment of music. You will see that at present it is necessary for certain kinds of musical development. After you have put music in all your schools, in the biggest, most impersonal way, I firmly believe that you will be cultivating a generation of people who will be eager to support symphony concerts, grand opera, who will be writing music for both.

"The question of endowment does not seem to trouble any one in Germany; it is universal. In every place of forty or fifty thousand inhabitants there is a symphony orchestra supported by the town. In Berlin the Emperor gives 3,000,000 marks a year out of his private income for the advancement of music; in Vienna, music is supported by the government. There seems to be no question in the world but what the people who have the greatest opportunity for enjoying music should really be the supporters. The idea of endowing music in Germany came about through Frederick the Great, some two hundred years ago. He was a music lover. He and the dukes of his court decided that they would pay for it themselves, and this sentiment has continued in Germany ever since, although if it were not done there is, in my mind, no question in the world but what the people by voluntary contributions would hold music in their midst.

"You have asked me just what quality in your civilization I find most detrimental to the development and progress of the arts. It seems to me that the most serious handicap to art that I have been able to discover in America, and, of course, there are serious handicaps in every nation to its best growth, is the fact that politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern. I believe that politics should be absolutely separated from business activities. Politics is the machinery of running a nation. A man should not be in politics to make money, to make his living, but to work for the welfare of the nation. There should be no opportunity whatever for him to have to face financial questions. He should be supported by the government. But in America I find in every state people in politics for their own interest—not to build up a finer, stronger, purer nation, not to insure the development of art-loving people, not to add to the beauty of the country, the delight of it, but for their own aggrandizement. Naturally this brings about a state restless, uncertain and separated from the betterment of the country. Also, it places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy, and one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth.

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned; to be independent when they are young, and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres, and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are losing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more houses, more clothes, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

Dr. Muck surely does not flatter us, but in this day of Henry Fords and easy money and unpreparedness, his words may well be taken to heart, not only in regard to music, but for all the arts, and indeed for life itself.

TRANSCRIPT.

DECEMBER 13.

WAR SPIRIT AND THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Transcript:

While hearing the Pension Fund concert on Sunday, the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dwelt in my mind, and a few sentences about these affairs may interest your readers.

When in September, 1914, Dr. Muck turned up from Germany, a doubt existed as to whether the orchestra would play together, for the members hailed from ten different nations which were at war with one another.

Therefore, it was settled that a few words should be said to the members, and the words were said—counselling kindness and pleasant looks between man and man and only such. The men of the orchestra listened quietly and seemed pleased. Since that day fourteen months have passed, during which harmony has prevailed; yet rehearsals, concerts, monthly journeys, the trip to San Francisco, with their trials, have come and gone. It is a fine instance of self-control and gentle behavior. These members of the orchestra are men with red blood in their veins, and must feel keenly the great struggle. With their birth and education, they cannot well understand our views of life, and must be puzzled with our opposition to their inherited beliefs and principles, while at the same time we esteem and like them and their fellow-countrymen as individuals, and admire many things in their native countries. Especially to Germany the orchestra owes much, and that means the schools, the music, and the members from Germany and Austria.

It is a serious task to practise afresh the old music, and to study and play the new music which the later composers have made so complicated—to find the hidden meaning and beauty of a great symphony—in short, to render such a beautiful service as that of yesterday. It is the result of careful, intelligent labor through years, and of obedience to the will of honest, able, gifted conductors such as we have had and have. Nevertheless, all this work tries the patience and the nerves of men. Moreover, these musicians are not our countrymen, but foreigners who came here to give us delight and comfort. How different from the position of a native-born man who, by working for his own country, simply does his duty and no more than his duty! He only adorns his own house.

I say all these things only to lay before a public which has been always steadfast, loyal and kind, the high deserts of these artists and especially of their wonderful conductor, Dr. Muck—to remind our friends of the audiences that the conduct of the artists under trying conditions has been excellent—a conduct without which the orchestra could not have existed for one day—and to express aloud my own deep, strong admiration and affection for these artists, and particularly for Dr. Muck, who never [illegible] in giving [illegible] each ment and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested.

"But such music as you are producing in America today for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people.

"You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical Nation. You ask me frankly and I tell you frankly.

"One instance came to my notice in regard to the deadly influence of the ragtime music which I will cite to show the insidious effect it may have even on people whose first impulse is toward the right thing.

"I dined one evening with a family devoted to the interests of Symphony music. They had been subscribers for years. After the dinner I was very tired and strolled in the library alone to rest for a moment. To my astonishment I saw a music machine in one corner of the room. I said possibly they may have some records of good music and singers, and so glanced over the records. Then, to my horror I discovered that they were of the most deadly, vulgar ragtime music; not only was the music of the worst character, but in some instances there were records of vulgar cafe chantant songs, a collection of all the things that it seemed to me the real music lover would be opposed to.

"It was a terrible shock to me. I felt as though I had lost friends. I wondered how much I was to blame for it. How was it possible that I could have put into my work in the symphony my heart and soul and most earnest desire for the best results from such work and then find that among those I had counted upon as true friends and music lovers, there was this deadly interest in the vulgar fad of the day? I realized how much there was to work against, how much to overcome before this country, with all the opportunity in the world, would reall[illegible] sical Nation."

Writes On ic of the Democrac

He Calls Ragtime Poison and Says America Cannot Hope to Produce Music of the Type of the Old World Countries.

Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has in the current number of "The Craftsman" a most interesting contribution to the subject of music in America. Dr. Muck's article is entitled "The Music of the Democracy," and it does not attempt to pour molasses over our national consciousness. The conductor declares that as America never had a childhood, it cannot hope to produce music of the type possessed by the countries of the Old World.

"When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later and civilization is full-fledged it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea."

Not a very comforting thought to those who desire to see an American school of music and who believe that music is primarily a product of the emotions. If a real American music is to be produced, continues Dr. Muck, it will not be through ragtime, but despite of it, and a cultivation of the musical taste must be endowed.

"I do not in the least believe in popular music; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. What you call here ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young."

This is Dr. Muck's uncompromising doctrine, and in conclusion he vehemently assails the ideals of Young America, declaring that our youth is everywhere seeking for pleasure with a background of half-baked ideas. This state, he declares, is fatal to art and to beauty. The article in "The Craftsman" is in part as follows:

"A music-loving people! Why not—living in such a marvellous country, a country that should be the source of splendid inspiration for every art. It is different in Europe; the inspiration is not needed. Music continues and thrives in the Old World because it is a part of the existence of the people. They are all brought up with music in their homes and in their schools. They know it as they know their A B C's; they do not have to seek new and tremendous inspiration—influences powerful enough to cut a channel through prevailing interests.

"But in America you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way, you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, when there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions, when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests, when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballad or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting grounds and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy, and settled in America with their own specialized ways, with their own social attitude and religion all ready-made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential, but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry have time to take deep root in the

When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later, and civilization is full fledged, it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. The early music wells up out of great love, great joy, great, splendid response to nature. In the later life of a nation art comes from an appreciation of what it adds to life, from a sense of its decorative importance. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea. Wagner, strangely enough, combined both the traditional and the modern point of view in his music. He had the great idea of a new religion for the world, a religion that could no longer be held in the grasp of the gods, that must be reborn through the splendor and tragedy of human love and sacrifice. In the music of Strauss you feel the pounding of a great idea, you feel suddenly that he is breaking down conventional barriers that have held people away from the intoxication and joy of music. Beethoven had the great idea of bringing close to the people all pastoral beauty from the beginning of days. Whatever has been joyous in pastoral lives, whatever has been sad or thrilling or tender or peaceful Beethoven has reproduced for the world's joy and strength.

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great, limitless plains veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit must eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of its soul.

"It is hopeless to attempt to do anything for middle age. No nation has ever developed art through its grown-up people. It has developed much enjoyment, much culture, it has shown appreciation of art, as America has done, for there is an ever increasing love of good music in this country, an ever growing audience for grand opera and for symphony concerts, but that is not what you are asking about in America. You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have the great idea for music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy—the music of the free people.

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh, clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start, I should say, give your young people the best music the world has ever known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music, their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of the musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical development and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested. But such music as you are producing in America to-day for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation.

"As yet the people do not seem willing to make the effort to support grand opera and symphony concerts. The question resolves itself into this: If you do not endow these institutions you cannot have this music. If you wish the music at this present stage of your civilization, it must be endowed. So far as I am aware no musical institution of any description is supported by state or government in America. The only endowments that are made are individual, and those in some instances are lavish to a degree. In New York your grand opera is supported by subscription and frequently by additional endowment as well—always personal. This is true of every grand opera in America. It is also true, so far as I am able to state, of the symphony orchestra. I know it is true of the New York Symphony, of the Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Seattle and so on indefinitely.

"And right here it is important to note that the interest in the symphony orchestra is spreading. It is no small matter for America to realize that there is a successful symphony orchestra in Seattle as well as in San Francisco, Chicago and so on toward the East. But these orchestras are not supported by the voluntary contributions of the mass of people. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically the gift to the people of one great music lover, Mr. Higginson. It is Mr. Higginson who has made it possible for the Boston Symphony to work without joining the music union, so that it is an absolutely free institution. And in this free country I find that the trade unions do not always leave the people quite free either in the arts or crafts. I think that if you are not careful, through them you will greatly mar musical opportunity and you will possibly kill the development of craft work.

"A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him how to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things.

"I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; but he could make a little more money as a carpenter and so he elected to call himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the man who is the greatest musician who has the best salary.

"But to return to the endowment of music. You will see that at present it is necessary for certain kinds of musical development. After you have put music in all your schools, in the biggest, most impersonal way, I firmly believe that you will be cultivating a generation of people who will be eager to support symphony concerts, grand opera, who will be writing music for both.

"The question of endowment does not seem to trouble any one in Germany; it is universal. In every place of forty or fifty thousand inhabitants there is a symphony orchestra supported by the town. In Berlin the Emperor gives 3,000,000 marks a year out of his private income for the advancement of music; in Vienna, music is supported by the government. There seems to be no question in the world but what the people who have the greatest opportunity for enjoying music should really be the supporters. The idea of endowing music in Germany came about through Frederick the Great, some two hundred years ago. He was a music lover. He and the dukes of his court decided that they would pay for it themselves, and this sentiment has continued in Germany ever since, although if it were not done there is, in my mind, no question in the world but what the people by voluntary contributions would hold music in their midst.

"You have asked me just what quality in your civilization I find most detrimental to the development and progress of the arts. It seems to me that the most serious handicap to art that I have been able to discover in America, and, of course, there are serious handicaps in every nation to its best growth, is the fact that politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern. I believe that politics should be absolutely separated from business activities. Politics is the machinery of running a nation. A man should not be in politics to make money, to make his living, but to work for the welfare of the nation. There should be no opportunity whatever for him to have to face financial questions. He should be supported by the government. But in America I find in every state people in politics for their own interest—not to build up a finer, stronger, purer nation, not to insure the development of art-loving people, not to add to the beauty of the country, the delight of it, but for their own aggrandizement. Naturally this brings about a state restless, uncertain and separated from the betterment of the country. Also, it places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy, and one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business, artistic or spiritual growth.

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned; to be independent when they are young, and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres, and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are losing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more houses, more clothes, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

Dr. Muck surely does not flatter us, but in this day of Henry Fords and easy money and unpreparedness, his words may well be taken to heart, not only in regard to music, but for all the arts, and indeed for life itself.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 13.

WAR SPIRIT AND THE SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Transcript:

While hearing the Pension Fund concert on Sunday, the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dwelt in my mind, and a few sentences about these affairs may interest your readers.

When in September, 1914, Dr. Muck turned up from Germany, a doubt existed as to whether the orchestra would play together, for the members hailed from ten different nations which were at war with one another.

Therefore, it was settled that a few words should be said to the members, and the words were said—counselling kindness and pleasant looks between man and man and only such. The men of the orchestra listened quietly and seemed pleased. Since that day fourteen months have passed, during which harmony has prevailed; yet rehearsals, concerts, monthly journeys, the trip to San Francisco, with their trials, have come and gone. It is a fine instance of self-control and gentle behavior. These members of the orchestra are men with red blood in their veins, and must feel keenly the great struggle. With their birth and education, they cannot well understand our views of life, and must be puzzled with our opposition to their inherited beliefs and principles, while at the same time we esteem and like them and their fellow-countrymen as individuals, and admire many things in their native countries. Especially to Germany the orchestra owes much, and that means the schools, the music, and the members from Germany and Austria.

It is a serious task to practise afresh the old music, and to study and play the new music which the later composers have made so complicated—to find the hidden meaning and beauty of a great symphony—in short, to render such a beautiful service as that of yesterday. It is the result of careful, intelligent labor through years, and of obedience to the will of honest, able, gifted conductors such as we have had and have. Nevertheless, all this work tries the patience and the nerves of men. Moreover, these musicians are not our countrymen, but foreigners who came here to give us delight and comfort. How different from the position of a native-born man who, by working for his own country, simply does his duty and no more than his duty! He only adorns his own house.

I say all these things only to lay before a public which has been always steadfast, loyal and kind, the high deserts of these artists and especially of their wonderful conductor, Dr. Muck—to remind our friends of the audiences that the conduct of the artists under trying conditions has been excellent—a conduct without which the orchestra could not have existed for one day—and to express aloud my own deep, strong admiration and affection for these artists, and particularly for Dr. Muck, who never [illegible] in giving [illegible] each

From Telegram WORCESTER, MASS.
Address
Date DEC 5 - 1915
Established:

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It Will Make Its First Appearance of Season in Mechanics Hall Tuesday.

The Symphony orchestra of Boston under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will make its first appearance of the season in Mechanics hall Tuesday. This will be the second of the series of concerts given by C. A. Ellis. The orchestra gives three of the five concerts that Mr. Ellis arranges for this city, and on the whole its concerts have become more popular than those given by individual artists.

The growth in favor which the orchestra has had in Worcester has been constant and steady until now it has no rival.

In this respect, Worcester stands well in line with the rest of the country, for the Boston symphony orchestra is the nearest approach to a national institution that America possesses in the world of art.

Its many concerts throughout the country draw overflowing audiences and critics and public alike have difficulty in expressing their appreciation of its magnificent playing.

It was this orchestra that was chosen as the representative musical organization of the country to give a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific international exposition in San Francisco last spring. There it gave 13 concerts in as many days, and for these concerts more than 46,000 people paid prices ranging from $1 to $3 each to listen to it.

In the early part of this season the orchestra made a tour in the West giving seven concerts as far distant as St. Joseph, Mo., and more than 30,000 people listened to these concerts.

Dr. Muck has arranged a special program for Worcester. The soloist will be Laeta Hartely, a distinguished American pianist, who has played with much success with the Boston symphony orchestra.

It was originally announced that she would play Saint-Saens' "Concerto in G minor, No. 2," but she has decided that the great "Concerto in D minor, No. 1," by the American composer, Edward MacDowell, is a more effective work.

The symphony will be the lovely "Eighth symphony" of Beethoven, that he called his "little symphony in F," and the other orchestral numbers will be the first "L'Arlesienne" suite of Bizet. This comprises four numbers. The program in full is as follows:—

Beethoven symphony, No. 8, in F major
MacDowell concerto for the piano and orchestra in D minor, No. 1
Bizet suite ....."L'Arlesienne," No. 1
Soloist—Laeta Hartley.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 8 - 1915

Notes.

The high grade of soloists, which the Boston Symphony is bringing to Providence, will be thoroughly maintained at its third concert Tuesday evening, Dec. 14, when Madame Louise Homer, the great contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York will appear. Madame Homer has long been a favorite in this city. She will sing two arias by Gluck and an aria from "Samson and Delilah."

rk, 188

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 9 - 1915
Esta 384

THE MUSIC OF DEMOCRACY.

Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and regarding a man's musicianship and standing in the artistic world nothing more need be said than that, for that fact fixes his place. But Dr. Muck is more than a great conductor of a great orchestra. By means of the place he fills he becomes a leader of the musical thought of this country just so long as his ideas and ideals are expressed in the programs and the playing of the famous Boston organization; and anything he may have to say on the subject of music in or for America has both weight and value. "The Craftsman" is doing a fine service to its readers in bringing out, this year, the opinions of great masters of music on their art, its aims and possibilities; it has already published a very interesting interview with Arthur Bodanzky, the new German opera conductor of the Metropolitan, and the present issue is enriched by an article in the form of an interview with Dr. Muck.

The feeling is present in Dr. Muck's mind that America must begin to take up serious music as a youth, so to speak, rather than as a child—as the European nations have taken it up. The new nation is not born to the traditions of the old; neither are a new people, comparatively, born with instinctive appreciation for an art like music, maybe, as are the older peoples of the world. Where musical training in practically every class of society is more or less a matter of course—as in Germany—the standard of musical knowledge may well average higher than it can in a country like ours, where musical knowledge has been, in the past, confined to a comparatively few people. We had no long, slow centuries of simple primitive existence, as Dr. Muck well points out; and the art that is the expression of an older people's emotional interest in beauty, when born to a full-fledged civilization comes as a more conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. In the early life of a nation music is an emotion; in the later life it may be more of an idea.

But despite the fact that we were a grown-up nation before music was much more than dreamed of here, Dr. Muck sees no reason why we may not become a really music-loving people. He feels that we may have for our later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all people. The music may express the vastnesses of our land, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; it will speak of liberty, of boundless opportunity. The painters have begun to express America as represented in the wonders of our great West—the Grand Canyon has been pictured in its splendors of color, light and shadow—but no poet has yet brought word of its supreme beauties, no music has yet given the great conductor of orchestras the loveliness of great open spaces of the yellow lights and purple shadows of the Canyon.

What is the difficulty? asks Dr. Muc —and answers his own question in th statement that it is not because we d not love music here in America, fo the love of music has been shown, ove and over again, by the sacrifices mad by our people to bring good music her for their enjoyment; but the nation has not taken the time to cherish the birth of great art here. We seem to be ever putting it off to some future day. We hope for it, expect it, feel that we may have it when we will, but we put it off—perhaps to make more money! What we need is the leisure for music, for art, for poetry. Dr. Muck would have us let down a little in our speed towards a goal of success that we may enjoy the beauties that are so many and so varied in our land; he would have music the natural expression of the joy and love that live in the hearts of all the children; "have every school one rich chorus," he says; encourage the formati orchestras in the schools; let ch and orchestras work and play to And then, suddenly, we may fi we really are what we have d of being—a musical nation!

To make us the musical na hope to become we must work sarily, with the children. Th be well taught—and taught who love the best, the highe in the great art. "Good musi ple form and music lovers as ors," expresses Dr. Muck's this subject. A love for may not be well founded on a ragtime. Endowed music will do much for the nation, and in speaking of conditions as they exist now Dr. Muck feels that if we wish music—the best —it must be endowed. Government does not take such things into consideration here; individuals must be depended on to give of their wealth so that the people may enjoy the greatest music. A fear is expressed that in some ways the real freedom of music and musicians in America is hampered by union conditions. And the feeling is very plain that there should be a standard of art in music independent of the financial standard.

Dr. Muck is an idealist, but he is not so wholly that as to be unable to give us practical ideas of our opportunities to become truly musical. He has a true musician's scorn of the commonplace, the banal, the vulgar, and he can not see "ragtime" records in a cultured home without a feeling that somehow he has strayed among aliens instead of friends. But he points to us the way out of the depths of cheap and ordinary music, in his expressed hope for the musical future of the country when the children, who now may be taught to appreciate the best music, shall become the real music-lovers of the land—bringing up their children in turn to understand and love the best in music. This is the moral of his whole talk, though he does not point it as a moral: By learning to appreciate the best music we shall, in time, learn also to produce music that will express America in music—and such expression will be the real music of democracy.

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 4 - 19
Esta 384

Boston Symphony.

On Monday evening, Dec. 13, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, will appear at the Parsons Theater for the second time this season. Dr. Muck offers a program for the occasion which has been rarely equalled in attractiveness by reason of its novelty, and it is only on these rare occasions the musical public hereabouts may become familiar with the greater orchestral works of the modern school. The numbers to be presented include Brahm's 4th Symphony in E minor, Smetana's Symphonic poem "Vysehrad" and the exceedingly brilliant Scherzo of Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The second piano concerto in D minor by MacDowell will be performed for the first time in Hartford. This concerto is most characteristic of MacDowell's music. The solo will be played by Miss Laeta Hartley, one of the most brilliant among the younger pianists and a favorite pupil of Harold Bauer. She has played with the Boston Orchestra in several cities with great success. Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

From COURANT
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 3 - 1915
Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Four widely differing nationalities will be represented by works of the four modern composers to be performed by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Parsons Theater next Monday evening. Brahms the German, MacDowell, the American, Smetana, the Bohemian, and Paul Dukas, the French, a symphony, a piano concerto, a symphony poem and a glittering scherzo, all in the mast modern dress will serve to make as brilliant a program as Dr. Muck has ever offered the Hartford public. Miss Laeta Hartley, the soloist is a Virginia girl who showed decided musical proclivities at a very early age. After studying in New York, she entered the New England Conservatory in Boston, completing, in one year, the full four-year course. After signal honors in her own land, Miss Hartley went to Paris, where she studied with Nager Swayne and Harold Bauer. The following is from the "Musical Courier": "Miss Hartley played with entire mastery, rhythmic swing and daintiness, contrasting in her performance. Storms of fully ed applause swept the hall. She able artist and was

---

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City
Date NOV 28 1915
Established:

Philharmonic and Boston Symphony Vie for Honors

A SHARP but good-natured rivalry has developed between the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony followings. The growth of this rivalry has been slow but sure, and its access has been closely watched by the musical people of New York, who number some hundreds of thousands. So, as it is a matter that concerns so many, it is worthy of note in these columns.

That the playing of the visitors from Massachusetts is superb there is no doubt. It is with them a matter both of skill and instruments, for the Boston Symphony is as remarkable for the value of its violins, as a financial asset, as it is for the faultlessness of its wood players as an artistic fact. The readings by Karl Muck, as conductor, and, before him, by Max Fiedler, and others, have approached perfection. The spiritual brotherhood, so to speak, of the orchestra is proverbial. So that with all these items of good instruments, good playing, good conductors and good feeling, it is but natural that the whole should be a pattern of orchestral performances.

But during the last week or two there has been a decided revolt among the clientele and administrators of the Philharmonic against the assumption of the Boston adherents that the latter alone should spell perfection. This feeling has found public exposition in the newspapers, and a propaganda is afoot to convince New York that the products of the Philharmonic are quite as remarkable as those of the Boston Orchestra. In this propaganda a strong appeal is being made to home pride and support, and the argument is put forward that as the Philharmonic is essentially a New York establishment, it behooves New Yorkers to make it a rallying point.

This is a worthy argument, of course, but in urging it a strange omission has been made. If there is to be a feeling that New York should support and admire an institution because it is of New York, then the New York Symphony Society also merits a high place in that argument. Founded in 1878 by Dr. Leopold Damrosch, this institution, both by name and by nature, has been essentially of New York. During the whole thirty-seven years of its existence its conductors have been New Yorkers.

For eighteen years the New York Symphony has conducted that educational alliance, the Young People's Symphony, which has had two New York conductors — Frank Damrosch for eleven years and Walter Damrosch for seven.

From its inception the New York Symphony Society has given loving and painstaking attention to the works of American composers. And a large part of its orchestra is composed of native musicians.

So that in this new exhortation to New York music lovers to judge between the Boston fetich and "local talent," the New York Symphony has surely a good claim to be heard.

[69]

From Telegram WORCESTER, MASS.
Address
Date DEC 5 - 1915
Established:

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It Will Make Its First Appearance of Season in Mechanics Hall Tuesday.

The Symphony orchestra of Boston under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will make its first appearance of the season in Mechanics hall Tuesday. This will be the second of the series of concerts given by C. A. Ellis. The orchestra gives three of the five concerts that Mr. Ellis arranges for this city, and on the whole its concerts have become more popular than those given by individual artists.

The growth in favor which the orchestra has had in Worcester has been constant and steady until now it has no rival.

In this respect, Worcester stands well in line with the rest of the country, for the Boston symphony orchestra is the nearest approach to a national institution that America possesses in the world of art.

Its many concerts throughout the country draw overflowing audiences and critics and public alike have difficulty in expressing their appreciation of its magnificent playing.

It was this orchestra that was chosen as the representative musical organization of the country to give a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific international exposition in San Francisco last spring. There it gave 13 concerts in as many days, and for these concerts more than 46,000 people paid prices ranging from $1 to $3 each to listen to it.

In the early part of this season the orchestra made a tour in the West giving seven concerts as far distant as St. Joseph, Mo., and more than 30,000 people listened to these concerts.

Dr. Muck has arranged a special program for Worcester. The soloist will be Laeta Hartely, a distinguished American pianist, who has played with much success with the Boston symphony orchestra.

It was originally announced that she would play Saint-Saens' "Concerto in G minor, No. 2," but she has decided that the great "Concerto in D minor, No. 1," by the American composer, Edward MacDowell, is a more effective work.

The symphony will be the lovely "Eighth symphony" of Beethoven, that he called his "little symphony in F," and the other orchestral numbers will be the first "L'Arlesienne" suite of Bizet. This comprises four numbers. The program in full is as follows:—

Beethoven symphony, No. 8, in F major MacDowell concerto for the piano and orchestra in D minor, No. 1
Bizet suite .....“L'Arlesienne,” No. 1
Soloist—Laeta Hartley.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 8 - 1915

Notes.

The high grade of soloists, which the Boston Symphony is bringing to Providence, will be thoroughly maintained at its third concert Tuesday evening, Dec. [illegible], when Madame Louise Homer, the great contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York will appear. Madame Homer has long been a favorite in this city. She will sing two arias by Gluck and an aria from "Samson and Delilah."

rk, 188

From [illegible]
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 9 - 1915
Esta 184

THE MUSIC OF DEMOCRACY.

Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and regarding a man's musicianship and standing in the artistic world nothing more need be said than that, for that fact fixes his place. But Dr. Muck is more than a great conductor of a great orchestra. By means of the place he fills he becomes a leader of the musical thought of this country just so long as his ideas and ideals are expressed in the programs and the playing of the famous Boston organization; and anything he may have to say on the subject of music in or for America has both weight and value. "The Craftsman" is doing a fine service to its readers in bringing out, this year, the opinions of great masters of music on their art, its aims and possibilities; it has already published a very interesting interview with Arthur Bodanzky, the new German opera conductor of the Metropolitan, and the present issue is enriched by an article in the form of an interview with Dr. Muck.

The feeling is present in Dr. Muck's mind that America must begin to take up serious music as a youth, so to speak, rather than as a child—as the European nations have taken it up. The new nation is not born to the traditions of the old; neither are a new people, comparatively, born with instinctive appreciation for an art like music, maybe, as are the older peoples of the world. Where musical training in practically every class of society is more or less a matter of course—as in Germany—the standard of musical knowledge may well average higher than it can in a country like ours, where musical knowledge has been, in the past, confined to a comparatively few people. We had no long, slow centuries of simple primitive existence, as Dr. Muck well points out; and the art that is the expression of an older people's emotional interest in beauty, when born to a full-fledged civilization comes as a more conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. In the early life of a nation music is an emotion; in the later life it may be more of an idea.

But despite the fact that we were a grown-up nation before music was much more than dreamed of here, Dr. Muck sees no reason why we may not become a really music-loving people. He feels that we may have for our later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all people. The music may express the vastnesses of our land, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; it will speak of liberty, of boundless opportunity. The painters have begun to express America as represented in the wonders of our great West—the Grand Canyon has been pictured in its splendors of color, light and shadow—but no poet has yet brought word of its supreme beauties, no music has yet given the great conductor of orchestras the loveliness of great open spaces, of the yellow lights and purple shadows of the Canyon.

What is the difficulty? asks Dr. Muck—and answers his own question in the statement that it is not because we do not love music here in America, for the love of music has been shown, over and over again, by the sacrifices made by our people to bring good music here for their enjoyment; but the nation has not taken the time to cherish the birth of great art here. We seem to be ever putting it off to some future day. We hope for it, expect it, feel that we may have it when we will, but we put it off—perhaps to make more money! What we need is the leisure for music, for art, for poetry. Dr. Muck would have us let down a little in our speed towards a goal of success that we may enjoy the beauties that are so many and so varied in our land; he would have music the natural expression of the joy and love that live in the hearts of all the children; "have every school one rich chorus," he says; encourage the formation of orchestras in the schools; let choruses and orchestras work and play together. And then, suddenly, we may find that we really are what we have dreamed of being—a musical nation!

To make us the musical nation we hope to become we must work, necessarily, with the children. They must be well taught—and taught by those who love the best, the highest things in the great art. "Good music in simple form and music lovers as instructors," expresses Dr. Muck's ideas on this subject. A love for Beethoven may not be well founded on a basis of ragtime. Endowed music will do much for the nation, and in speaking of conditions as they exist now Dr. Muck feels that if we wish music—the best—it must be endowed. Government does not take such things into consideration here; individuals must be depended on to give of their wealth so that the people may enjoy the greatest music. A fear is expressed that in some ways the real freedom of music and musicians in America is hampered by union conditions. And the feeling is very plain that there should be a standard of art in music independent of the financial standard.

Dr. Muck is an idealist, but he is not so wholly that as to be unable to give us practical ideas of our opportunities to become truly musical. He has a true musician's scorn of the commonplace, the banal, the vulgar, and he can not see "ragtime" records in a cultured home without a feeling that somehow he has strayed among aliens instead of friends. But he points to us the way out of the depths of cheap and ordinary music, in his expressed hope for the musical future of the country when the children, who now may be taught to appreciate the best music, shall become the real music-lovers of the land—bringing up their children in turn to understand and love the best in music. This is the moral of his whole talk, though he does not point it as a moral: By learning to appreciate the best music we shall, in time, learn also to produce music that will express America in music—and such expression will be the real music of democracy.

From [illegible]
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 4 - 191
Esta 84

Boston Symphony.

On Monday evening, Dec. 13, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, will appear at the Parsons Theater for the second time this season. Dr. Muck offers a program for the occasion which has been rarely equalled in attractiveness by reason of its novelty, and it is only on these rare occasions the musical public hereabouts may become familiar with the greater orchestral works of the modern school. The numbers to be presented include Brahm's 4th Symphony in E minor, Smetana's Symphonic poem "Vysehrad" and the exceedingly brilliant Scherzo of Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The second piano concerto in D minor by MacDowell will be performed for the first time in Hartford. This concerto is most characteristic of MacDowell's music. The solo will be played by Miss Laeta Hartley, one of the most brilliant among the younger pianists and a favorite pupil of Harold Bauer. She has played with the Boston Orchestra in several cities with great success. Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

---

om [illegible]
dress Hartford, Conn.
e DEC 8 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Four widely differing nationalities will be represented by works of the four modern composers to be performed by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Parsons Theater next Monday evening. Brahms the German, MacDowell, the American, Smetana, the Bohemian, and Paul Dukas, the French, a symphony, a piano concerto, a symphony poem and a glittering scherzo, all in the mast modern dress will serve to make as brilliant a program as Dr. Muck has ever offered the Hartford public. Miss Laeta Hartley, the soloist is a Virginia girl who showed decided musical proclivities at a very early age. After studying in New York, she entered the New England Conservatory in Boston, completing, in one year, the full four-year course. After signal honors in her own land, Miss Hartley went to Paris, where she studied with Nager Swayne and Harold Bauer. The following is from the "Musical Courier": "Miss Hartley played with entire mastery, rhythmic swing and daintiness, contrasting in her performance. Storms of fully deserved applause swept the hall. She is a most admirable artist and was repeatedly applauded."

Reserved seats on sale at Gallup & Alfred's Music Store.

---

armonic and Boston nphony Vie for Honors

A SHARP but good-natured rivalry has developed between the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony followings. The growth of this rivalry has been slow but sure, and its access has been closely watched by the musical people of New York, who number some hundreds of thousands. So, as it is a matter that concerns so many, it is worthy of note in these columns.

That the playing of the visitors from Massachusetts is superb there is no doubt. It is with them a matter both of skill and instruments, for the Boston Symphony is as remarkable for the value of its violins, as a financial asset, as it is for the faultlessness of its wood players as an artistic fact. The readings by Karl Muck, as conductor, and, before him, by Max Fiedler, and others, have approached perfection. The spiritual brotherhood, so to speak, of the orchestra is proverbial. So that with all these items of good instruments, good playing, good conductors and good feeling, it is but natural that the whole should be a pattern of orchestral performances.

But during the last week or two there has been a decided revolt among the clientele and administrators of the Philharmonic against the assumption of the Boston adherents that the latter alone should spell perfection. This feeling has found public exposition in the newspapers, and a propaganda is afoot to convince New York that the products of the Philharmonic are quite as remarkable as those of the Boston Orchestra. In this propaganda a strong appeal is being made to hom pride and support, and the argument is put forward that as the Philharmonic is essentially a New York establishment, it behooves New Yorkers to make it a rallying point.

This is a worthy argument, of course, but in urging it a strange omission has been made. If there is to be a feeling that New York should support and admire an institution because it is of New York, then the New York Symphony Society also merits a high place in that argument. Founded n 1878 by Dr. Leopold Damrosch, this nstitution, both by name and by nature, has been essentially of New York. During the whole thirty-seven years of its existence its conductors have been New Yorkers.

For eighteen years the New York Symphony has conducted that educational alliance, the Young People's Symphony, which has had two New York conductors — Frank Damrosch for eleven years and Walter Damrosch for seven.

From its inception the New York Symphony Society has given loving and painstaking attention to the works of American composers. And a large part of its orchestra is composed of native musicians.

So that in this new exhortation to New York music lovers to judge between the Boston fetich and "local alent," the New York Symphony has urely a good claim to be heard.

[69]

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 22 1915

1884

Melba With Boston Symphony.

An error was made in the notice of the third Boston Symphony Concert, which comes January 3, in the announcement that Ernest Schelling would be the soloist. Mr. Schelling will be soloist at the February concert, but as announced at the beginning of the season the soloist at the January concert, a week from next Monday, will be Madame Melba. This will be Madame Melba's last appearance in Philadelphia this season.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 7 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The three annual visits of Boston Symphony orchestra become the most eagerly antici events in our entertainment se The second of these will take at Parsons's theater next M evening. Both program and are entirely new to Hartford ences. This in itself will add t attractiveness of the evening, only on these occasions can w come acquainted with the grea chestral creations of modern composers and there is much interest in new performers, especially where there is reason to expect something unusual. In Miss Hartley, the brilliant young American pianist, is combined rare excellence as a pianist and a captivating personality. Brahms, MacDowell, Smetana and Paul Kulas contribute to a program which, for interest and brilliancy, er has been excelled by any of here by the Boston players. ved seats are now on sale at & Alfred's music store.

From POST
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date 4 1915
Establish

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS BRUCKNER 7TH SYMPHONY

Kreisler Plays Beethoven Violin Concerto With Orchestra—Carus Sings Well in "Pagliacci"

(Special to The Hartford Post)

New York, Dec. 4.—Dr. Muck made an unusual program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given Thursday evening in Carnegie hall. It comprised only two numbers; Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's concerto for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler. The symphony is long, lasting just over an hour. The audience listened with patience to this work of vast dimensions in length, breadth and thickness, encouraged, no doubt, by the thought of what was to follow it.

Dr. Muck played it here eight years ago, in his first term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. He is a prophet of Bruckner, who has made extensive propaganda for his symphonies in Europe as well as in this country. So have many others of the most distinguished of modern conductors; and this fact should discourage hasty depreciation of Bruckner's works. Yet they have not hastily been depreciated here, though they have tried the endurance of the public for nearly a generation. When the Seventh Symphony was first played in New York some 28 years ago, it was considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, abstruse elaboration. The 15 brass instruments used in it excited wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as bewilderingly "modern," with Wagnerian tendencies.

His music now seems intelligible enough; it does not persistently ape the Wagnerian idiom, and what he is trying to convey is easy to understand. The trouble with Bruckner does not lie in that direction. It is evident that he was a creative force of undoubted power; but that he had little control, through self-criticism of his work in symphonic development. Such development he had not mastered; and he had little feeling for the significance or the apt proportions of the symphonic form. The movements of this symphony seem like an elaborate series of genial experiments carried to wearisome lengths, with no certain foresight of the end and no inevitable progress toward that end. There are pages of grandiose and imposing power; passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods, poignant and searching, truly and finely felt.

The opening passages of the first movement, and much in it that follows, have impressiveness; but there are here, as through the whole work tiresome repetitions, dry and uninteresting details; and the end is a re- [illegible]

[illegible] it paraphrase the final scene of "Das Rheingold." The slow movement, interminably and extravagantly prolonged though it is, has true nobility and in its finest moments a deep solemnity. If the succulent portions of the Scherzo could be isolated from much husk, they would be enjoyed. The last movement is the weakest, inept in its material and dry in its pretentious learnedness.

This strangely compounded work was heard with more apparent interest than at any previous performance of it here. The performance was superb, devoted on the part of both conductor and players, though some may have question whether the scherzo might not have gained by a livelier tempo. There was much applause after the slow movement and at the end Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and, as he so often does, made his men rise to share the applause with him.

Mr. Kreisler was most enthusiastically welcomed. He played Beethoven's concerto with the profound appreciation of its poetical beauties that has so often marked his performances of it before. It was the performance of a great artist who [illegible] into the spirit of Beethoven [illegible] truly recreates

---

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 14 1915
Established:

DR. MUCK WAS HERE IN SPIRIT.

Famous Conductor Otherwise Absent From Symphony Orchestra Concert

ORGANIZATION PLAYS SPLENDIDLY

And a Few Hardy Brave the Sto Hear It.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert for the season in Parsons's theater last evening. Dr. Muck, the distinguished conductor of the orchestra, being ill and unable to be present, his place was filled by Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the organization. The soloist of the evening was Miss Laeta Hartley, pianiste.

The program was as follows:

Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Smetana — "Vysehrad," Symphonic Poem, No. 1 of the Cycle, "Ma Vlast" ("My Country").
MacDowell—Concerto for Pianforte, No. 2, D minor, Op. 23.
I. Larghetto calmato.
II. Presto giocoso.
III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice") (after a Ballad by Goethe).

The audience, though small in numbers owing to the extreme weather conditions, was unusually appreciative and responsive.

So thoroughly studied and prepared are all the program undertakings of the Boston Symphony orchestra that it is not difficult to imagine the band playing superbly with no conductor at all, if occasion demanded. Skill and efficiency, musicianship and artistry (the former word by no means comprehends the latter) in rehearsal routine comprise nine-tenths of the elements in the art of any conductor. The other tenth is the power to crystalize and focus in public performance all that has gone before.

Now Dr. Muck is among the greatest of conductors in the concert sense of the word; but he is even more distinguished as a rehearsal laboratory expert. It is in the rehearsals of the Boston orchestra that the incomparable art of the organization is compounded. And while Dr. Muck's absence last evening was every way to be regretted, it is nevertheless true that the very genius of his work was clearly to be discerned throughout the performance. All the familiar indications of thoroughgoing and artistic preparation associated with his regime in the leadership of the orchestra were in evidence.

It is true that the Brahms Symphony suffered appreciably from Dr. [illegible] Dr. Muck has no living equal as an interpreter of Brahms. And the E minor Symphony played last evening needed Dr. Muck's vitalizing personality and wide horizon of perspective. But in this symphony and, indeed, throughout the program Mr. Schmidt filled his difficult position with distinction, poise and authority.

The symphony in E minor is the fourth and last of the Brahms symphonies. It has not yet grown, and probably never will grow, nito the public favor enjoyed by its predecessors. Its substance is weighty, its message profound. But in most respects the work as a whole and the last movement in particular represents Brahms at the summit of his creative vision, a summit reached before him by Beethoven alone, and after him by no one.

Mr. Schmidt and the orchestra gave the work a noble rendition. The intricate thematic windings of the last movement untwined themselves like strands of spun gold. But little hint of the significance and splendor of this Brahms tone poetry is to be conveyed in words. The thoughts of the E minor symphony are grave, austerely beautiful thoughts; or they are shining sailed fancies that lightly drigt in seas of summer sky; or they tremble with the mysteries of life and death and spirit. At the open gates of this Brahms thought world stood the Boston Symphony orchestra, last evening, with beckoning hands.

The Smetana and Dukas works as presented on this program were gorgeous processions of color, rhythmic vitality, and life, and riotous virtuosity. Their outlines were set forth with blazing tonal suggestiveness.

Miss Hartley acquitted herself very creditably with the MacDowell concerto. This concerto is not an important work as masterpieces go. It is often shallow and showy; its harmonies weak or monotonous; its melodies too sweetish; its rhythmic construction too various and casual; its ingredients too Grieg-ish mannered and generally unworthy MacDowell at his best. But the work is pianistic and therefore attractive to pianists, especially to lady pianists and to—some other pianists. Miss Hartley played the concerto with verve and apparent conviction. There were occasional and momentary strained relations between the solo and the accompaniment. Miss Hartley is obviously a pianist of parts and promise. Among

---

From
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 14 191
Establishe

BOSTON SYMPHONY AUDIENCE IS SLIM

Storm Keeps Many From Second Concert of Orchestra.

MISS HARTLEY PLAYS M'DOWELL CONCERTO.

Four numbers, two of surpassing interest intellectually, and two attractive for their melody and descriptive value, formed the program played at the Parsons Theater last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared in this city for the second time this season. The attendance, although the house was practically sold out, at the very best would be termed scattering, there being not more than quarter of the seats filled. But, at that, a surprising number of people placed music above the terrors of the storm, and even disregarded the almost certain fate of having to walk to and from the theater because of stalled automobiles

It is hardly of use to attempt any criticism of the playing of the Philharmonic. In their thiry-fifth season, the combination under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, has approached more nearly to perfection than any symphony orchestra in this country. Its performances are the result of long rehearsals by trained musicians, directed by one of the most gifted musical minds of the age. Any seeming faults must be laid rather to the not-carefully-enough-trained ear of the author than to any defect in the interpretations.

To the majority of the audience, of course, the MacDowell number, in which the pianoforte scoring was played by Miss Laeta Hartley, was most interesting. MacDowell, although an American composer, received his early training and did his early work in Germany, and the Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2 D minor, Opus 23, composed in Weisbaden about 1887, has all the distinguishing marks of the German influence and very little of the lyric quality which distinguished his later work in this country. Intellectual throughout the three movements, it presents a study of careful working out in three parts of a number of themes. Miss Hartley, the soloist, brought to the piano a virility and strength of action too seldom found in a woman artist. Her technic leaves little to be desired and her interpretation of the stirring themes was ably seconded by the orchestra. At the conclusion of the number she was called out again and again, before the audience ceased to applaud.

The first number, the Brahm symphony in E minor, No. 4, Opus 48, showed at its best the capabality of the famed orchestra. The first productions of the symphony proved disappointing both to Brahms and to his friends. The production last evening while brilliant and striking, showed the [illegible]

[illegible] symphonic [illegible] written by Smetana, and one of a suite to describe, in music, his beloved land of the Czechs, well illustrates the erratic genius of the composer, who ended a life of sixty years in the madhouse at Prague. The music typifies the splendor of the ancient fortress of Vysehrad, in a district of Prague, its noble knights, beautiful ladies, jubilant trumpets—all of its ancient and half-legendary glory. Then powerful chords of wind instruments in chromatic descent, with strings darkly tremulous portray the fall of the dynasty and the desolation of the ancient stronghold. In the last of the lamentations, is heard as a half forgotten song, an exceedingly difficult part for the harps.

The last number of the program, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," an orchestral scherzo by Paul Durkas, is descriptive of an ancient legend of magic. It is mysterious, wierd and striking. An ancient magician, with a habit of animating brooms, to sweep the house, pails to draw water and other household utensils to perform useful work without human agency, has an apprentice who learns the magic method of beginning the tasks. He starts a pail drawing water and discovers that he cannot stop it. He seizes an axe and cuts the pail in two—each part then brings water. Anxiety and despair are halted by the arrival of the master magician who ends the nightmare.

There is a long and mysterious introduction introduced with long held harmonics of violas and 'cellos and peculiar effects of flutes. The second theme, more important than the first, is given to wood wind instruments, beginning with the clarinet. These two themes are repeated. The second theme is aken up by a muted trumpet and coninued by flute and harp. Then the econd and chief theme, the "flood muic" appears in a changed form, played y three bassoons. The harps throughut the scoring here develop a cascade f splashing melody. The scherzo is eveloped, there is a translation into usic of the apprentice's anxiety and t the last the master appears, heralded y blasts of brass instruments, and ith three great chords the chaos is educed to silence.

The last concert in this city for the ason will be played on March 27. e soloist will be Anton Witek, the ncert master of the orchestra.

1884

From
Address Conn.
Date DEC 12 191
Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Concert of Season Tomorrow.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given at the Parsons Theater tomorrow evening. The program is one of extraordinary interest comprising Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E-Minor, Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," MacDowell's Concerto in D-Minor for piano and orchestra and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The soloist will be the brilliant American pianist, Laeta Hartley.

The Symphony in E-Minor is the last of the works of that character which Brahms gave to the world and it has been the last to win its way into the favor of the public. None of Brahms's Symphonies was received directly into public favor although the second in D-Major did not linger long in the background. It is, however, an axiom in art, whether that art be music, painting, sculpture or literature, that a work which reveals its whole soul at the first reading, seeing or hearing, is not likely to last. The beauties of Brahms's music unfolded themselves gradually as the ears of musicians and music lovers became attuned to his methods. Today the Fourth Symphony is universally acknowledged as one of the immortal masterpieces of symphonic literature and its slow movement is reckoned quite the most beautiful thing of its kind Brahms gave to the world.

The soloist, Laeta Hartley, is a young American who has been playing with much success last year and this with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is only proper that she should play the fine Concerto by America's greatest composer. The work is too little heard.

The unfortunate Smetana could not have bequeathed to his native country a nobler legacy than the series of symphonic poems he wrote to celebrate her greatness. "Vysehrad," named for the medieval fortress of the Bohemian Kings, is one of the finest of the set. It is eloquent, even grandiloquent and is thoroughly national. Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" after a poem by Goethe, has been heard in Hartford before. It is truly humorous music, brilliant, witty and effective. At the same time, its technical difficulties are very great and its writing enables the Boston Symphony Orchestra to display at best its manifold excellencies.

The program in its proper order is as follows.—

Symphony in E-Minor, No. 4 .... Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" .... Smetana
Concerto in D-Minor for Piano and Orchestra .... MacDowell
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" .... Dukas
Soloist—Miss Laeta Hartley.

Reserved seats at Gallup & Alfred's Music Store.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date DEC 22 1915

Melba With Boston Symphony.

An error was made in the notice of the third Boston Symphony Concert, which comes January 3, in the announcement that Ernest Schelling would be the soloist. Mr. Schelling will be soloist at the February concert, but as announced at the beginning of the season the soloist at the January concert, a week from next Monday, will be Madame Melba. This will be Madame Melba's last appearance in Philadelphia this season.

From TIMES
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date DEC 7 - 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The three annual visits of the Boston Symphony orchestra have become the most eagerly anticipated events in our entertainment season. The second of these will take place at Parsons's theater next Monday evening. Both program and soloist are entirely new to Hartford audiences. This in itself will add to the attractiveness of the evening, for only on these occasions can we become acquainted with the great orchestral creations of modern composers and there is much interest in new performers, especially where there is reason to expect something unusual. In Miss Hartley, the brilliant young American pianist, is combined rare excellence as a pianist and a captivating personality. Brahms, MacDowell, Smetana and Paul Kulas contribute to a program which, for interest and brilliancy, never has been excelled by any offered here by the Boston players. Reserved seats are now on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store.

From POST
Address Hartford, Conn.
Date 4 - 1915

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS BRUCKNER 7TH SYMPHONY

Kreisler Plays Beethoven Violin Concerto With Orchestra—Caruso Sings Well in "Pagliacci"

(Special to The Hartford Post)

New York, Dec. 4.—Dr. Muck made an unusual program for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which was given Thursday evening in Carnegie hall. It comprised only two numbers; Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's concerto for violin, played by Fritz Kreisler. The symphony is long, lasting just over an hour. The audience listened with patience to this work of vast dimensions in length, breadth and thickness, encouraged, no doubt, by the thought of what was to follow it.

Dr. Muck played it here eight years ago, in his first term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. He is a prophet of Bruckner, who has made extensive propaganda for his symphonies in Europe as well as in this country. So have many others of the most distinguished of modern conductors; and this fact should discourage hasty depreciation of Bruckner's works. Yet they have not hastily been depreciated here, though they have tried the endurance of the public for nearly a generation. When the Seventh Symphony was first played in New York some 28 years ago, it was considered excessively complicated, full of unintelligible counterpoint, forced harmonies, abstruse elaboration. The 15 brass instruments used in it excited wonder and consternation. Its composer was regarded as bewilderingly "modern," with Wagnerian tendencies.

His music now seems intelligible enough; it does not persistently ape the Wagnerian idiom, and what he is trying to convey is easy to understand. The trouble with Bruckner does not lie in that direction. It is evident that he was a creative force of undoubted power; but that he had little control, through self-criticism of his work in symphonic development. Such development he had not mastered; and he had little feeling for the significance or the apt proportions of the symphonic form. The movements of this symphony seem like an elaborate series of genial experiments carried to wearisome lengths, with no certain foresight of the end and no inevitable progress toward that end. There are pages of grandiose and imposing power; passages that are as the large utterance of the early gods, poignant and searching, truly and finely felt.

The opening passages of the first movement, and much in it that follows; have impressiveness; but there are here, as through the whole work tiresome repetitions, dry and uninteresting details; and the end is a re-

---

it paraphrase the final scene of "Das Rheingold." The slow movement, interminably and extravagantly prolonged though it is, has true nobility and in its finest moments a deep solemnity. If the succulent portions of the Scherzo could be isolated from much husk, they would be enjoyed. The last movement is the weakest, inept in its material and dry in its pretentious learnedness.

This strangely compounded work was heard with more apparent interest than at any previous performance of it here. The performance was superb, devoted on the part of both conductor and players, though some may have question whether the scherzo might not have gained by a livelier tempo. There was much applause after the slow movement and at the end Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and, as he so often does, made his men rise to share the applause with him.

Mr. Kreisler was most enthusiastically welcomed. He played Beethoven's concerto with the profound appreciation of its poetical beauties that has so often marked his performances of it before. It was the erformance of a great artist who [illegible] into the spirit of Beeth- [illegible] truly recreates

---

TIMES
Hartford, Conn.
DEC 14 1915

DR. MUCK WAS HERE IN SPIRIT.

Famous Conductor Otherwise Absent From Symphony Orchestra Concert

ORGANIZATION PLAYS SPLENDIDLY

And a Few Hardy Ones Brave the Storm to Hear It.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert for the season in Parsons's theater last evening. Dr. Muck, the distinguished conductor of the orchestra, being ill and unable to be present, his place was filled by Mr. Schmidt, the assistant conductor of the organization. The soloist of the evening was Miss Laeta Hartley, pianiste.

The program was as follows:

Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98.
 I. Allegro non troppo.
 II. Andante moderato.
 III. Allegro giocoso.
 IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Smetana—"Vysehrad," Symphonic Poem, No. 1 of the Cycle, "Ma Vlast" ("My Country").
MacDowell—Concerto for Pianforte, No. 2, D minor, Op. 23.
 I. Larghetto calmato.
 II. Presto giocoso.
 III. Largo; Molto allegro.
Dukas—"L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice") (after a Ballad by Goethe).

The audience, though small in numbers owing to the extreme weather conditions, was unusually appreciative and responsive.

So thoroughly studied and prepared are all the program undertakings of the Boston Symphony orchestra that it is not difficult to imagine the band playing superbly with no conductor at all, if occasion demanded. Skill and efficiency, musicianship and artistry (the former word by no means comprehends the latter) in rehearsal routine comprise nine-tenths of the elements in the art of any conductor. The other tenth is the power to crystalize and focus in public performance all that has gone before.

Now Dr. Muck is among the greatest of conductors in the concert sense of the word; but he is even more distinguished as a rehearsal laboratory expert. It is in the rehearsals of the Boston orchestra that the incomparable art of the organization is compounded. And while Dr. Muck's absence last evening was every way to be regretted, it is nevertheless true that the very genius of his work was clearly to be discerned throughout the performance. All the familiar indications of thoroughgoing and artistic preparation associated with his regime in the leadership of the orchestra were in evidence.

It is true that the Brahms Symphony suffered appreciably from Dr.

Dr. Muck has no living equal as an interpreter of Brahms. And the E minor Symphony played last evening needed Dr. Muck's vitalizing personality and wide horizon of perpective. But in this symphony and, indeed, throughout the program Mr. Schmidt filled his difficult position with distinction, poise and authority.

The symphony in E minor is the fourth and last of the Brahms symphonies. It has not yet grown, and probably never will grow, nito the public favor enjoyed by its predecessors. Its substance is weighty, its message profound. But in most respects the work as a whole and the last movement in particular represents Brahms at the summit of his creative vision, a summit reached before him by Beethoven alone, and after him by no one.

Mr. Schmidt and the orchestra gave the work a noble rendition. The intricate thematic windings of the last movement untwined themselves like strands of spun gold. But little hint of the significance and splendor of this Brahms tone poetry is to be conveyed in words. The thoughts of the E minor symphony are grave, austerely beautiful thoughts; or they are shining sailed fancies that lightly drigt in seas of summer sky; or they tremble with the mysteries of life and death and spirit. At the open gates of this Brahms thought world stood the Boston Symphony orchestra, last evening, with beckoning hands.

The Smetana and Dukas works as presented on this program were gorgeous processions of color, rhythmic vitality, and life, and riotous virtuosity. Their outlines were set forth with blazing tonal suggestiveness.

Miss Hartley acquitted herself very creditably with the MacDowell concerto. This concerto is not an important work as masterpieces go. It is often shallow and showy; its harmonies weak or monotonous; its melodies too sweetish; its rhythmic construction too various and casual; its ingredients too Grieg-ish mannered and generally unworthy MacDowell at his best. But the work is pianistic and therefore attractive to pianists, especially to lady pianists and to—some other pianists. Miss Hartley played the concerto with verve and apparent conviction. There were occasional and momentary strained relations between the solo and the accompaniment. Miss Hartley is obviously a pianist of parts and promise. Among other characteristics much in her favor is a very unusual sense [illegible] relation of gesture to the [illegible] of tone and musical

---

DEC 14 191

ON SYMPHONY JDIENCE IS SLIM

Storm Keeps Many From Second Concert of Orchestra.

MISS HARTLEY PLAYS M'DOWELL CONCERTO.

Four numbers, two of surpassing interest intellectually, and two attractive for their melody and descriptive value, formed the program played at the Parsons Theater last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared in this city for the second time this season. The attendance, although the house was practically sold out, at the very best would be termed scattering, there being not more than quarter of the seats filled. But, at that, a surprising number of people placed music above the terrors of the storm, and even disregarded the almost certain fate of having to walk to and from the theater because of stalled automobiles

It is hardly of use to attempt any criticism of the playing of the Philharmonic. In their thiry-fifth season, the combination under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, has approached more nearly to perfection than any symphony orchestra in this country. Its performances are the result of long rehearsals by trained musicians, directed by one of the most gifted musical minds of the age. Any seeming faults must be laid rather to the not-carefully-enough-trained ear of the author than to any defect in the interpretations.

To the majority of the audience, of course, the MacDowell number, in which the pianoforte scoring was played by Miss Laeta Hartley, was most interesting. MacDowell, although an American composer, received his early training and did his early work in Germany, and the Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2 D minor, Opus 23, composed in Weisbaden about 1887, has all the distinguishing marks of the German influence and very little of the lyric quality which distinguished his later work in this country. Intellectual throughout the three movements, it presents a study of careful working out in three parts of a number of themes. Miss Hartley, the soloist, brought to the piano a virility and strength of action too seldom found in a woman artist. Her technic leaves little to be desired and her interpretation of the stirring themes was ably seconded by the orchestra. At the conclusion of the number she was called out again and again, before the audience ceased to applaud.

The first number, the Brahm symphony in E minor, No. 4, Opus 48, showed at its best the capabality of the famed orchestra. The first productions of the symphony proved disappointing both to Brahms and to his friends. The production last evening while brilliant and striking, showed the [illegible] written by Smetana, and one of a suite to describe in music his beloved land of the Czechs, well illustrates the erratic genius of the composer, who ended a life of sixty years in the madhouse at Prague. The music typifies the splendor of the ancient fortress of Vysehrad, in a district of Prague, its noble knights, beautiful ladies, jubilant trumpets—all of its ancient and half-legendary glory. Then powerful chords of wind instruments in chromatic descent, with strings darkly tremulous portray the fall of the dynasty and the desolation of the ancient stronghold. In the last of the lamentations, is heard as a half forgotten song, an exceedingly difficult part for the harps.

---

The last number of the program, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," an orchestral scherzo by Paul Durkas, is descriptive of an ancient legend of magic. It is mysterious, wierd and striking. An ancient magician, with a habit of animating brooms, to sweep the house, pails to draw water and other household utensils to perform useful work without human agency, has an apprentice who learns the magic method of beginning the tasks. He starts a pail drawing water and discovers that he cannot stop it. He seizes an axe and cuts the pail in two—each part then brings water. Anxiety and despair are halted by the arrival of the master magician who ends the nightmare.

There is a long and mysterious introduction introduced with long held harmonics of violas and 'cellos and peculiar effects of flutes. The second theme, more important than the first, is given to wood wind instruments, beginning with the clarinet. These two themes are repeated. The second theme is aken up by a muted trumpet and coninued by flute and harp. Then the econd and chief theme, the "flood music" appears in a changed form, played y three bassoons. The harps throughut the scoring here develop a cascade f splashing melody. The scherzo is eveloped, there is a translation into usic of the apprentice's anxiety and t the last the master appears, heralded y blasts of brass instruments, and ith three great chords the chaos is duced to silence.

The last concert in this city for the ason will be played on March 27. e soloist will be Anton Witek, the ncert master of the orchestra.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible] Conn.
Date DEC 12 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Concert of Season Tomorrow.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be given at the Parsons Theater tomorrow evening. The program is one of extraordinary interest comprising Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E-Minor, Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," MacDowell's Concerto in D-Minor for piano and orchestra and Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The soloist will be the brilliant American pianist, Laeta Hartley.

The Symphony in E-Minor is the last of the works of that character which Brahms gave to the world and it has been the last to win its way into the favor of the public. None of Brahms's Symphonies was received directly into public favor although the second in D-Major did not linger long in the background. It is, however, an axiom in art, whether that art be music, painting, sculpture or literature, that a work which reveals its whole soul at the first reading, seeing or hearing, is not likely to last. The beauties of Brahms's music unfolded themselves gradually as the ears of musicians and music lovers became attuned to his methods. Today the Fourth Symphony is universally acknowledged as one of the immortal masterpieces of symphonic literature and its slow movement is reckoned quite the most beautiful thing of its kind Brahms gave to the world.

The soloist, Laeta Hartley, is a young American who has been playing with much success last year and this with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is only proper that she should play the fine Concerto by America's greatest composer. The work is too little heard.

The unfortunate Smetana could not have bequeathed to his native country a nobler legacy than the series of symphonic poems he wrote to celebrate her greatness. "Vysehrad," named for the medieval fortress of the Bohemian Kings, is one of the finest of the set. It is eloquent, even grandiloquent and is thoroughly national. Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" after a poem by Goethe, has been heard in Hartford before. It is truly humorous music, brilliant, witty and effective. At the same time, its technical difficulties are very great and its writing enables the Boston Symphony Orchestra to display at best its manifold excellencies.

The program in its proper order is as follows.—

Symphony in E-Minor, No. 4 .... Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" .... Smetana
Concerto in D-Minor for Piano and Orchestra .... MacDowell
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" .... Dukas
Soloist—Miss Laeta Hartley.

Reserved seats at Gallup & Alfred's Music Store.

[70]

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:
DECEMBER 21,

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

CONCERT IN THE AUDITORIUM

A CONCERTO FOR ORGAN

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony and a Lalo Suite Features of a Fine Program Superbly Played

It was a great pleasure to hear the Boston symphony orchestra again in the Auditorium last evening after the intermission of a season, but it is to be feared that the managers will not be encouraged to go on with the experiment. The audience was large, or for most occasions it would appear large, but for a concert by America's foremost orchestra it was not adequate. There should have been no empty seats at all, and Springfield is quite capable of supporting the concerts on that scale. To be sure, allowance must be made for the proximity of the holidays, but the orchestra must be taken when it can be had, and everything else should give place to that. Hartford got the start of Springfield in this matter by forming a local organization which took charge of the concerts and made sure of the attendance. In some way or other, the Springfield public must be got together for the more effective support of a few first-rate concerts each season; the second-rate will take care of itself.

But if numerically the audience was not quite adequate, in appreciation it left nothing to be desired. It appreciated, for example, the readiness with which Dr Muck agreed to an alteration of the program at the request of a number of music lovers. The original plan had been to play the eighth symphony by Beethoven and the suite by Bizet, "L'Arlesienne." The latter happens to have been played here more frequently than almost any other modern work, and while the symphony was not open to the same objection, there was a general demand for a modern symphonic work. In place of these, therefore, the orchestra played the fifth symphony by Tschaikowsky to open the program, and for a closing number the brilliant suite by Lalo, "Namouna," which had never been given here before. The intervening work for orchestra and organ, the concerto in F major by Rheinberger, was also put on to gratify the natural desire to hear the fine new municipal organ in a concerted work.

Changes of program to meet local conditions are often reasonable, and willingness to make them deserves proper appreciation. The result is not always satisfactory, and it cannot be that last evening it was wholly ideal, although it was a fine concert, and given with the perfection and brilliance which are a matter of course with this wonderful orchestra. In the program as it stood there was just a little lack of substance. Tschaikowsky is a very great master, but he wears his heart on his sleeve. Rheinberger is a composer of learning and talent, but his muse is slightly academic. The Lalo suite is extremely effective, but it is not there that one will look for substance lacking elsewhere. While the program, therefore, was delightful, it did not quite meet the special need of a music-loving public which must make one concert go a long way, and which needs to have everything packed into one short evening—the very best of the old and familiar, and the most significant and challenging of the new and revolutionary.

When so many great men have composed great works, it is remarkable how few have won the suffrage of the general public. Theodore Thomas, a master of program making for the general, found that Beethoven was accepted, and Wagner after Beethoven, but that a substitute was difficult till the star of Tschaikowsky rose.

For the immense popularity of the Russian composer it is hardly necessary to account; his emotional appeal is instant and overwhelming. Too instant and too overwhelming, perhaps, to augur well for his future—the works that last are usually less direct and less tyrannous in their appeal. To many the "Pathetic" symphony has become almost intolerable, though they feel its greatness as fully as ever. The fifth symphony in E minor, played last evening, is not so great a work but it perhaps endures more frequent hearings for the very reason that it is less intense; the emotional chords will not bear unlimited strain.

Even in the best work of Tschaikowsky there is a curious unevenness; a good deal of rubbish is swept in with the jewels. Sometimes he uses triviality to point his pessimism; jingle and glitter go to emphasize the somber moral that all is vanity. Themes of frivolous and almost trashy character will stand side by side with those great elemental motives in which he is unsurpassed, and which once heard give the impression that they must always have existed—a mark of very great genius. The symphony grows steadily in strength; the first movement is the least satisfactory, and the finale the strongest, though perhaps the favorite movement is the andante cantabile with its beautiful air sung first by the horns and then by the violoncelli. The symphony was played well, but not with special fervor; the Beethoven work originally proposed would have had a more sympathetic reading.

In some ways the most satisfactory part of the program was the Rheinberger concer- [illegible] which was finely played by the orches- [illegible] organist, J. P. Marshal. It is [illegible] the greatest organists and organ composers of the 19th century, and it gave a rare chance to see how effectively the organ, an instrument with a highly individual quality of its own, can both take and lend beauty by co-operation with the orchestra. The great defect of the organ is a lack of incisiveness and of variety; no matter how its voice may be altered by registration it remains an organ. But in its smooth, full solidity there is a noble character which makes it rightfully the king of instruments, and when its special genius is respected it and the orchestra can collaborate on equal terms. The concerto is scored for organ, three horns, and strings, and is in three movements, each of fine quality. Its suave and dignified harmony yielded some delightful effects, specially at the close of the beautiful andante.

The Lalo suite with which the concert closed was an extremely effective and pleasing novelty, and the more welcome because Lalo has left, for a composer of such exceptional talent, so small an output of music. A trio was played here recently, and is a delightful work; his 'cello concerto and the Concerto Espagnol for violin are deservedly favorites. This suite "Namouna" has always had something of the ill-luck which attended the pantomime for which it was composed 33 years ago. It is not great music, but it is brilliant, original and striking, and it brought the program to an effective close.

SPRINGFIELD UNION:
DECEMBER 21,

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS WELL RECEIVED

Boston Musicians Add to Impression Created Here Long Ago.

DIGNIFIED PROGRAM

Well-Balanced Selections Lend Charm to Balanced Whole.

Those who paid the tribute of attendance at last night's Symphony concert were well repaid. The coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Springfield has always been a red-letter event here; and last night's fine and well-considered program at the Auditorium, while of sufficient worth to have taxed to the limit the seating capacity of the building, well upheld its own exalted traditions. The program, changed to a group or more unusual compositions in order that it might please and attract a greater number of people, consisted of three announced parts—first the Russian, then German, and then the French schools, and was therefore quite neutral as to character. The American colors, displayed so very effectively on the Auditorium stage yesterday, might well have been left there—Dr. Muck and his men would have loked well against such substantial and patriotic background—and would have given the scene a more festal appearance in better keeping with the Christmas spirit than was possible with all those solemn, black-garbed visitors present. It would also have quite properly symbolized their literal "backing" while in vigorous and periodic pursuit of the extremely desirable American dollar.

The Tschaikowsky "Fifth" symphony as played by this band was undeniably beautiful throughout, and justifies its recent revival as a concert piece. Of course it is permeated with the tempestous thought of a mind much disturbed by perplexing conditions—this according to his biographer. The andante movement, filled with galloping recurrences of the somber and wailing theme, gave little promise of the wealth of color in succeeding paragraphs. In the picturesque second movement the horns, with their syncopated following of oboe and clarinet, resembled nothing so much as a portrayal of the bleak steppes of his native Votkinsk, across which wild Cossack raiders occasionally rushed; succeeded by a strong passage of wonderfully majestic swing and sonorousness for extremely vivid contrast. The last movement was truly Slavic in all its characteristics—the chorale-like opening naturally—enough followed by emergence into light, of a mind glad to be free and leaving its cerements behind. A great deal of feeling—a most striking musical picture of mental anguish—seems to have been condensed in this truly fascinating masterpiece; and one cannot be too grateful for the inclusion of such an enjoyable work on our local program.

After intermission came Rheinberger, with his very churchly concerto for organ, three horns and the string section of the orchestra, a colorful and more rhythmic composition and less ambitious composition. But in this Mr. Marshall at the organ had little opportunity to shine. The prelude to the Lalo suite was firey and prophetic. When it came to the "serenade," behold! It proved to be by Mr. Maquarre with the same magic flute which accompanied Melba in her recent memorable aria here, and it was a sufficiently enchanting theme, in wierd minor, to be played under the window of any women either more real or more mythical than "Namouna." The theme with variations [illegible] grand crash of florid "market day shows" and the "festival" was at once rural and delightful.

Dr. Muck's conducting can be said to be as technically perfect as it is individual. As previously noted, he is free from mannerisms, and conducts with a quiet and masterful dignity that is as convincing of his power as of his earnestness. Those who watch for the best in orchestral readings may well look forward to any return of such a leader, who keeps his splendid forces in such superb disciplinary control. No composition—much less a Tschaikowsky number like that of last night—could be either commonplace or hackneyed under such a baton. Whatever the orchestra plays is instantly infused with life, and moves logically on to the end which seems to be its natural one. The same studious care in reading these elaborate scores and the apparently complete effacement of self is Dr. Muck's most marked characteristic, and this is not true of some famous conductors. One feels that no better interpretation of a piece could be given than one at his hands as soon as its last note has been sounded, and that is a pretty good test of supremacy in leadership.

It seems a pity that this city is not able as yet to pay the prices which would bring one if this season's symphony soloists here with the orchestra, but that is doubtless too much to expect at first. More variety, and perhaps attractive enough to make possible a more positive advance sale of tickets, if Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Harold Bauer, Ruth Deyo or Ernest Schelling—all of whom are this year's list of symphony soloists—could be heard here, or even one of their Cambridge concerto solo performers, Gabrilowitsch, John Powell or Alice Eldridge. Failure to secure any of these through prohibitive cost might have resulted in a splendid solo from either Concert Meister Witek or the modest maestro sitting last night in the front seat of the 'cello choir, Mr. Warnke, who has won no inconsiderable laurels as a master of his instrument.

ERNEST NEWTON BAGG.

BOSTON GLOBE—
JANUARY 1,

SCHELLING FANTASIA PLAYED FIRST TIME

Has Original Ideas With Varied Treatment.

Known and Unknown Men Subjects of Characterization.

In his "Impressions From an Artists' Life" for orchestra and piano, played at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon for the first time anywhere, Ernest Schelling has written music in which he has said he heard the virtuosi and the ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is music to tempt and to reveal the virtuosity of the organization, of the justly celebrated leaders of their various choirs and of the entire body of instrumentalists, for it is kaleidoscopic and incessant in variety.

There are vital and glowing ideas; the treatment is daring and original. There are personal mannerisms of idiom such as the tenacious development of a rhythmical figure, but there is arresting and inspiriting music for its own sake; there is graphic characterization, in some instances apparent to all, doubtless the more stimulating were the personal subjects known, and in such a timely movement as that evidently portraying the tramp of marching men and the pall and terror of carnage there are the clear signs of true inspiration.

Mr Schelling is known as an eminent pianist in his own name, as a pupil of Paderewski, as a member of the musical colony near Lausanne, Switzerland. He is American born, a native of New Jersey. A brother holds a chair in the University of Pennsylvania.

In this fantasia Mr Schelling is strikingly cosmopolitan. He writes out of many epochs and moods. He is archaic and modern, although not aggressively so; he is pastoral and militant; he is Spanish, Slavic, Oriental. There is a rhythmic suggestion of the South, of a sensuous people; there is much allusion to the dance; there is the suggestion of the North and of repression. The final movement is based upon a Lutheran choral, which finishes in an ardor, perhaps more Latin than Saxon.

The fantasia opens with a free rhapsodie passage for piano, its nearest approach to a solo instrument, leading to a theme given out in unison by violins and violas, embellished by the piano. Following are 19 variations. Mr Schelling has escaped the odium attending the usual writer in this form, the man who with diabolic ingenuity, as some practioner in magic, works now this and now that trick before the bystander's eyes.

These "variations" are in the nature of paraphrases, calling forth the orchestra or some of its soloists in impressionistic portraits of the composer's friends, for on the program each is followed by initials. It is not hard to guess the probable identity of I. J. P. This variation, No. 9, "Polska," for strings alone, was one of four of the 19 omitted yesterday. The horn solo with piano was also omitted and two for full orchestra. One evidently was dedicated to Ireland. In Mr Paderewski's "polska" a tribute to Poland was to have been expected.

A striking movement, by reason of its graphic characterization, is that in memory of Gustav Mahler. An illuminating portrait of the tireless dynamic force of the man, always aspiring, always achieving, nervous and impatient in expression, breaking itself at last in a herculean climax of the struggle. Those who knew Mahler intimately found other more human and less titian qualities in him, but these variations are impressionistic sketches, and here are the salient characteristics as the world [illegible]

Mr Schelling displays in this diversified score, an ingenious and imaginative sense of rhythm, a harmonic appreciation which gives accompanying chords or figuration appropriate and interpretative color, and above all a gift of beautiful, moving melody. Recall the air which owes much to Mr Longy's consummate art, but is well graced in itself, or that given to Mr Ferier. Mr Witek and Mr Sand also were remembered, although the composer, as pianist, evidently wished to cover up the latter.

The pianoforte cadenza, unless the introductory measures be such, was found missing. Did Mr Schelling write one, but modestly refrain from playing it at this the first performance when he himself was the pianist? The part may not appeal to the casual virtuoso, for it lacks opportunity for display. Indeed the piano, with little that is thematic or the music of development, here is chiefly decorative. Mr Schelling showed his sincerity by refraining from a rhapsodical or improvisational flight in the midst of a number in which he had asked a friend or acquaintance to sit for a portrait to the orchestra.

It may be thought by some the work has needlessly boisterous moments. It is true that the smaller pulsatile instruments at times are inexorable in marking a rhythmic figure. As a rule the score abounds in rather than knows the lack of variety. The little opportunity of the pianist whetted a desire to hear him in a concerto. Dr Muck conducted and the men played with inspirational zeal.

Brahms' second symphony received a dramatic and Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes a highly colorful performance. The orchestra will be absent on its Southern tour next week.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
JANUARY 1,

SCHELLING MAKES DOUBLE TRIUMPH

Appears as Composer and Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Ernest Schelling, the American composer and pianist, made his appearance at the Symphony concert yesterday as soloist, taking part in the first public performance of his new work, "Impressions (from an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme." The work is scored for piano and orchestra.

Both the new work and the composer were favorably received by the usual large audience. Several of the impressions mark Mr. Schelling's recollections of previous appearances with the Symphony Orchestra, and this interesting fact is so noted in the program. For instance: "Variation L. is for woodwind alone. When I wrote it I heard but one timber in my ear, that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; therefore B. S. O."

This number was warmly applauded. So, too, was the performance of the third Brahms symphony, which opened the concert. Dr. Muck yesterday conducted this work for the first time in Boston.

The final number on the program, which, as usual, will be given again tonight, is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

There will be no concerts next week. The following week, when the orchestra has returned from its Southern tour, it will give the first performance in Boston of Edgar Stillman Kelly's "New England Symphony." Mme. Mebla will sing arias by Handel and Mozart. The remainder of the program has not yet been made up.

BOSTON HERALD,
JANUARY 1,

10TH SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SEASON GIVEN

Mr. Schelling Plays 21 Variations of Theme, His Inspiration Drawn from Many Sources.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Schelling, Impressions (from an Artist's Life), in Form of Variations on an Original Theme, for orchestra and piano (first performance); Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes. Mr. Schelling was the pianist.

Mr. Schelling is not one of those who say confidently that the day of variations is long past. Twenty-one variations on his original theme were played yesterday, and we suspect him of having more in manuscript, for evidently the task was a congenial one, and his invention is fertile. Tschaikowsky wrote a set of variations for a chamber work to portray certain habits and the general character of Nicholas Rubin-

[illegible] -thinking [illegible] opinions [illegible] nature, amusement [illegible] of Johannes Brahms in a [illegible] of orchestral variations. We are also familiar in Boston with orchestral variations by Elgar in which he painted musically some of his friends and acquaintances.

The variations of Mr. Schelling were written during the last two years with the sound of the Boston Symphony orchestra in his ears, the timbre of the strings, the timbre of the wood-wind, and with the thought of its conductor and certain virtuosos in the band. But other persons, certain events, certain places kindled his fancy. The variations he has annotated briefly. Some of the persons identified by initials are Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy, Mme. Pavlowa, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler. There are variations in memory of Mahler and Pfitzner. A lagoon in North Carolina suggested one, a view of the Wartburg in 1915 another.

The theme, suggested by the Boston Symphony orchestra, as is the first variation, is in the unusual key of G sharp minor. The choice by some, especially violinists, who are obliged to play in this key, might be thought fantastical. The variations are even more fantastical. As a whole, here is a virtuoso piece intended to display the brilliance of the orchestra and the skill of certain individual players. The French in the slang of studio would say that this music is "amusing," but there are sombre pages and there are pages of great beauty in a simple form as the oboe solo, the viola solo, "Polska," with the thought of Mr. Paderewski, and the charming "Lagoon." The most impressive variation is the one marked "August, 1914." It pictures the rush of the German army through Belgium, the despair and agony of the outraged country. And at the end of this singularly powerful page the plain song of the "Dies Irae" is introduced in a striking manner. So too, the final variation, with the Lutheran Choral, rises above the merely fantastical. As a purely humorous variation the one entitled "Erin," is ingenious. Let us hope that no "patriot" may class it in his condemnation with Synge's "Playboy of the Western World."

A composer that in these days writes 21 orchestral variations gives hostages to fortune. No matter how great his technical skill, how cunning his invention, his work will seem, on the surface at least, episodic, scrappy. The average hearer will be little interested in the transformations of the theme; his attention will be directed to rhythms, melodic figures, effects of color, purely sensuous impressions. Furthermore the variation-maker, the more earnest his purpose, runs the risk of wearying the hearer, especially if the latter listens by rule of thumb, misses count in the numbering, and then flounders in perplexity.

Mr. Schelling, however, has shown genuine fancy, with a touch here and there of fantastical that is not displeasing in its wildness; he has also shown in several variations poetic imagination and a sense of the dramatic, as in "August, 1914." We have spoken of variations of pure beauty. It would be an agreeable task to dwell on certain musical harmonic effects, on the delightful extravagance of "Erin," on the composer's peculiar instrumentation. If the variations in memory of Pfitzner and of Mahler seemed less successful than others, it is perhaps because we know too little of the music by these composers.

The performance was an orchestral triumph. Nor should praise be given alone to Messrs. Longy, Ferir, Sand and other players of solos, charming as their playing was; the whole orchestra covered itself with glory.

Dr. Muck gave a remarkable reading of Brahms's symphony. He brought out a bitterness, a sullen despair, not wholly lost in the final pages of resignation, acceptance of Fate that have passed unnoticed in former performances. While there was an expression, when necessary, of the tenderness that is akin to melancholy, the reading on the whole was more masculine and more defiant than those to which we have been accustomed. Rimsky-Korsaoff's Caprice is dimmed by the gorgeous coloring of Chabrier, Debussy and Ravel remembering Spain.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of those on Jan. 14 and 15 will be as follows: Kelly, New England Symphony (first time here); a Suite or Gluck's dance music; Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon." Mme. Melba will sing Handel's "Sweet Bird" and two airs from "Le Nozzi di Figaro."

BOSTON POST,
JANUARY 1

SCHELLING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Composer-Soloist Performs Own Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Third Symphony, Brahms; Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra, Ernest Schelling (first time); "Span- [illegible] Caprice," Rim [illegible] composer as well as pianist, was the soloist.

BRAHM'S GREAT WORK

The feature of this concert was the superb reading of Brahms' symphony. The third symphony may lack a measure of the epic greatness of the first; it may be urged that the two middle movements have a less symphonic character than the two parallel movements in Brahms' second symphony, and some may find the strange, haunting melancholy of the third movement merely doleful, dulll and monochromatic in coloring. It is not easy to agree with these conclusions of the anti-Brahmsites. The first movement of the third symphony is superbly dramatic, and the hurtling together of the theme which opens the symphony and the real first theme of the first movement is one of the most imposing ideas found in the symphonic music of Brahms.

The three last movements contain much that is finest in the style of the later Brahms. They are contemplative, and in the case of the third movement, deeply melancholy, yet there is a nobility of mood as well as theme, a noble resignation and acceptance of the riddle of life and its end that sound noble by the side of the energy and the dramatic granduer of the movements which commence and conclude the symphony.

Interpreted in a great spirit by Dr. Muck, this work towered so high that in retrospect it overshadows everything else on the programme.

Schelling's Artistry

To this Mr. Schelling would undoubtedly retort, "But I had no idea of disputing the greatness of Brahms!" So much was evident in the pianist's modest demeanor. Mr. Schelling played with magnificent virtuosity and with the authority of a creative artist. His composition, which lacks originality or any very impressive workmanship, has some immediately effective qualities, and there are certain pages that stand out in the memory, as the variations in which a figure, starting in the lowest registers of the strings, mounts gradually and irresistibly through the upper registers of the stringed instrument, to the steady roll of a small drum, accompanied at times by wild fanfares of the brass, and finally by the proclamation of the plain chant, the "Dies Irae." A striking effect! It might be the assembly that gathered on the banks of the sea, in an odd tale by Quiller-Couch, when the ghosts of drowned warriors came up from the deep, answering summons to judgment, and each man made his confession and returned to the grave. The variation headed "Lagoon" is simply and suggestively written. There is the suggestion of rippling waves and the soughing of night winds. The 4th and 5th variations are effective. Some variations have references intelligible to Bostonians, as the variation headed, 'B. S. O."; the variation, "K. M."; the variation, "G. L." "K. M.", it may here be remarked, conducted this work, as well as the composition of Brahms, with the most scrupulous care for the intention of the composer.

The "B. S. O." displayed its virtuosity collectively and individually, as when "G. L." played a solo which appeared to us uninteresting in itself and ill-suited to his instrument, and, of course, made the most of it, and he was not the only member of the remarkable woodwind section to distinguish himself. There were some members of the orchestra unremembered by Mr. Schelling, who could not be expected to write a solo for every player in the "B. S. O." But the violin playing of "A. W.," for instance, as well as the viola playing of "E. F.," deserve also very special mention.

The composer, at the piano, listened whenever the exigencies of performance permitted, as attentively as any in the hall. The performance was a triumph. The work was received with manifest approval and enthusiasm by a large section of the audience. But if the truth must be told, side by side with passages effectively orchestrated are others, so poor in material, so superficial in treatment and workmanship as to be scarcely worthy of a place on a serious symphony programme.

ART IN ARIATIONS

Y HALL—Tenth program of ymphony orchestra, Karl Muck, or; afternoon of Dec. 31. The pro- : Brahms, third symphony in F ma- ; Ernest Schelling, "Artist's Life," variations for piano and orchestra (first performance, the composer assisting as pianist); Rimsky-Korsakoff, caprice on Spanish themes, op. 34.

Variation, whether it is the Bach kind, which makes the composer concentrate on a single piece of melody of neutral emotion; whether it is the Beethoven kind, which bids him set off a melody of didactic sentiment, say, against one of romantic; or whether it is the Liszt kind, which lets him shape and color a given melody or group of melodies to suit the shifts of scene and feeling in a story, comes right down to one thing. It is an acknowledgment on the part of composers that the only way they have found for conveying idea is by singing a strain and then singing it again. Having to speak in terms of time, they have learned no other way to be sustained and consecutive but by systematically repeating themselves. The great triumphs of the second half of the nineteenth century in music which Wagner and Strauss, following where Liszt led, won, were triumphs of reiteration.

One of the most eminent pianists on the concert circuit said in The Christian Science Monitor a little more than a year ago that all music of the last three centuries is based on the variation. In his talk with his interviewer he remarked at some length on composers who from time to time have extended the scope of the variation as a structural formula. He referred to Bach with his scheme of subject, answer, countersubject, stretto and all the other devices of fugal dialogue, whereby a single melody sounding in various relations to itself can be elaborated into a large, symmetrical, intelligible and satisfying work. He spoke of Beethoven, with his sonata form, whereby the first movement of a symphony is built up from two short, contrasting themes, his method of variation being that known as development. Lastly he pointed to Liszt as the nineteenth century man to whom it was given to stand in the large room of the symphonic poem, the form which uses the most elastic variation of all, that which allows the composer to be discursive without end, namely, the transmuted theme.

Was it inevitable that music should have this history? Theorists have never opened the question. They have only laid down rules for the reiterative game. Accepting the whole body of variation doctrine handed down from the renaissance contrapuntists as the foundation of musical discipline for all time, of course they accept the variation idea itself. It would be interesting if it could be known who the experimenter with notes was who discovered that in certain cases the first phrase of a melody could be made to go pleasingly against the second. He was the one who first got the idea of imitation in music, and who started the delectable chain of events that have culminated in the thematic complexities of the "Ring" music dramas and in the instrumental sonorities of the "Alpine" symphony.

Possibly some day a composer will venture to go out around the renaissance contrapuntists to find a new starting point. And it may be that he will be able, though leaving the variation out of account altogether, to shape his expression intelligibly and to indicate his emotions poignantly. Suppose he should take as severe a formula as a Greek dramatic chorus. With strophes and antistrophes in equally balanced groups to build on, he would at least have a well supported and proportioned structural plan.

But the question is of Mr. Schelling's variations on an original theme, disclosing some particulars of an artist's life. All of the 21 little pieces are delightfully written. They are brisk in action, compact in form and clear in characterization. And they are not too serious. One of particularly interesting qualities as a portrait is the fourth variation, in memory of Hans Pfitzner. One showing command of an interesting small plan of orchestration is the sixth, "Flonzaley," for strings and horn. One which pleased the audience especially was the seventh for oboe solo and piano, "G. L." The composer may be said to have given the friendship of Mr. Longy, the oboist, a severe test, so continuous was his writing for the solo part. But when, at the conclusion of the duet the house broke into a moment of applause, each artist gave a gratified nod at the other.

A successful number for its racial color and rhythm was No. 10, for full orchestra, "Erin, L. S." A brilliant little example of orchestral scenic description was No. 14, for strings alone, a picture of a North Carolina lagoon. A piece of rather disturbingly realistic quality in the midst of so much that was sentimental was No. 17 A, for full orchestra, "August, 1914."

The whole program was well planned and tellingly interpreted. The stern third symphony of Brahms was relieved so completely by the Schelling and Rimsky-Korsakoff music as to lose all its hard outline. Dr. Muck presented three works that were evidently a pleasure to him and he made them all and severally a lasting pleasure to his listeners.

TRANSCRIPT,
JANUARY 1, 1916

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AGAIN MUSIC OF WIT, FANCY AND ADROIT ARTISTRY

Mr. Schelling's Amusing and Admirable Variations Before Too Sober-Minded an Audience—The Interest and the Distinctions of an Unusual Piece in Plan and Accomplishment — Rimsky-Korsakov's Fading Caprice and a Transformed Symphony of Brahms

AMUSING, adroit and fanciful music is seemingly a perilous thing to set before the audiences of the Symphony Concerts. A week ago they heard an exceptionally expert and entertaining example of it in Mr. Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," listened to it with "a certain detachment" as the French say, and applauded it politely and coolly. Yesterday they heard another piece in the same genre, equally diverting and no less artful—Mr. Schelling's Variations for Orchestra and Pianoforte—and were equally indifferent to it. True, applause once and again interrupted the progress of the music—an unusual moment at such concerts—but it was manifestly tribute to the skill that some virtuoso of the orchestra had just displayed in a solo passage or response to a transparent dance-tune, like the Spanish Habanera or the Irish Jig. At the end of the whole piece, the audience was even colder to it and to Mr. Schelling, present and participating as the pianist added to the band, and his variations, than it had been to the absent Mr. Carpenter and his suite. "Thoughtful people" and other pestilent prigs shook their heads gravely. Why should such relative frivolities as these two pieces intrude themselves into the Symphony Concerts?

They should none the less, dear brethren and sisters; they should even be invited to enter them; and once there, they should be heartily encouraged. It is as good to smile and to be entertained in the concert-room as it is to pucker the brow of thought and to feel the thrill of keen and deep emotion. It is possible to write amusing, witty and fanciful music, well-invented and well-ordered, that by its intrinsic quality is quite as deserving of the Symphony Concerts as not a few "serious" pieces that have had passing place in them. Let a relatively little-known composer, like Mr. Carpenter or Mr. Schelling, write a symphony that is no more than laborious, conscientious and "dignified" filling of a formula with routine material and well-tested effects and the "thoughtful people," especially if they happen to be his friends, will hail him as a "serious" musician doing "serious" work. Let him write a tone-poem, that may be imitation of Strauss, or imitation of Debussy or a singular mixture of both, spiced with Stravinsky, and the ardent young lions of ultra-modern music forthwith salute him as a rising man. But let him merely write an entertaining and expert piece like Mr. Carpenter's suite of the baby's airing or Mr. Schelling's string of impressions and recollections in the form of variations and straightway only the few that know that artful and amusing frivolity is twenty times more difficult and twenty times more worth while than dull-witted and toiling "seriousness" take pleasure in the music and have warm words for the composer.

Once again, dear brethren and sisters, whom the mask of seriousness (hiding barrenness beneath) so often deceives, music like Mr. Carpenter's or Mr. Schelling's pieces is many fold more difficult to write and implies far finer and more distinguished attributes in the composer than nine-tenths of the "respectable" symphonies and the "bourgeois" tone-poems that afflict the concerts of our time. To say nothing of Mr. Carpenter's suite, which the justly admiring Dr. Muck is not likely to let pass from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Schelling's twenty-one variations are more fertile of diversified and individual invention; they give freer play to imagination and artistry; they are more engaging and illusory to the hearer; they far more abound in the handling that is expert skill quickened by fancy. These symphonies and these tone-poems go and come as "dutiful" and maybe "educational" music; but "duty" and "education," in the concert-room, are tedious, if necessary, business; whereas the "light" suite of last week and the "light" variations of yesterday stir the mind, stimulate the fancy, hold interest firmly but diversely and afford many sorts of pleasure to those that love fertility and felicity, wit, skill, elegance, distinction and to be frank, frivolity. Perish the thought that our concerts should fall to stodgy British or stodgy German levels; while nearer home, New York and Chicago have already risen to Mr. Carpenter's music and are likely to do as much for Mr. Schelling's. Here in Boston we sorely need a propaganda against respectable musical mediocrity.

"Impressions (From an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte"—as Mr. Schelling's full and cumbrous title runs—begin with the usual statement of the theme in the unusual key of G-sharp minor. The violins and the viola announce it in unison; the full orchestra gradually develops it; the pianoforte embroiders it with arabesques. Like many another such musical thought that is to be fertile in variations, it does not in itself arrest the ear or impress the imagination. It is hardly more than useful material. Then ensue twenty-one variations—some for full orchestra some for solo instruments usually paired with the pianoforte and some for individual groups or separate choirs. Each variation has a sub-title, indicated by word or initials, that suggests the impression the composer would transmit or the characterization he would imply. A strict canonJthe musical form of the game of "following the leader—labelled "rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive" hardly needs the initials K. M. to suggest Mr. Schelling's view of Dr. Muck; two more variations recall the living composer, Pfitzner, with whom Mr. Schelling studied and the dead composer, Mahler, whom he much admired, and hint amusingly at one and another idiosyncrasy in their music. A variation in the manner of Polish folk tune is designed to imply Mr. Paderewski; another for viola and pianoforte, Mr Kreisler. A Spanish dance bears the initials of Miss Pavlova; a quartet for the string choir with an incidental horn serves for "The Flonzaleys"; an orchestral variation is lettered W. M., presumably the illustrious Dutch conductor, Mr. Mengelberg.

Yet others are tonal impressions of a place or occasions like that for clarinet, piping a Savoyard shephard's tune, like that labelled "August, 1914," of troops marching forth to war while the Dies Irae rumbled ominously in the tonal background; like that of the still lagoon or of the stately and square-cut chorale that Mr. Schelling heard on the Wartburg. The theme itself is inscribed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for which he destined the piece and which he says, he heard incessantly in his ears while he was composing it. Accordingly he has utilized its assembled skill and ristinctions no less than he has the individual abilities of the more eminent players. Throughout, the pianoforte is little more than an instrument added to the orchestra as an embroidering or a blending voice or yet again as the means [illegible] stein, a deep-thinking German, pictured the nature, amusements and opinions of Johannes Brahms in a set of orchestral variations. We are also familiar in Boston with orchestral variations by Elgar in which he painted musically some of his friends and acquaintances.

The variations of Mr. Schelling were written during the last two years with the sound of the Boston Symphony orchestra in his ears, the timbre of the strings, the timbre of the wood-wind, and with the thought of its conductor and certain virtuosos in the band. But other persons, certain events, certain places kindled his fancy. The variations he has annotated briefly. Some of the persons identified by initials are Dr. Muck, Mr. Longy, Mme. Pavlowa, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler. There are variations in memory of Mahler and Pfitzner. A lagoon in North Carolina sugested one, a view of the Wartburg in 1915 another.

The theme, suggested by the Boston Symphony orchestra, as is the first variation, is in the unusual key of G sharp minor. The choice by some, especially violinists, who are obliged to play in this key, might be thought fantastical. The variations are even more fantastical. As a whole, here is a virtuoso piece intended to display the brilliance of the orchestra and the skill of certain individual players. The French in the slang of studio would say that this music is "amusing," but there are sombre pages and there are pages of great beauty in a simple form as the oboe solo, the viola solo, "Polska," with the thought of Mr. Paderewski, and the charming "Lagoon." The most impressive variation is the one marked "August, 1914." It pictures the rush of the German army through Belgium, the despair and agony of the outraged country. And at the end of this singularly powerful page the plain song of the "Dies Irae" is introduced in a striking manner. So too, the final variation, with the Lutheran Choral, rises above the merely fantastical. As a purely humorous variation the one entitled "Erin," is ingenious. Let us hope that no "patriot" may class it in his condemnation with Synge's "Playboy of the Western World."

A composer that in these days writes 21 orchestral variations gives hostages to fortune. No matter how great his technical skill, how cunning his invention, his work will seem, on the surface at least, episodic, scrappy. The average hearer will be little interested in the transformations of the theme; his attention will be directed to rhythms, melodic figures, effects of color, purely sensuous impressions. Furthermore the variation-maker, the more earnest his purpose, runs the risk of wearying the hearer, especially if the latter listens by rule of thumb, misses count in the numbering, and then flounders in perplexity.

Mr. Schelling, however, has shown genuine fancy, with a touch here and there of fantastical that is not displeasing in its wildness; he has also shown in several variations poetic imagination and a sense of the dramatic, as in "August, 1914." We have spoken of variations of pure beauty. It would be an agreeable task to dwell on certain musical harmonic effects, on the delightful extravagance of "Erin," on the composer's peculiar instrumentation. If the variations in memory of Pfitzner and of Mahler seemed less successful than others, it is perhaps because we know too little of the music by these composers.

The performance was an orchestral triumph. Nor should praise be given alone to Messrs. Longy, Ferir, Sand and other players of solos, charming as their playing was; the whole orchestra covered itself with glory.

Dr. Muck gave a remarkable reading of Brahms's symphony. He brought out a bitterness, a sullen despair, not wholly lost in the final pages of resignation, acceptance of Fate that have passed unnoticed in former performances. While there was an expression, when necessary, of the tenderness that is akin to melancholy, the reading on the whole was more masculine and more defiant than those to which we have been accustomed. Rimsky-Korsaoff's Caprice is dimmed by the gorgeous coloring of Chabrier, Debussy and Ravel remembering Spain.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of those on Jan. 14 and 15 will be as follows: Kelly, New England Symphony (first time here); a Suite or Gluck's dance music; Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon." Mme. Melba will sing Handel's "Sweet Bird" and two airs from "Le Nozzi di Figaro."

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 1

SCHELLING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Composer-Soloist Performs Own Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Third Symphony, Brahms; Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra, Ernest Schelling (first time); "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Ernest Schelling, on this occasion composer as well as pianist, was the soloist.

BRAHM'S GREAT WORK

The feature of this concert was the superb reading of Brahms' symphony. The third symphony may lack a measure of the epic greatness of the first; it may be urged that the two middle movements have a less symphonic character than the two parallel movements in Brahms' second symphony, and some may find the strange, haunting melancholy of the third movement merely doleful, dulll and monochromatic in coloring. It is not easy to agree with these conclusions of the anti-Brahmsites. The first movement of the third symphony is superbly dramatic, and the hurtling together of the theme which opens the symphony and the real first theme of the first movement is one of the most imposing ideas found in the symphonic music of Brahms.

The three last movements contain much that is finest in the style of the later Brahms. They are contemplative, and in the case of the third movement, deeply melancholy, yet there is a nobility of mood as well as theme, a noble resignation and acceptance of the riddle of life and its end that sound noble by the side of the energy and the dramatic granduer of the movements which commence and conclude the symphony.

Interpreted in a great spirit by Dr. Muck, this work towered so high that in retrospect it overshadows everything else on the programme.

Schelling's Artistry

To this Mr. Schelling would undoubtedly retort, "But I had no idea of disputing the greatness of Brahms!" So much was evident in the pianist's modest demeanor. Mr. Schelling played with magnificent virtuosity and with the authority of a creative artist. His composition, which lacks originality or any very impressive workmanship, has some immediately effective qualities, and there are certain pages that stand out in the memory, as the variations in which a figure, starting in the lowest registers of the strings, mounts gradually and irresistibly through the upper registers of the stringed instrument, to the steady roll of a small drum, accompanied at times by wild fanfares of the brass, and finally by the proclamation of the plain chant, the "Dies Irae." A striking effect! It might be the assembly that gathered on the banks of the sea, in an odd tale by Quiller-Couch, when the ghosts of drowned warriors came up from the deep, answering summons to judgment, and each man made his confession and returned to the grave. The variation headed "Lagoon" is simply and suggestively written. There is the suggestion of rippling waves and the soughing of night winds. The 4th and 5th variations are effective. Some variations have references intelligible to Bostonians, as the variation headed, 'B. S. O."; the variation, "K. M."; the variation, "G. L." "K. M.", it may here be remarked, conducted this work, as well as the composition of Brahms, with the most scrupulous care for the intention of the composer.

The "B. S. O." displayed its virtuosity collectively and individually, as when "G. L." played a solo which appeared to us uninteresting in itself and ill-suited to his instrument, and, of course, made the most of it, and he was not the only member of the remarkable woodwind section to distinguish himself. There were some members of the orchestra unremembered by Mr. Schelling, who could not be expected to write a solo for every player in the "B. S. O." But the violin playing of "A. W.," for instance, as well as the viola playing of "E. F.," deserve also very special mention.

The composer, at the piano, listened whenever the exigencies of performance permitted, as attentively as any in the hall. The performance was a triumph. The work was received with manifest approval and enthusiasm by a large section of the audience. But if the truth must be told, side by side with passages effectively orchestrated are others, so poor in material, so superficial in treatment and workmanship as to be scarcely worthy of a place on a serious symphony programme.

ART IN ARIATIONS

Y HALL—Tenth program of ymphony orchestra, Karl Muck, or; afternoon of Dec. 31. The pro-: Brahms, third symphony in F ma-; Ernest Schelling, "Artist's Life," variations for piano and orchestra (first performance, the composer assisting as pianist); Rimsky-Korsakoff, caprice on Spanish themes, op. 34.

Variation, whether it is the Bach kind, which makes the composer concentrate on a single piece of melody of neutral emotion; whether it is the Beethoven kind, which bids him set off a melody of didactic sentiment, say, against one of romantic; or whether it is the Liszt kind, which lets him shape and color a given melody or group of melodies to suit the shifts of scene and feeling in a story, comes right down to one thing. It is an acknowledgment on the part of composers that the only way they have found for conveying idea is by singing a strain and then singing it again. Having to speak in terms of time, they have learned no other way to be sustained and consecutive but by systematically repeating themselves. The great triumphs of the second half of the nineteenth century in music which Wagner and Strauss, following where Liszt led, won, were triumphs of reiteration.

One of the most eminent pianists on the concert circuit said in The Christian Science Monitor a little more than a year ago that all music of the last three centuries is based on the variation. In his talk with his interviewer he remarked at some length on composers who from time to time have extended the scope of the variation as a structural formula. He referred to Bach with his scheme of subject, answer, countersubject, stretto and all the other devices of fugal dialogue, whereby a single melody sounding in various relations to itself can be elaborated into a large, symmetrical, intelligible and satisfying work. He spoke of Beethoven, with his sonata form, whereby the first movement of a symphony is built up from two short, contrasting themes, his method of variation being that known as development. Lastly he pointed to Liszt as the nineteenth century man to whom it was given to stand in the large room of the symphonic poem, the form which uses the most elastic variation of all, that which allows the composer to be discursive without end, namely, the transmuted theme.

Was it inevitable that music should have this history? Theorists have never opened the question. They have only laid down rules for the reiterative game. Accepting the whole body of variation doctrine handed down from the renaissance contrapuntists as the foundation of musical discipline for all time, of course they accept the variation idea itself. It would be interesting if it could be known who the experimenter with notes was who discovered that in certain cases the first phrase of a melody could be made to go pleasingly against the second. He was the one who first got the idea of imitation in music, and who started the delectable chain of events that have culminated in the thematic complexities of the "Ring" music dramas and in the instrumental sonorities of the "Alpine" symphony.

Possibly some day a composer will venture to go out around the renaissance contrapuntists to find a new starting point. And it may be that he will be able, though leaving the variation out of account altogether, to shape his expression intelligibly and to indicate his emotions poignantly. Suppose he should take as severe a formula as a Greek dramatic chorus. With strophes and antistrophes in equally balanced groups to build on, he would at least have a well supported and proportioned structural plan.

But the question is of Mr. Schelling's variations on an original theme, disclosing some particulars of an artist's life. All of the 21 little pieces are delightfully written. They are brisk in action, compact in form and clear in characterization. And they are not too serious. One of particularly interesting qualities as a portrait is the fourth variation, in memory of Hans Pfitzner. One showing command of an interesting small plan of orchestration is the sixth, "Flonzaley," for strings and horn. One which pleased the audience especially was the seventh for oboe solo and piano, "G. L." The composer may be said to have given the friendship of Mr. Longy, the oboist, a severe test, so continuous was his writing for the solo part. But when, at the conclusion of the duet the house broke into a moment of applause, each artist gave a gratified nod at the other.

A successful number for its racial color and rhythm was No. 10, for full orchestra, "Erin, L. S." A brilliant little example of orchestral scenic description was No. 14, for strings alone, a picture of a North Carolina lagoon. A piece of rather disturbingly realistic quality in the midst of so much that was sentimental was No. 17 A, for full orchestra, "August, 1914."

The whole program was well planned and tellingly interpreted. The stern third symphony of Brahms was relieved so completely by the Schelling and Rimsky-Korsakoff music as to lose all its hard outline. Dr. Muck presented three works that were evidently a pleasure to him and he made them all and severally a lasting pleasure to his listeners.

TRANSCRIPT,

JANUARY 1, 1916

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AGAIN MUSIC OF WIT, FANCY AND ADROIT ARTISTRY

Mr. Schelling's Amusing and Admirable Variations Before Too Sober-Minded an Audience—The Interest and the Distinctions of an Unusual Piece in Plan and Accomplishment — Rimsky-Korsakov's Fading Caprice and a Transformed Symphony of Brahms

AMUSING, adroit and fanciful music is seemingly a perilous thing to set before the audiences of the Symphony Concerts. A week ago they heard an exceptionally expert and entertaining example of it in Mr. Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," listened to it with "a certain detachment" as the French say, and applauded it politely and coolly. Yesterday they heard another piece in the same genre, equally diverting and no less artful—Mr. Schelling's Variations for Orchestra and Pianoforte—and were equally indifferent to it. True, applause once and again interrupted the progress of the music—an unusual incident at these concerts—but it was manifestly tribute to the skill that some virtuoso of the orchestra had just displayed in a solo passage or response to a transparent dance-tune, like the Spanish Habanera or the Irish Jig. At the end of the whole piece, the audience was even colder to it and to Mr. Schelling, present and participating as the pianist added to the band, and his variations, than it had been to the absent Mr. Carpenter and his suite. "Thoughtful people" and other pestilent prigs shook their heads gravely. Why should such relative frivolities as these two pieces intrude themselves into the Symphony Concerts?

They should none the less, dear brethren and sisters; they should even be invited to enter them; and once there, they should be heartily encouraged. It is as good to smile and to be entertained in the concert-room as it is to pucker the brow of thought and to feel the thrill of keen and deep emotion. It is possible to write amusing, witty and fanciful music, well-invented and well-ordered, that by its intrinsic quality is quite as deserving of the Symphony Concerts as not a few "serious" pieces that have had passing place in them. Let a relatively little-known composer, like Mr. Carpenter or Mr. Schelling, write a symphony that is no more than laborious, conscientious and "dignified" filling of a formula with routine material and well-tested effects and the "thoughtful people," especially if they happen to be his friends, will hail him as a "serious" musician doing "serious" work. Let him write a tone-poem, that may be imitation of Strauss, or imitation of Debussy or a singular mixture of both, spiced with Stravinsky, and the ardent young lions of ultra-modern music forthwith salute him as a rising man. But let him merely write an entertaining and expert piece like Mr. Carpenter's suite of the baby's airing or Mr. Schelling's string of impressions and recollections in the form of variations and straightway only the few that know that artful and amusing frivolity is twenty times more difficult and twenty times more worth while than dull-witted and toiling "seriousness" take pleasure in the music and have warm words for the composer.

Once again, dear brethren and sisters, whom the mask of seriousness (hiding barrenness beneath) so often deceives, music like Mr. Carpenter's or Mr. Schelling's pieces is many fold more difficult to write and implies far finer and more distinguished attributes in the composer than nine-tenths of the "respectable" symphonies and the "bourgeois" tone-poems that afflict the concerts of our time. To say nothing of Mr. Carpenter's suite, which the justly admiring Dr. Muck is not likely to let pass from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Schelling's twenty-one variations are more fertile of diversified and individual invention; they give freer play to imagination and artistry; they are more engaging and illusory to the hearer; they far more abound in the handling that is expert skill quickened by fancy. These symphonies and these tone-poems go and come as "dutiful" and maybe "educational" music; but "duty" and "education," in the concert-room, are tedious, if necessary, business; whereas the "light" suite of last week and the "light" variations of yesterday stir the mind, stimulate the fancy, hold interest firmly but diversely and afford many sorts of pleasure to those that love fertility and felicity, wit, skill, elegance, distinction and to be frank, frivolity. Perish the thought that our concerts should fall to stodgy British or stodgy German levels; while nearer home, New York and Chicago have already risen to Mr. Carpenter's music and are likely to do as much for Mr. Schelling's. Here in Boston we sorely need a propaganda against respectable musical mediocrity.

"Impressions (From an Artist's Life) in Form of Variations on an Original Theme for Orchestra and Pianoforte"—as Mr. Schelling's full and cumbrous title runs—begin with the usual statement of the theme in the unusual key of G-sharp minor. The violins and the viola announce it in unison; the full orchestra gradually develops it; the pianoforte embroiders it with arabesques. Like many another such musical thought that is to be fertile in variations, it does not in itself arrest the ear or impress the imagination. It is hardly more than useful material. Then ensue twenty-one variations—some for full orchestra some for solo instruments usually paired with the pianoforte and some for individual groups or separate choirs. Each variation has a sub-title, indicated by word or initials, that suggests the impression the composer would transmit or the characterization he would imply. A strict canonJthe musical form of the game of "following the leader—labelled "rather martial, precise in rhythm, incisive" hardly needs the initials K. M. to suggest Mr. Schelling's view of Dr. Muck; two more variations recall the living composer, Pfitzner, with whom Mr. Schelling studied and the dead composer, Mahler, whom he much admired, and hint amusingly at one and another idiosyncrasy in their music. A variation in the manner of Polish folk tune is designed to imply Mr. Paderewski; another for viola and pianoforte, Mr Kreisler. A Spanish dance bears the initials of Miss Pavlova; a quartet for the string choir with an incidental horn serves for "The Flonzaleys"; an orchestral variation is lettered W. M., presumably the illustrious Dutch conductor, Mr. Mengelberg.

Yet others are tonal impressions of a place or occasions like that for clarinet, piping a Savoyard shephard's tune, like that labelled "August, 1914," of troops marching forth to war while the Dies Iræ rumbled ominously in the tonal background; like that of the still lagoon or of the stately and square-cut chorale that Mr. Schelling heard on the Wartburg. The theme itself is inscribed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for which he destined the piece and which he says, he heard incessantly in his ears while he was composing it. Accordingly he has utilized its assembled skill and ristinctions no less than he has the individual abilities of the more eminent players. Throughout, the pianoforte is little more than an instrument added to the orchestra as an embroidering or a blending voice or yet again as the means [illegible] color. As such and with abundant resource and unobtrusive discernment, Mr. Schelling himself played it, as apt as ever in touch and tone.

In fine, Mr. Schelling has designed his variations as a delineative impressionistic and moody music quite as much as diversified transmutations of his theme in the orthodox and "absolute" fashion. The expert listener takes pleasure in the fertility and the ingenuity of these transformations in themselves and in the variety of musical resource—rhythms, harmonies, timbres, modulation and all the rest that the composer brings to them. Mr. Schelling is inventive indeed in his twenty-one versions and suggestions of his theme; his skill is endless in the technical manipulation of them; he does not lack imagination and even subtlety with his means; he has surprising feeling for timbres and harmonies and the suggestion that they convey, and to feeling he joins knowledge. There is significance in his modulations. This pleasure rises to admiration and exhilaration as the listener notes the aptness, the variety, the clear delineative implication, the wealth of mood or picture, the faculty of characterization, the atmospheric sensibility that almost every variation clearly bears.

Not one is uninteresting; hardly one fails to be elegant, artful and amusing. The range of them enkindles admiration into pleasant marvel—merry Irish dances, like to folk-tune; a vivid Spanish Habanera; the wistful and singularly rhythmed music of Poland; sober German choral and exotic Afghan piping and setting; the peace of a lagoon, the rhythmed tumult of marching troops; the idiosyncrasies of instruments and the idiosyncrasies of composers; vignettes of virtuosi and impressions of moods. And in every one apt invention, happy fancy, plentiful resource and purpose clearly foreseen and as clearly fulfilled. Like Strauss and Elgar, he has made an ancient and often academic and pedantic form serve the new purposes of music in delineation, characterization and suggestion and he has enriched it with all the newfound means to that end. Unlike them in "Don Quixote" and the "Enigma Variations," he has been witty, fanciful, light and entertaining. Once more an American composer has written an aristocratic music. and two such pieces in a single season seem almost too good to be true.

Severally and collectively the orchestra and Dr. Muck gave back to Mr. Schelling not only the technical virtuosity but also the suggestion and the characterization that his Variations asked of them and enhanced all three by the consummate beauty of tone and the musical aptness and finesse in the narrower sense of the adjective that they brought to them. Surely as Mr. Schelling imagined and implied, Dr. Muck and the men wrought. Then they passed to one of their favorite "show-pieces," Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice," for becoming end of the concert. Yet somehow, yesterday, and through no fault of theirs, it sounded unexpectedly thin and outmoded. The vivid play with Spanish rhythms and universal orchestral timbres; the sharp or subtle strokes of harmony or modulation; the fires of the fandango; the charm of the serenade; the fancy of the variations and the cadenzas, the flaming or the flickering color seemed to lack vitality and illusion, to come and go as tricks of the orchestrating trade; to bear shamming suggestion of Spanish scene and atmosphere rather than enkindled imagination of it. Perhaps the more truthful but not less vivid illusion of an actual Spain in the music of Ravel, Laparra and the rising generation of Spanish composers themselves has withered the old conventions of such music. Perhaps also repetition readily states these "show-pieces." The orchestra, the conductor and the audience like them and justly. Moreover, there is more than one that awaits —and deservingly—Dr. Muck's hand.

Brahms's third symphony made the contrasting beginning of the concert—a piece as it happened, in which Dr. Muck had never before conducted in Boston and which deserves repetition above some of the composer's other symphonies that stand oftener on his programmes. In none of the other three, except possibly the first, does Brahms write with such vigorous readiness of idea, such freedom and force of progress and cumulation, with such absence of the calculation that usually besets him, with such fertility of means to clearly foreseen and fully accomplished ends. His musical thoughts spring at once into vital being; they seem to shape of themselves a changeful and forward course or they return in significant reiteration; the harmonic and the instrumental dress that clothes them is born not so much of reflection as of imagination; the coloring of the whole music is rich, warm, glowing. Usually Brahms achieves his harmonic and instrumental vesture by the exercise of ability. In this third symphony, he often substitutes intuition. Moreover, in none of his other symphonies is there suggestion of dramatic conflict in tones to compare with the contrasting play of his bright and joyous and his darkling and bitter theme through the first movement and the finale. On the instant they impress and enkindle; to the end, as they strive against each other, they hold the listener engrossed and stirred.

As Dr. Muck released the magnificent might that sweeps through the finale of the first of Brahms's symphonies, so now he set free the manifold and dramatized energy of no little of this symphony in F major. Each of the conflicting themes in the first movement was alive with its intrinsic quality, force and suggestion; the tonal drama seemed of man and fate with the man endowed, contrary to Tchaikowski's fashion, with a mind and a will as well as with nerves and sensibility; and the end was submission rather than resignation. So may a conductor of imagination and of power read out of at least two of Brahms's symphonies that of which the dry-as-dusts who too long held him to their bosoms, never suspected the existence and set parts of his music of yesterday almost beside the "Tragic Overture." And with that same imagination, in inevitable corollary, such a conductor can invest the intervening Andante and Allegretto with the grave beauty that rises from the one and the wistful charm that exhales from the other and give to both dramatic accents. To Dr. Muck and so to the rest of us Brahms can be poet and even dramatist in tones. H. T. P.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY,

JANUARY 1, 1916.

SCHELLING'S "IMPRESSIONS" AT THE SYMPHONY

The "Impressions," by Ernest Schelling, with the composer at the piano, was the feature of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. The program was:

Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Schelling, Impressions (from an Artist's Life), in form of variations on an original theme, for orchestra and piano (first performance); Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

One gets the idea on first hearing of the Schelling composition that the composer seeks to set forth the many wonderful qualities of the Boston orchestra and its soloists. He succeeds admirably, but has rather overdone it. The work, to survive, will have to be cut, and cut considerably. It was superbly given.

The symphony and the caprice afforded a striking contrast, with the former retaining its great hold on the musical public, while the later provided a fitting close to the concert.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

DECEMBER 13, 1915

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

SYMPHONY HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra in concert for the benefit of its pension fund, afternoon of Dec. 12. The program: Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64; Johann Strauss, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" waltzes; Lalo, "Namouna" suite; Rossini, overture to "Wilhelm Tell."

Indubitably many of the audience that packed Symphony hall Sunday afternoon were drawn by the prospect of hearing this orchestra play the "Blue Danube" waltzes and the "William Tell" overture. From the standpoint of conductor, orchestra and audience, it is interesting to record that the piece which made the most impression on the hearers was not the so-called popular music but one of the numbers of the Lalo suite, which was new to most who heard it. This brought eager applause, partly for the music and partly for Mr. Maquarre, whose flute was called on for a long virtuoso passage. Ingratiating is this music of Lalo's, worthy a recurring place on the regular programs of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck gave what some would be pleased to call a scholarly reading of the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony; by which they doubtless mean a reluctance to take liberties with the meaning of the composer. And this in spite of the fact that the last movement was judiciously cut towards the end. The fifth symphony, not so well known and fortunately less emotionally liked than the sixth, has passages of musical grandeur and beauty that are good for one to hear. As Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra played it yesterday it was an exposition of the best in symphonic writing and also a commentary on Russian national feeling.

The "Blue Danube" waltzes have doubtless in the minds of many found a standard set by which to judge all other performances of the music. So with the "William Tell" overture. With the waltzes the conductor got out of them all there was to get. It was a pleasure to hear the poor, maltreated overture played as it ought to be played, which Dr. Muck's memories of his early light opera conducting days made possible.

BOSTON HERALD.

DECEMBER 25,

SYMPHONY GIVES NINTH CONCERT IN ITS SERIES

Produces Novelty in Form of the Suite "Adventures in a Perambulator."

By PHILIP HALE.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Magic Flute"........Mozart
Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator".. Carpenter
Concerto in A minor for violocello..Saint-Saens
Concerto in F major for organ, three horns and strings...............Rheinberger

Mr. Carpenter, a business man with a poetically musical soul, living in Chicago, has told in tones the adventures of a baby wheeled about in a perambulator by the nurse. They meet a policeman on whom the nurse looks kindly; they listen to a hurdy-gurdy playing familiar tunes; they see the lake with sunbeams dancing on the back of the waves; all sorts of dogs run about them; at last the baby, tired, dreams confused dreams, seeing mother and the nurse, and pondering the exciting moments of his ride. For the music and the enlightenment of the hearer, Mr. Carpenter has written a pleasingly whimsical program, argument, what-you-will.

A "musical joke," even when it is short, is to be looked upon with suspicion. Too many are laboriously contrived; as funny as an open grave. Two of Mr. Carpenter's episodes—"The Lake" and "Dreams"—are full of sentiment, at times emotion, and thus provide plausible contrast; but even then there is a little too much in one and the same vein. This monotony is increased by certain mannerisms in style. We should not mourn if the episode "Dogs" were cut out, for it is, as far as suggestion is concerned, the least successful one of the series. Grant that the idea of scampering, endless chasing in a circle, the dogs' foolish game of tag, is well expressed, the mimetic measures, the yelping, baying, barking, growling, are ineffective. "Not a bit like it, Mr. Carpenter," a hearer might exclaim, and quote the story of Agesilaus. "Another time being desired to hear a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingale's voice, he would not hear him, saying, 'I have oftentimes heard the nightingale itself.' "

Among the mannerisms noted are these: The practice of ending an episode, piano or pianissimo; with a final abuse of upper notes of strings or a piccolo flourish; little tricks of surprise, which too often repeated, do not surprise.

On the whole this Suite is more than "clever," an obnoxious word in art, often condemnatory. Mr. Carpenter has a delicate fancy, a vivid imagination, surprising facility and ingenuity, truly individual expression. There are many charming harmonic effects that are fresh and original. The instrumentation is as a rule singularly effective, by felicitous combinations of timbres, by the peculiar use of instruments, and especially by the daring and successful treatment of the pulsatile section. The music might be described as ultra-modern with a respect for flowing melodic lines; it is not a new chapter in the gospel of deliberate and sensational ugliness.

There is genuine humor, as in the portrayal of the policeman; also in the episode "The Hurdy-Gurdy," an audacious tour de force with an intoxicating use of xylophones. There is genuine poetry, as in "Dreams" and in "The Lake," which is emotional though at times dangerously near sentimentalism.

Viewed in many ways this Suite must be considered as one of the most interesting compositions written by an American. While it is evident that Mr. Carpenter has been influenced by the French school and is not unacquainted with the work of one Richard Strauss; it is also evident that Mr. Carpenter thinks for himself and has his own manner of expression. This music would command respect and admiration in any country.

The performance of this Suite was remarkably euphonious and brilliant. The concert began with an equally remarkable reading and performance of Mozart's immortal overture. The opening Adagio was fraught with significance; there was the expression of solemn anticipation—"Behold, I show you a great mystery"; the chattering, bustling fugue was played with uncommon crispness, clearness, vivacity. Dr. Muck's sharp accentuation, the lightning flashes of emphasis, the significance given to phrases in the Introduction, usually treated indifferently as of no real importance, made the performance noteworthy.

Mr. Malkin of the orchestra played Saint-Saens's concerto in a masterly and beautiful manner, with sure mechanism, rich, pure tone, the delicacy and elegance demanded by Saint-Saens. The minuet saves the concerto as a composition. Mr. Marshall, the organist of the orchestra, made the most of Rheinberger's concerto, a work which shows at least that the composer thoroughly understood the nature of the instrument for which he wrote so much, and did not put before the organist a harsh and thankless task. Yet even in the last Eighties there were organists of great reputation in Germany who looked on Rheinberger as a dangerous man, too free, extravagant, licentious in his use of "pianoforte passages" for the organ.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date DEC 12 1915

CAN'T REACH BEETHOVEN VIA RAGTIME

Dr. Muck, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Gives Americans a Frank View of Their Musical Shortcomings.

"YOU Americans," declares Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "have the great genius for making money; but you appear too busy to use it." It was in connection with a plea for better music in America that Dr. Muck was speaking, and he pointed out frankly what he considered this nation's artistic defects. "Such music as you are producing in America to-day for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music," he added. "It is just the expression of a restless desire for excitement, for change, for intoxication. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation. You cannot cultivate a love for Beethoven via ragtime."

Dr Muck's idea of us from the musical point of view is given in the form of an extended interview in the Craftsman Magazine, under the heading: "The Music of Democracy." He makes especial reference to the possibilities of musical instruction in the public schools, by choruses and orchestras, which will be of interest to those interested in that branch of instruction in the Providence schools. Dr. Muck is quoted as follows:

"A music loving people! Why not—living in such a marvellous country, a country that should be the source of splendid inspiration for every art. It is different in Europe; the inspiration is not needed. Music continues and thrives in the Old World because it is a part of the existence of the people. They are all brought up with music in their homes and in their schools. They know it as they know their A B C's, they do not have to seek new and tremendous inspiration—influences powerful enough to cut a channel through prevailing interests.

* * *

"But in America you did not start with music when you were a young nation; in a way, you did not start as a young nation at all. It always seems to me that this country began life as a youth, not a child. Usually the beginning of music is in the infancy of the nation, when there are no conventional boundaries to the emotions, when the people crave some rich expression for their vital interests, when all of life is activity, spontaneity, and when people are not shut away from nature's storehouse of inspiration, when they are looking up to the sky, out to the woods hourly, when each day takes them down pathways that are full of beauty and fragrance which must have expression in ballad or chant, in the dance of the warrior or the song of the lover.

"America has had no long, slow centuries of simple, primitive existence. Her early struggles were not the old battles of warriors over maidens or of nations seeking to possess each other's hunting [illegible] and pleasure places. From the start you were more conventional, more grown up. People came from other worlds who were not happy and settled in America with their own specialized ways, with their own social attitude and religion all ready-made. If they fought battles it was against the aborigines whose land they needed; it was not to protect ancient homes and traditional art. This way was essential but not so picturesque, and it started your nation past the time of early thrilling days of romance, in which music and poetry has time to take deep roots into the hearts of the people.

"When art comes early in the life of a nation it is the expression of that people's emotional interest in beauty. When it comes later and civilization is full-fledged it is born of a conventional appreciation of the world's standards of beauty. The early music wells up out of great love, great joy, great splendid response to nature. In the later life of a nation, art comes from an appreciation of what it adds to life, from a sense of its decorative importance. In other words, one is born of an emotion and one of an idea.

"Wagner, strangely enough, combined both the traditional, and the modern point of view in his music. He had the great idea of a new religion for the world, a religion that could no longer be held in the grasp of the gods, that must be reborn through the splendor and tragedy of human love and sacrifice. In the music of Strauss you feel the pounding of a great idea, you feel suddenly that he is breaking down conventional barriers that have held people away from the intoxication and joy of music. Beethoven had the great idea of bringing close to the people all pastoral beauty from the beginning of days. Whatever has been joyous in pastoral lives, whatever has been sad or thrilling or tender or peaceful Beethoven has reproduced for the world's joy and strength.

* * *

"In America, I should say, you will have for your later day music the great idea of democracy, of freedom for all the people. This idea is expressed in the very quality of the Western landscape, in the freedom, vastness, the titanic grandeur, the unoccupied beautiful spaces; all these things speak of liberty, boundless opportunity. Who that has ever seen the Grand Canyon at sunset or in the moonlight, or those great limitless plains, veiled in rose and violet and the mellowing gray of twilight can fail to be profoundly impressed, richly influenced? Such beauty and vastness must liberate the spirit, and the free spirit much eventually express something of the force that has opened the windows of its soul.

"Already your painters have found the West and have brought back some of its beauty on canvas, but as yet, I have heard no poetry that repeats to me the story of sunrise in the West, no music that gives me of the yellow lights and the purple shadows that stream down that deep canyon, varied from day to day, and forever lovely.

"You ask me what is the difficulty.

"It is not that you do not love music in America—few individuals in the world are more liberal than the American man or woman who seeks to bring music to this country, but as yet you have not stopped long enough to cherish the birth of great art here. It seems to me that you are constantly putting it off to the future. You say, 'Some day we will have art in America, we can have it whenever we want it. So far we have had everything that we wanted. We are busy just now, we have not yet all the money we want.'

"And truly you have the great genius for making money; but you appear too busy to use it; at least, to use it in a way that seems most valuable to me.

Dr. Karl Muck.

You do buy many, many things that enable you to get about quickly, not only things that will make your homes beautiful but things that will enable you to get away from your homes—swifter steamers, swifter railroads, swifter motor cars. It is a nation hurrying from one generation to another, one century to another, seeking always means of haste, pressing past with an ideal of haste rather than some definite goal.

"Isn't it just as good to stop to-day as to-morrow, to spend beautiful leisure in your beautiful homes, into which to bring beautiful art? This is the lovely present I wish for America. I want leisure now for your music, your painters want it for art, your young geniuses want it for poetry. Stop now and make this the greatest century America has ever known for the birth of great national art.

* * *

"How would I suggest doing this? I have already said that you should seek your inspiration in your own land, in the splendor and beauty of it, teach your children how beautiful your own land is, and in connection with that, in every school in America teach your children all the beautiful music that the greatest musicians of the world have produced. Have every school one rich chorus, have children sing out all the joy and love of their young hearts; they want to do it, they do not want to bend over their desks every minute, they do not want to study every minute, they want to express something of what youth is, what they feel life to be.

"You will have no difficulty in establishing choruses in your public schools. All youth has music in its heart, let it pour out in tremendous volumes in every school in America. Beyond this, if you have the time, and I should say make the time, let every school have its orchestra. I do not believe there is a school in America that would not furnish you talent for an orchestra. Let the choruses work with the orchestra, and let children feel that it is a great honor to play in the orchestra. Oh, you cannot think what this would do for the happiness of youth, for the production of art in this country, what channels it would furnish for genius to express itself in the coming generation. And suddenly you will find that you are this musical nation that you have talked about, and no one will ever ask again how it can be done and why Americans are not creating music. You will find barriers that have stood in front of genius drop away, you will find that music will reach the homes.

"It is hopeless to attempt to do anything for middle age. No nation has ever developed art through its grown-up people. It has developed much enjoyment, much culture, it has shown appreciation of art, as America has done, for there is an ever increasing love of good music in this country, an ever growing audience for grand opera and for symphony concerts, but that is not what you are asking about in America. You want your own musical life, you want your own musical geniuses, men who will have a vision of what music should be in this country, who will see straight into the hearts of the people, who will produce their aspirations, their longings, their love of beauty, who will have the great idea for music from American inspiration, the music of the democracy—the music of the free people.

* * *

"I do not mean for a moment that there is no music in the American school, but there should be music in every school—in the public schools, the private schools, the colleges, the universities, and always the best. I do not in the least believe in popular music for the masses; I do not believe there is such a thing as good popular music. I think what you call here your ragtime, is poison. It poisons the very source of your musical growth, for it poisons the taste of the young. You cannot poison the spring of art and hope for a fresh clear stream to flow out and enrich life.

"From the very start I should say, give your young people the best music the world has ever known of every land. It will not lessen their ability to create native music. No good art ever hurts or lessens the power to produce any other valuable art. Art is a long history of great progress, but it is a connected history, and by giving good music to your young people here, from Germany, from France, from every known source, you are only opening up their interest, their need of music; their capacity to produce music, and when they finally reach the point where they long to create they will seek native sources of inspiration if they have the real art. But if you pollute the spring, if you poison the beginning of musical source, you will find the power for creation is atrophied, and the small stream which forces its way out will be muddied and soiled and unbeautiful.

"You ask me how the American nation shall produce its own music. I say to you from the bottom of my heart that it shall at once cease to train its children with what is called the popular music. By this I do not mean for an instant that the primitive music of a nation is not the rich, resourceful, inspiring thing; the folk music of all lands has been the beginning of musical development and musical culture, the joy of the people and the foundation on which the widest musical culture has rested.

"But such music as you are producing in America to-day for the cabaret and the second-rate musical comedy is not folk music. It is just the expression of a restless desire of the people for excitement, for change, for intoxication, which is not improving from year to year, from generation to generation; it is only changing, meeting various emotional whims of the people. You have new music because you want new dances or you want more excitement. This cannot become the source of inspiration for the development of a musical nation. You ask me frankly and I tell you frankly.

* * *

"One instance came to my notice in regard to the deadly influence of the ragtime music which I will cite to show the invidious effect it may have even on people whose first impulse is toward the right thing. I dined one evening with a family devoted to the interests of symphony music. They had been subscribers for years. After the dinner I was very tired and strolled in the library alone to rest for a moment.

"To my astonishment I saw a music machine in one corner of the room. I said possibly they may have some records of good music and singers, and so glanced over the records. Then, to my horror I discovered that they were of the most deadly, vulgar ragtime music; not only was the music of the worst character, but in some instances there were records of vulgar cafe chantant songs, a collection of all the things that it seemed to me the real music lover would be opposed to.

"It was a terrible shock to me. I felt as though I had lost friends. I wondered how much I was to blame for it. How was it possible that I could have put into my work in the symphony my heart and soul and most earnest desire for the best results from such work and then find that among those I had counted upon as true friends and music lovers, there was this deadly interest in the vulgar fad of the day? I realized how much there was to work against, how much to overcome before this country, with all the opportunity in the world, would really become a musical nation.

"Not only should you seek the best music for your children, but give them the best teachers, always the best teachers. If you want your children to love poetry, you do not give them some poor little verse, some bit of popular doggerel, you turn back to Shakespeare, to Goethe, to Racine; you give them the wealth of the world. If you wish them to recite poetry you seek some great master of the dramatic arts, so that all the fullness of the meaning of the creator reaches them. You must do the same in music. You must have them taught by the man who knows and loves music, who can win a response from them, who can direct them and encourage them.

"The best music in the world is of no avail for children with a poor teacher. Everything must be of the best if we wish the best results. Seek good music in simple form and music lovers as instructors. What would we think of a gardener who planted seeds in poor soil because the poor soil was economical or easy to get or because people were accustomed to using poor soil? The good gardener seeks the best soil for just the kind of growth he desires, and then he knows just how to plant the seed and how to care for the little plant and how to cultivate his garden for the best and beautiful results. Surely it is necessary to cultivate music as wisely as a garden. And so I say once more that you cannot cultivate a love for Beethoven via ragtime."

* * *

Dr. Muck spoke on the question of the wisdom of endowing music in America. "Undoubtedly," he said, "it would be better for a democratic people to produce and to support their own music. It would be more in line with their ideals. But what will you?

"As yet the people do not seem willing to make the effort to support grand opera and symphony concerts. The question resolves itself into this. If you do not endow these institutions you cannot have this music. If you wish the music at this present age of your civilization, it must be endowed. So far as I am aware no musical institution of any description is supported by State or Government in America. The only endowments that are made are individual, and those in some instances are lavish to a degree. In New York your grand opera is supported by subscription and frequently by additional endowment as well—always personal. This is true of every grand opera in America. It is also true, so far as I am able to state, of the symphony orchestra. I know it is true of the New York Symphony, of the Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Seattle and so on indefinitely.

"And right here it is important to note that the interest in the symphony orchestra is spreading. It is no small matter for America to realize that there is a successful symphony orchestra in Seattle as well as in San Francisco, Chicago and so on toward the East. But these orchestras are not supported by the voluntary contributions of the mass of people. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically the gift to the people of one great music lover, Mr. Higginson. It is Mr. Higginson who has made it possible for the Boston Symphony to work without joining the music union, so that it is an absolutely free institution.

"And in this free country I find that the trade unions do not always leave the people quite free either in the arts or crafts. I think that if you are not careful, through them you will greatly mar musical opportunity and you will possibly kill the development of craft work.

* * *

"A short time ago a carpenter came to do some work for me in my house in Boston and I actually had to tell him how to do his own work, for I am proud of the fact that I am a good carpenter. I learned it in my youth, as I did many other simple, practical things. I talked with my union carpenter and he told me that as a matter of fact he was not a carpenter at all, but a plumber; but he could make a little more money as a carpenter and so he elected himself that and came to do my work. It is much the same in the musical trade unions. There is no standard except a financial one, and it is not the man who is the greatest musician who has the best salary.

"But to return to the endowment of music. You will see that at present it is necessary for certain kinds of musical development. After you have put music in all your schools, in the biggest, most impersonal way, I firmly believe that you will be cultivating a generation of people who will be eager to support symphony concerts, grand opera, who will be writing music for both.

"The question of endowment does not seem to trouble any one in Germany; it is universal. In every place of 40,000 or 50,000 inhabitants, there is a symphony orchestra supported by the town. In Berlin the Emperor gives 3,000,000 marks a year out of his private income for the advancement of music; in Vienna, music is supported by the Government. There seems to be no question in the world but what the people who have the greatest opportunity for enjoying music should really be the supporters.

'The idea of endowing music in Germany came about through Frederick the Great, some 200 years ago. He was a music lover. He and the Dukes of his court decided that they would pay for it themselves and this sentiment has continued in Germany ever since, although if it were not done there is; in my mind no question in the world but what the people by voluntary contributions would hold music in their midst.

* * *

"You have asked me just what quality in your civiliation I find most detrimental to the development and progress of the arts. It seems to me that the most serious handicap to art that I have been able to discover in America, and of course there are serious handicaps in every nation to its best growth, is the fact that politics in this country is a matter of business, not of national concern. I believe that politics should be absolutely separated from business activities. Politics is the machinery of running a nation. A man should not be in politics to make money, to make his living, but to work for the welfare of the nation. There should be no opportunity whatever for him to have to face financial questions. He should be supported by the Government. But in America I find in every State people in politics for their own interest, not to build up a finer, stronger, purer nation, not to insure the development of art loving people, not to add to the beauty of the country, the delight of it, but for their own aggrandizement. Naturally this brings about a State restless, uncertain and separated from the betterment of the country. Also it places in power and in high positions men not prepared for the work; it gives young people the idea that they can start on the top, not that they must work carefully, warily, assiduously into a position of supremacy, and one that may account for a great deal of the general restlessness that prevails everywhere, and of the eagerness of young people to skip the steps that should be climbed in their own business artistic or spiritual growth.

"In all schools I notice a tendency for children to escape as soon as possible, to get out and make money before they are prepared to make it well, to start life with half-baked ideas of what is worth while, with their profession half learned, to be independent when they are young, and not to be independent in order to get the utmost from life, but to play harder. It is the young people who are making a little money, without much knowledge, who fill the cabarets and the poor theatres, and whose lives are choked and disintegrated before they are old enough to realize what they are losing.

"Everywhere these young people are seeking for money in order to have more houses, more clothes, more playtime, more motor cars. This cannot mean more beauty, more real happiness, more development, more spiritual activity. The plumber cannot call himself a carpenter and do good work. Youth must prepare itself for great things if it is to live them, and it is through the preparation of the young that all great and good things come to a nation."

[74]

SCIENCE MONITOR,

DECEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY MEN PRESENT SUITE BY CARPENTER

SYMPHONY HALL—Ninth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Dec. 24. The program: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Carpenter, "Perambulator" suite (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saëns, concerto No. 1 in A minor for violin and orchestra (Joseph Malkin, soloist); Rheinberger, concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra (John P. Marshall, organist).

If orchestral music had been one of the arts practiced by the fifth century Greeks, it could not have helped developing characteristics of form and structure very different from those it actually has assumed. If composers had flourished in Athens contemporarily with Aeschylus and Sophocles, they would surely have established architectural patterns quite contrary to those set up by Bach and Beethoven. Had Aristotle been in position to write a treatise on the subject of symphonic method and design, he would have had no such matters to discuss as the fugal form and the sonata form, much less the variation form. These contrivances of late renaissance times could have had no place in an ancient scheme of art. They are based on an idea which in the minds of the men of the earlier civilization would have been essentially inartistic. For they contain as an essential part of their outline that post-classical and decadent contrivance known as the summary. The Bach fugue and the Beethoven allegro and rondo, which are probably the most important formulas in which tone thinkers have expressed themselves, demand, according to their innate logic, the use of the superfluous and altogether un-Hellenic device called the recapitulation.

It is doubtless an unfortunate thing that the modern world has had to evolve canons of musical taste without help from the epoch that produced the Attic drama and the Doric temple. Some way might have been indicated for the art of tone to keep itself fluid, unified and vital besides the obvious one of repetition. Of late, happily, a way is being found by certain composers of France. The trend toward redundancy is finding some check in the orchestra writing of recent men of the Parisian school. It ought to find similar check in the work of composers in the United States, since a succinct and compact style of address may be said to agree with the national habits. But the rule of tradition prevails with the Chicagoan whose suite was played at the Christmas Symphony concerts. The summarizing of themes is made a dutiful part of his "Perambulator" exploit. And duty enters into the affair in such a manner as to drive out inspiration. The ride of the baby, which begins so auspiciously and which proceeds so illusively along the street where walks the policeman and where plays the hurdy-gurdy, must needs end with a dream which recalls the whole journey. In the interests of symphonic recapitulation the viewpoints of the story are mixed. A piece which begins as a delightful study of tone-painting ends as an exercise in musical mathematics.

The two soloists made contributions to the program which greatly pleased the listeners. Mr. Malkin presented the Saint-Saëns concerto for violoncello with a finely finished execution and with an uncommonly lustrous tone. Mr. Marshall played the organ part of the Rheinberger concerto with tasteful registration and with a dramatic feeling for the dialogue between his instrument and the string and brass groups. He made an especial success in the part of the work where the composer makes his, in the majestic finale.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 24,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE PROBLEM OF A CHRISTMAS PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck's Solution of It, with Mr. Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" for His Capital Piece—Music of Humor, Fancy, Wit and Dexterity That Blends Word-Picturing and Tone-Picturing and Joins Distinction to Entertainment

WHO shall read the mind of a conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, when, once in six or seven years, he must put together a programme for a pair of concerts one of which falls on the afternoon before Christmas and the other on the evening of that day itself? Perhaps in his secret thoughts he would be glad to omit both, but his august master—the precedent of five-and-thirty years—forbids any break in the appointed sequence of the concerts. It is the proud boast of the Comédie-Française that it has never foregone a scheduled performance, unless fire, war or other "act of God"—as the contracts say—has defeated it in its duty. So far no celestial or terrestrial contingency has ever interrupted the ordered course of the Symphony Concerts, and before them the fact that today is Christmas Eve and that tomorrow is Christmas Day is no more than the capricious accident of an impertinent calendar. For Dr. Muck there was no option and, being loyal to the traditions of the orchestra, he doubtless desired none; but he must have suspected that his audience today would be relatively slender in numbers and almost certainly preoccupied with other matters than the hearing of symphonic music. Tomorrow the assembly may be larger and also more tired, since every one knows, but pretends not to believe, that holiday-making is a fatiguing business.

What, then, was a conductor to do, especially if he were minded to suit a part of his programme to those two obstinate dates on the calendars, ecclesiastic and secular, festal and commercial? Now, Christmas may have its stately and ceremonial side as when the Roman or the Anglican church celebrates it. The overture to Mozart's opera of "The Magic Flute" happens to be a ceremonial music, especially when the deep and solemn proclamation of the trombones interrupts it and returns yet again to stay the course of the fugued finale. Then it is music of rites and temples, as indeed the opera bids; even the running passages for strings have an audible gravity of voice and the coloring wood-winds, fuller and richer than was often Mozart's wont, are warm and mellow. Accordingly, the overture, as it did today, may well begin a pair of Christmas concerts.

Again, the organ is a ceremonial and stately instrument readily associated with the churchly celebration of the high feast of the Nativity. It is also an occasional instrument of the secular orchestra that Dr. Muck seems to believe should have annual inning—say at Christmas or Easter—with a solo piece. Why not, then, kill two birds, as it were, with one stone and give Mr. Marshall a concerto—this time one by the fertile and fluent Rheinberger, with three horns for coloring voices and a string orchestra for background? The programme might well end with such a sonorous finale, and it did. Perhaps one concerto suggested another; perhaps Saint-Saëns's piece for violoncello and orchestra seemed a becoming number to a designedly light programme with no symphony upon it; perhaps Dr. Muck remembered that each of the two principal 'cellists must have his turn as "soloist" in the course of the season. Two birds—it is just possible—with one stone again, and so Mr. Malkin is playing this afternoon the aforesaid concerto of Saint-Saëns and no doubt with his usual clear understanding and continent impartment of the music and his wonted command of the exacting technique and the tonal richness of the violoncello.

But, how account for the fourth, the most considerable and the most interesting item of the programme—Mr. Carpenter's suite for orchestra, "Adventures in a Perambulator." It is an unusual piece as the music of American composers goes; it is the first piece for orchestra that one of the most expert, imaginative and individual of them has written; it was "the novelty of the year," when Mr. Stock produced it last March at the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra; it was no less so when at the beginning of another season Mr. Damrosch made it known to New York. Tempting report of it has gone far and wide; there was eager curiosity in the public of the Symphony Concerts to hear it for its own sake and for the revealing and the pointing performance Dr. Muck and the orchestra are sure to give it. Yet today and tomorrow it is played "for the first times at these concerts" when the audiences are likely to be smaller than usual and rather more mindful of their own babies in the flesh than of Mr. Carpenter's in tones. Admittedly, the suite is a comparatively light and altogether amusing piece and so suits and untaxing Christmas programme. Moreover, Dr. Muck, as is weekly to be observed at Symphony Hall, has a will of his own and, being human, likes to keep to it. In his scheming of the concerts, he had set down "Adventures in a Perambulator" for Dec. 24 and 25, and on these days "Adventures in a Perambulator" are to be played. Fortunately, requests for repetitions have been known to descend upon Dr. Muck's study table and it is of record that Mr. Carpenter's music rained down a shower of them upon Mr. Stock in Chicago and on Mr. Damrosch in New York.

By this time, there is little need to recall the general and particular design and course of the adventures. Mr. Carpenter is frankly writing programme-music and wisely making both programme and music out of his own head. The one is as full of inventive and transparent humor and fantasy as the other; the artistry of the record in words equals the artistry of the record in tones; indeed programme and music are so skilfully and imaginatively interlaced that to read the one is to hear in anticipation or retrospect even the details of the other. In his perambulator, with his nurse behind him the baby goes forth for his daily airing. They encounter the portentous policeman; they hear near and far the wanton music of the hurdy-gurdy; they look upon the waves of the lake dancing blue in the sunshine under the white and blue of the summer sky; dogs scuffle around them; the baby muses upon the fulness of life and dreams of his portion in the adventures of the day. Before his sleepy eyes nurse melts into mother. The rest—the fascinating particulars in which Mr. Carpenter is as adroit and suggestive of word as he is of tone—were set out in this place only yesterday.

What the eye sees and feels as it scans the text, the ear hears and feels as it listens to the music. The motif of the baby; the motif of the nurse; the rhythmic and the harmonic turning of the wheels of the perambulator, regular and cheerful as the steps behind it, need no "thematic catalogue" to label them. "Round like a ball, taller than my father, blue, fearful, fascinating," the policeman—"unprecedented man"—approaches and the dutiful analyst has no occasion to tell us that he marches out of double basses, bassoons, tympani and the other heavy-toned and heavy-footed instruments. The perambulator audibly stays its course; as audibly the baby halts the desultory conversation of nurse and policeman. The wheels turn again, but soon to be lost in the tinny and tinkling sounds of a hurdy-gurdy—two harps, two xylophones, one celesta and one piano. Now, it is hinting at "Funiculi, Funicula"; again it is unmistakably grinding out "Sweet Marie"; quite clearly it has a preference for waltz rhythms. So has the baby, but not the policeman; striding again out of the double basses, he whisks off "the dark man" and "the dark lady" and plaintively the waltz wheezes into receding distance.

Then the lake, and suave and shimmering tone-picturing. The little waves curl flashing out of the flutes; the big swell smoothly out of the horns. The strings ripple with the motion of the waters and the breeze; the harmonic coloring is high, soft and clear; the body of tone light and lapping. There is as light yet full-throated climax. "This is My Lake," proclaims the baby. Ear and fancy suspect that it is Mr. Carpenter's lake, too, and by like title of enkindled affection. . . . And next the dogs—little dogs, yipping shrill in the piccolos and the oboes; big dogs, booming out of the tuba itself; all the dogs, playing at "Follow My Leader" in a fugato, while an inner voice inquires, "Where, oh where is my little dog gone?" The learned analysts know not whether to blush for Mr. Carpenter, bestowing such scholarship on his puppy-dogs or to smile with him in the ingenuity and the fancy of it. . . . The perambulator starts again; the wheels turn regularly; the nurse steps cheerfully; the baby muses and dreams. Little fragments of all that has gone before flit through the music—policeman, hurdy-gurdy, the lake and the rest. Then, of a sudden, comes what the old pantomimes would have called the apotheosis. Slowly and insinuatingly, first vaguely and then clearly, the routine and business-like motif of the nurse transforms itself into a theme of gentle grace and tender beauty, all light and charm. The baby sleeps and now it is of his mother that he dreams.

So to describe Mr. Carpenter's music is to hint at the wonder and the delight of it. For, though the suite records no more than the sights and the sounds, the adventures and the musings of a baby in that "out" which to his mind "is wonderful," and though from the first measure to the last it is light, lucid and amusing, it has many more titles to distinction than not a few portentous symphonies and tone-poems from American and European hands. Music is not necessarily undistinguished because it happens to seem spontaneous, because hearers apprehend and feel it on the instant; because they smile and laugh over it while their eyes moisten meanwhile. The wonder of the suite is, first, the fertility, the felicity and the transparency of Mr. Carpenter's motifs. They seem to invent themselves; they are as clear as the day; they suggest instantly and irresistibly what he would make them imply; they have musical and delineative character, whether nurse or policeman, baby or mother, dogs or hurdy-gurdy are in question. Humor and beauty, playful point and gentle poetry answer with equal readiness to Mr. Carpenter's call. The second wonder of the suite is like to the first—a similarly spontaneous and limpid flow. The student of the score may find all sorts of feats of invention, resource and scholarship in the suite, from the fugato of the puppy-dogs to subtle intricacies of crossed and interwoven rhythms and the transformation, until it suffuses the whole music, of the prose of the nurse into the poetry of the mother. The harmonic web seems to the ear a web of pure atmosphere and illusion, yet Mr. Carpenter is weaving it in his own way and with not a few inventions wholly his own, out of the subtleties and the freedoms of ultra-modern progressions, coördinations and juxtapositions. The instrumental color—notably in the suggestion of the near or the distant hurdy-gurdy or in the tone-picture of the lake—is inventive, adept and altogether illusory play with timbres. Ravel himself does not more assiduosly shun the conventions of melody, cadence, counterpoint, figuration, climax and color than does Mr. Carpenter; the Parisian is not more fastidious, sensitive and precise of means and proportions; yet the American's music is transparency itself in narrative, characterization, atmosphere and suggestion. The details are as significant as they are various, and each and all of them is as light and free as it is subtle and exact.

[75]

The [illegible] workmanship and ease aside—is the delight of humor, wit and fancy in tones. The humor never falls away into extravagance, even when it is busy with the yappings and the paddings of dogs; it never coarsens even when the big blue policeman is target for it; it never loses pungency; it is never beaten out thinly and laboriously. The tonal wit is recurring salt to the nurse and her share in the adventures of the day; it plays even about the revolutions of the perambulator and the mischances of the hurdy-gurdy. As for fancy and the enriching and the deepening of it which is imagination, hear the one or the other in almost every impression that the tone-baby receives; in the glamoring of the trumpery tunes and the faded waltz of the wheel-piano until its grinding seems the rhythm of the joy of living; in the radiant vision of the lake; in the loveliness and the charm of the unfolding of the theme of the mother and in the theme itself. Without fancy, and without imagination, the suite could not keep its unfailing lightness of handling, its clear fascination of style, its ready dexterity of means and process. In it, for the first time outside Mr. Loeffler's work, an American composer has written an aristocratic, and not a bourgeois, music.

H. T. P.

Boston Post,

Christmas Morning,

SPIRIT OF JOY AT THE SYMPHONY

Carpenter's Suite Puts Hearers in Good Humor

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the programme of the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening Dr. Muck has arranged a series of compositions in a joyous vein, more or less appropriate to the season. Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," it is true, contains measures that are impressive and portentous, music which hints at grave matters to come, but these solemn and ceremonial measures serve to set off the more happily the delightful fugue which follows.

A HUMOROUS SUITE

The Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator" of John Alden Carpenter was performed for the first time at these concerts. This suite was played he on the 16th of last November by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor. It, too, is entertaining music. Finally, two concertos were played by members of the orchestra. Josef Malkin, 'cellist, played the familiar Saint-Saens concerto in A minor; John Marshall, organist of the orchestra, played the organ part of Rheinberger's concerto for organ, strings and horns.

Mr. Carpenter's music is well written and cleverly scored. Its "plot" is now known. The "Adventures in the Perambulator" are the adventures of the young gentlemen or lady, sex unknown, out for a morning walk. The nurse, the policemen, and "Myself" have representative themes. There are heard the turning of the wheels of the perambulator, the clanking of a hurdy-gurdy, the majestic stride of the policemen, the barking of dogs, the swish of waters as the big lake with the little waves and the big waves with sunbeams on their back come into view. The workmanship is more than suggestive of Strauss, and reminiscences of other composers are heard. Yet the music has a value of its own, if only the value which is that of music well and wittily written, and a big orchestra employed with admirable mastery and a genuine sense of humor.

Beauty in "The Lake"

The most valuable of the six movements of the suite is "The Lake," with its impressionistic effects and its harmonic beauty. The take-off on the hurdy-gurdy and such "masterpieces" as "Alexander's Ragtime Band" is bunny, but the humor of the Scherzo, "Dogs," is still funnier, in its ingenious suggestion of canine sounds and its fugal treatment of thematic fragments. This is not music that can be called original, but it is music right excellently made, and, thank heaven, it is for a change the music of a composer who does not take himself too seriously. At the same time, we must acknowledge that Mr. Carpenter's programme of the composition, written by himself, is fully as original and as entertaining as his music.

The orchestral performances of one of the clearest of Mozart's fugues and of the great introduction of the overture was admirable. Mr. Malkin did entire justice to a composition conspicuous for its grace and its neatness of workmanship and deftness of instrumentation. He played with ample virtuosity, with a warm and rich tone, with the authority of an experienced and accomplished [illegible]

SCIENCE MONITOR,

DECEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY MEN PRESENT SUITE BY CARPENTER

SYMPHONY HALL—Ninth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor; afternoon of Dec. 24. The program: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Carpenter, "Perambulator" suite (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saëns, concerto No. 1 in A minor for violin and orchestra (Joseph Malkin, soloist); Rheinberger, concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra (John P. Marshall, organist).

If orchestral music had been one of the arts practiced by the fifth century Greeks, it could not have helped developing characteristics of form and structure very different from those it actually has assumed. If composers had flourished in Athens contemporarily with Aeschylus and Sophocles, they would surely have established architectural patterns quite contrary to those set up by Bach and Beethoven. Had Aristotle been in position to write a treatise on the subject of symphonic method and design, he would have had no such matters to discuss as the fugal form and the sonata form, much less the variation form. These contrivances of late renaissance times could have had no place in an ancient scheme of art. They are based on an idea which in the minds of the men of the earlier civilization would have been essentially inartistic. For they contain as an essential part of their outline that post-classical and decadent contrivance known as the summary. The Bach fugue and the Beethoven allegro and rondo, which are probably the most important formulas in which tone thinkers have expressed themselves, demand, according to their innate logic, the use of the superfluous and altogether un-Hellenic device called the recapitulation.

It is doubtless an unfortunate thing that the modern world has had to evolve canons of musical taste without help from the epoch that produced the Attic drama and the Doric temple. Some way might have been indicated for the art of tone to keep itself fluid, unified and vital besides the obvious one of repetition. Of late, happily, a way is being found by certain composers of France. The trend toward redundancy is finding some check in the orchestra writing of recent men of the Parisian school. It ought to find similar check in the work of composers in the United States, since a succinct and compact style of address may be said to agree with the national habits. But the rule of tradition prevails with the Chicagoan whose suite was played at the Christmas Symphony concerts. The summarizing of themes is made a dutiful part of his "Perambulator" exploit. And duty enters into the affair in such a manner as to drive out inspiration. The ride of the baby, which begins so auspiciously and which proceeds so illusively along the street where walks the policeman and where plays the hurdy-gurdy, must needs end with a dream which recalls the whole journey. In the interests of symphonic recapitulation the viewpoints of the story are mixed. A piece which begins as a delightful study of tone-painting ends as an exercise in musical mathematics.

The two soloists made contributions to the program which greatly pleased the listeners. Mr. Malkin presented the Saint-Saëns concerto for violoncello with a finely finished execution and with an uncommonly lustrous tone. Mr. Marshall played the organ part of the Rheinberger concerto with tasteful registration and with a dramatic feeling for the dialogue between his instrument and the string and brass groups. He made an especial success in the part of the work where the composer makes his, in the majestic finale.

TRANSCRIPT,

DECEMBER 24,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE PROBLEM OF A CHRISTMAS PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck's Solution of It, with Mr. Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" for His Capital Piece—Music of Humor, Fancy, Wit and Dexterity That Blends Word-Picturing and Tone-Picturing and Joins Distinction to Entertainment

WHO shall read the mind of a conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, when, once in six or seven years, he must put together a programme for a pair of concerts one of which falls on the afternoon before Christmas and the other on the evening of that day itself? Perhaps in his secret thoughts he would be glad to omit both, but his august master—the precedent of five-and-thirty years—forbids any break in the appointed sequence of the concerts. It is the proud boast of the Comédie-Française that it has never foregone a scheduled performance, unless fire, war or other "act of God"—as the contracts say—has defeated it in its duty. So far no celestial or terrestrial contingency has ever interrupted the ordered course of the Symphony Concerts, and before them the fact that today is Christmas Eve and that tomorrow is Christmas Day is no more than the capricious accident of an impertinent calendar. For Dr. Muck there was no option and, being loyal to the traditions of the orchestra, he doubtless desired none; but he must have suspected that his audience today would be relatively slender in numbers and almost certainly preoccupied with other matters than the hearing of symphonic music. Tomorrow the assembly may be larger and also more tired, since every one knows, but pretends not to believe, that holiday-making is a fatiguing business.

What, then, was a conductor to do, especially if he were minded to suit a part of his programme to those two obstinate dates on the calendars, ecclesiastic and secular, festal and commercial? Now, Christmas may have its stately and ceremonial side as when the Roman or the Anglican church celebrates it. The overture to Mozart's opera of "The Magic Flute" happens to be a ceremonial music, especially when the deep and solemn proclamation of the trombones interrupts it and returns yet again to stay the course of the fugued finale. Then it is music of rites and temples, as indeed the opera bids; even the running passages for strings have an audible gravity of voice and the coloring wood-winds, fuller and richer than was often Mozart's wont, are warm and mellow. Accordingly, the overture, as it did today, may well begin a pair of Christmas concerts.

Again, the organ is a ceremonial and stately instrument readily associated with the churchly celebration of the high feast of the Nativity. It is also an occasional instrument of the secular orchestra that Dr. Muck seems to believe should have annual inning—say at Christmas or Easter—with a solo piece. Why not, then, kill two birds, as it were, with one stone and give Mr. Marshall a concerto—this time one by the fertile and fluent Rheinberger, with three horns for coloring voices and a string orchestra for background? The programme might well end with such a sonorous finale, and it did. Perhaps one concerto suggested another; perhaps Saint-Saëns's piece for violoncello and orchestra seemed a becoming number to a designedly light programme with no symphony upon it; perhaps Dr. Muck remembered that each of the two principal 'cellists must have his turn as "soloist" in the course of the season. Two birds—it is just possible—with one stone again, and so Mr. Malkin is playing this afternoon the aforesaid concerto of Saint-Saëns and no doubt with his usual clear understanding and continent impartment of the music and his wonted command of the exacting technique and the tonal richness of the violoncello.

But, how account for the fourth, the most considerable and the most interesting item of the programme—Mr. Carpenter's suite for orchestra, "Adventures in a Perambulator." It is an unusual piece as the music of American composers goes; it is the first piece for orchestra that one of the most expert, imaginative and individual of them has written; it was "the novelty of the year," when Mr. Stock produced it last March at the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra; it was no less so when at the beginning of another season Mr. Damrosch made it known to New York. Tempting report of it has gone far and wide; there was eager curiosity in the public of the Symphony Concerts to hear it for its own sake and for the revealing and the pointing performance Dr. Muck and the orchestra are sure to give it. Yet today and tomorrow it is played "for the first times at these concerts" when the audiences are likely to be smaller than usual and rather more mindful of their own babies in the flesh than of Mr. Carpenter's in tones. Admittedly, the suite is a comparatively light and altogether amusing piece and so suits and untaxing Christmas programme. Moreover, Dr. Muck, as is weekly to be observed at Symphony Hall, has a will of his own and, being human, likes to keep to it. In his scheming of the concerts, he had set down "Adventures in a Perambulator" for Dec. 24 and 25, and on these days "Adventures in a Perambulator" are to be played. Fortunately, requests for repetitions have been known to descend upon Dr. Muck's study table and it is of record that Mr. Carpenter's music rained down a shower of them upon Mr. Stock in Chicago and on Mr. Damrosch in New York.

By this time, there is little need to recall the general and particular design and course of the adventures. Mr. Carpenter is frankly writing programme-music and wisely making both programme and music out of his own head. The one is as full of inventive and transparent humor and fantasy as the other; the artistry of the record in words equals the artistry of the record in tones; indeed programme and music are so skilfully and imaginatively interlaced that to read the one is to hear in anticipation or retrospect even the details of the other. In his perambulator, with his nurse behind him the baby goes forth for his daily airing. They encounter the portentous policeman; they hear near and far the wanton music of the hurdy-gurdy; they look upon the waves of the lake dancing blue in the sunshine under the white and blue of the summer sky; dogs scuffle around them; the baby muses upon the fulness of life and dreams of his portion in the adventures of the day. Before his sleepy eyes nurse melts into mother. The rest—the fascinating particulars in which Mr. Carpenter is as adroit and suggestive of word as he is of tone—were set out in this place only yesterday.

What the eye sees and feels as it scans the text, the ear hears and feels as it listens to the music. The motif of the baby; the motif of the nurse; the rhythmic and the harmonic turning of the wheels of the perambulator, regular and cheerful as the steps behind it, need no "thematic catalogue" to label them. "Round like a ball, taller than my father, blue, fearful, fascinating," the policeman—"unprecedented man"—approaches and the dutiful analyst has no occasion to tell us that he marches out of double basses, bassoons, tympani and the other heavy-toned and heavy-footed instruments. The perambulator audibly stays its course; as audibly the baby halts the desultory conversation of nurse and policeman. The wheels turn again, but soon to be lost in the tinny and tinkling sounds of a hurdy-gurdy—two harps, two xylophones, one celesta and one piano. Now, it is hinting at "Funiculi, Funicula"; again it is unmistakably grinding out "Sweet Marie"; quite clearly it has a preference for waltz rhythms. So has the baby, but not the policeman; striding again out of the double basses, he whisks off "the dark man" and "the dark lady" and plaintively the waltz wheezes into receding distance.

Then the lake, and suave and shimmering tone-picturing. The little waves curl flashing out of the flutes; the big swell smoothly out of the horns. The strings ripple with the motion of the waters and the breeze; the harmonic coloring is high, soft and clear; the body of tone light and lapping. There is as light yet full-throated climax. "This is My Lake," proclaims the baby. Ear and fancy suspect that it is Mr. Carpenter's lake, too, and by like title of enkindled affection. . . . And next the dogs—little dogs, yipping shrill in the piccolos and the oboes; big dogs, booming out of the tuba itself; all the dogs, playing at "Follow My Leader" in a fugato, while an inner voice inquires, "Where, oh where is my little dog gone?" The learned analysts know not whether to blush for Mr. Carpenter, bestowing such scholarship on his puppy-dogs or to smile with him in the ingenuity and the fancy of it. . . . The perambulator starts again; the wheels turn regularly; the nurse steps cheerfully; the baby muses and dreams. Little fragments of all that has gone before flit through the music—policeman, hurdy-gurdy, the lake and the rest. Then, of a sudden, comes what the old pantomimes would have called the apotheosis. Slowly and insinuatingly, first vaguely and then clearly, the routine and business-like motif of the nurse transforms itself into a theme of gentle grace and tender beauty, all light and charm. The baby sleeps and now it is of his mother that he dreams.

So to describe Mr. Carpenter's music is to hint at the wonder and the delight of it. For, though the suite records no more than the sights and the sounds, the adventures and the musings of a baby in that "out" which to his mind "is wonderful," and though from the first measure to the last it is light, lucid and amusing, it has many more titles to distinction than not a few portentous symphonies and tone-poems from American and European hands. Music is not necessarily undistinguished because it happens to seem spontaneous, because hearers apprehend and feel it on the instant; because they smile and laugh over it while their eyes moisten meanwhile. The wonder of the suite is, first, the fertility, the felicity and the transparency of Mr. Carpenter's motifs. They seem to invent themselves; they are as clear as the day; they suggest instantly and irresistibly what he would make them imply; they have musical and delineative character, whether nurse or policeman, baby or mother, dogs or hurdy-gurdy are in question. Humor and beauty, playful point and gentle poetry answer with equal readiness to Mr. Carpenter's call. The second wonder of the suite is like to the first—a similarly spontaneous and limpid flow. The student of the score may find all sorts of feats of invention, resource and scholarship in the suite, from the fugato of the puppy-dogs to subtle intricacies of crossed and interwoven rhythms and the transformation, until it suffuses the whole music, of the prose of the nurse into the poetry of the mother. The harmonic web seems to the ear a web of pure atmosphere and illusion, yet Mr. Carpenter is weaving it in his own way and with not a few inventions wholly his own, out of the subtleties and the freedoms of ultra-modern progressions, coördinations and juxtapositions. The instrumental color—notably in the suggestion of the near or the distant hurdy-gurdy or in the tone-picture of the lake—is inventive, adept and altogether illusory play with timbres. Ravel himself does not more assiduosly shun the conventions of melody, cadence, counterpoint, figuration, climax and color than does Mr. Carpenter; the Parisian is not more fastidious, sensitive and precise of means and proportions; yet the American's music is transparency itself in narrative, characterization, atmosphere and suggestion. The details are as significant as they are various, and each and all of them is as light and free as it is subtle and exact.

[75]

The [illegible] workmanship and ease aside—is the delight of humor, wit and fancy in tones. The humor never falls away into extravagance, even when it is busy with the yappings and the paddings of dogs; it never coarsens even when the big blue policeman is target for it; it never loses pungency; it is never beaten out thinly and laboriously. The tonal wit is recurring salt to the nurse and her share in the adventures of the day; it plays even about the revolutions of the perambulator and the mischances of the hurdy-gurdy. As for fancy and the enriching and the deepening of it which is imagination, hear the one or the other in almost every impression that the tone-baby receives; in the glamoring of the trumpery tunes and the faded waltz of the wheel-piano until its grinding seems the rhythm of the joy of living; in the radiant vision of the lake; in the loveliness and the charm of the unfolding of the theme of the mother and in the theme itself. Without fancy, and without imagination, the suite could not keep its unfailing lightness of handling, its clear fascination of style, its ready dexterity of means and process. In it, for the first time outside Mr. Loeffler's work, an American composer has written an aristocratic, and not a bourgeois, music. H. T. P.

Boston Post,
Christmas Morning,

SPIRIT OF JOY AT THE SYMPHONY

Carpenter's Suite Puts Hearers in Good Humor

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the programme of the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening Dr. Muck has arranged a series of compositions in a joyous vein, more or less appropriate to the season. Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," it is true, contains measures that are impressive and portentous, music which hints at grave matters to come, but these solemn and ceremonial measures serve to set off the more happily the delightful fugue which follows.

A HUMOROUS SUITE

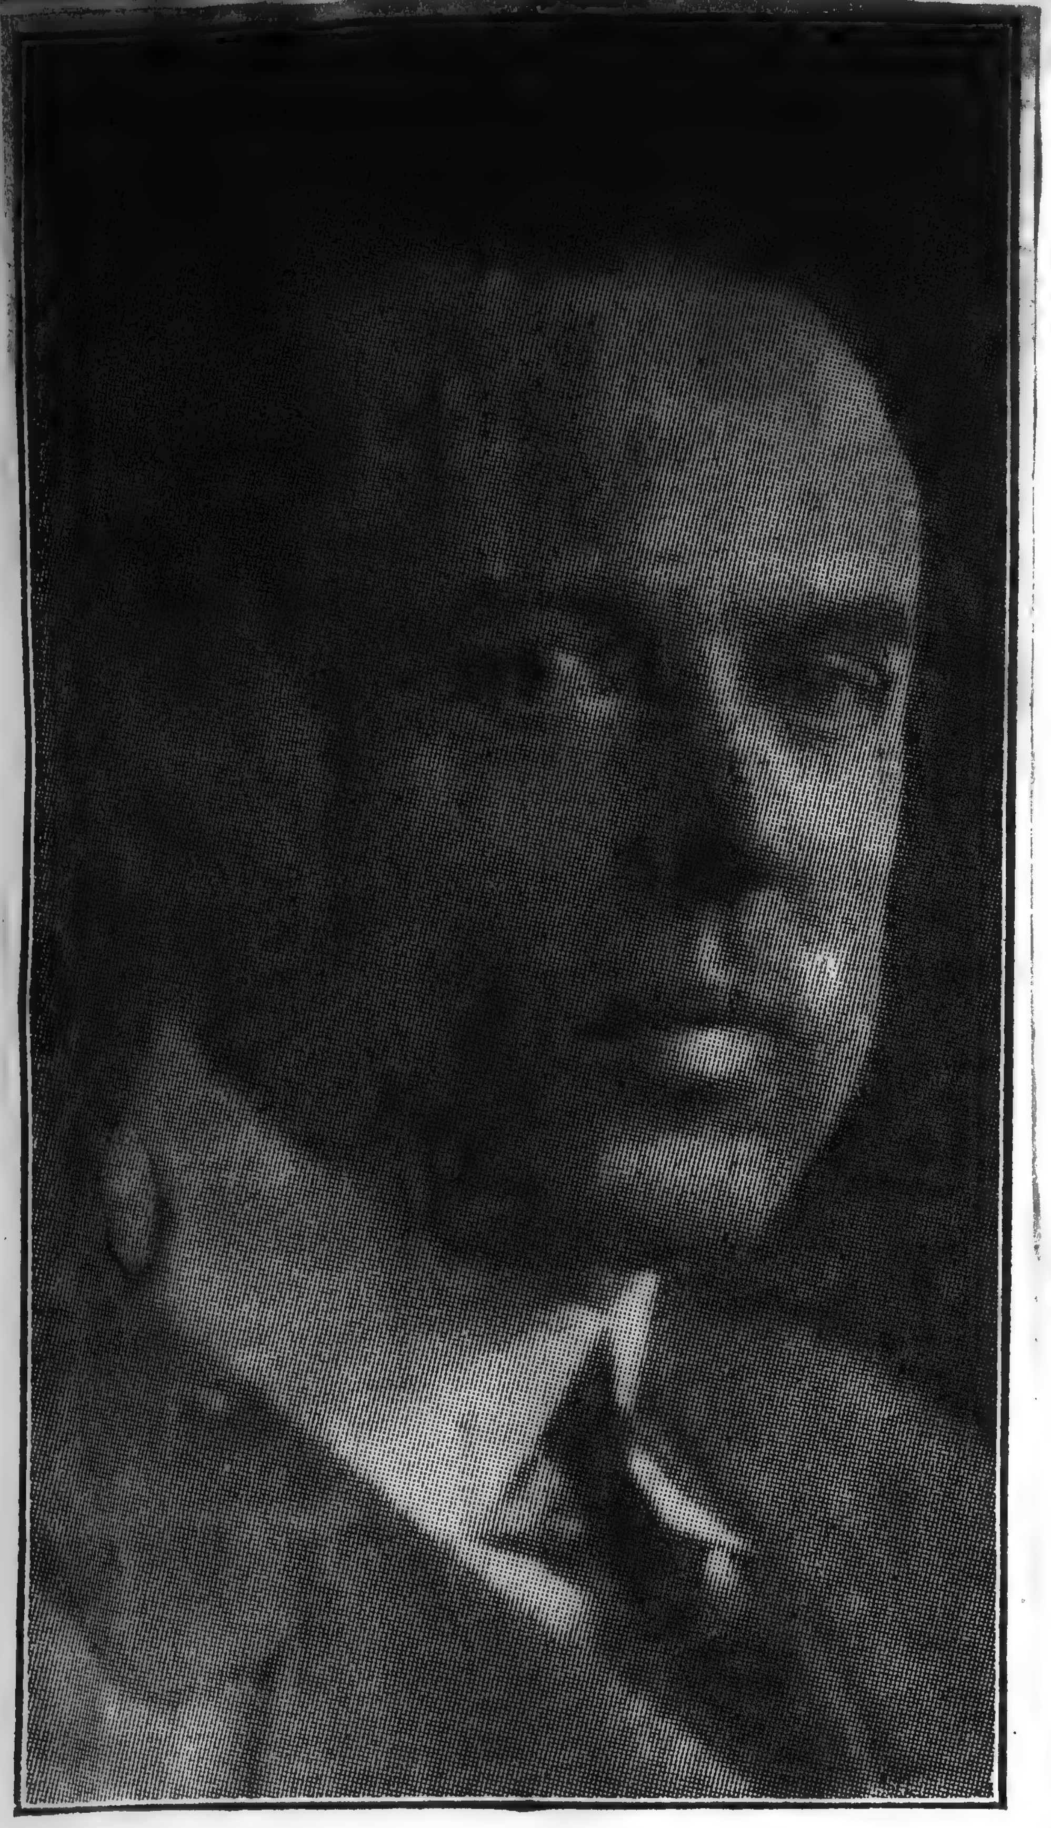
The Suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator" of John Alden Carpenter was performed for the first time at these concerts. This suite was played here on the 16th of last November by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor. It, too, is entertaining music. Finally, two concertos were played by members of the orchestra. Josef Malkin, 'cellist, played the familiar Saint-Saens concerto in A minor; John Marshall, organist of the orchestra, played the organ part of Rheinberger's concerto for organ, strings and horns.

Mr. Carpenter's music is well written and cleverly scored. Its "plot" is now known. The "Adventures in the Perambulator" are the adventures of the young gentlemen or lady, sex unknown, out for a morning walk. The nurse, the policemen, and "Myself" have representative themes. There are heard the turning of the wheels of the perambulator, the clanking of a hurdy-gurdy, the majestic stride of the policemen, the barking of dogs, the swish of waters as the big lake with the little waves and the big waves with sunbeams on their back come into view. The workmanship is more than suggestive of Strauss, and reminiscences of other composers are heard. Yet the music has a value of its own, if only the value which is that of music well and wittily written, and a big orchestra employed with admirable mastery and a genuine sense of humor.

Beauty in "The Lake"

The most valuable of the six movements of the suite is "The Lake," with its impressionistic effects and its harmonic beauty. The take-off on the hurdy-gurdy and such "masterpieces" as "Alexander's Ragtime Band" is bunny, but the humor of the Scherzo, "Dogs," is still funnier, in its ingenious suggestion of canine sounds and its fugal treatment of thematic fragments. This is not music that can be called original, but it is music right excellently made, and, thank heaven, it is for a change the music of a composer who does not take himself too seriously. At the same time, we must acknowledge that Mr. Carpenter's programme of the composition, written by himself, is fully as original and as entertaining as his music.

The orchestral performances of one of the clearest of Mozart's fugues and of the great introduction of the overture was admirable. Mr. Malkin did entire justice to a composition conspicuous for its grace and its neatness of workmanship and deftness of instrumentation. He played with ample virtuosity, with a warm and rich tone, with the authority of an experienced and ac-



John Alden Carpenter

Music of Substance

But—it is a significant fact not due to performance, but to the compositions themselves—that if we deduct the greatness of Mozart's music, the honest music without heaven-storming originality, and yet what substance it has! Music that showed to remarkable advantage by the side of either Carpenter's or Saint-Saens'! The sturdy thematic material, the firmness of the tonal structure, the broad, clear writing, the effective organ part and the excellent scoring for the strings and horns make for an exceedingly brave sounding composition. All this makes splendid music, music of the Yule-tide, music we would fain hear at more frequent intervals than in the past, music, incidentally, which bears witness to the extraordinary strength and vitality of good polyphonic composition of the German school. Mr. Marshall played in a brilliant and musicianly manner.

Dr. Muck, as usual, wielded a masterly baton in the performance of the concertos as well as the earlier music of the programme.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 25

TWO SOLOISTS HEARD IN AMERICAN WORK

JOHN CARPENTER RECORDS TRIUMPH

"Adventures in a Perambulator" Pleases—"Magic Flute Overture" Brilliantly Played

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

Mozart "Magic Flute Overture"
Carpenter "Adventures in a Perambulator"
Orchestral Suite
St. Saens Violoncello Concerto A minor
Soloist, Mr. Joseph Malkin
Rheinberger
Concerto for Organ, Horns and Strings
Soloist, Mr. John P. Marshall

A most agreeable programme, just suited to usher in Christmas Eve, and every note of it within the bounds of intelligibility. The very first number plunged into "medias res" with its chattering, light-hearted fugal exposition, the theme of which we suspect Mozart took from Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," Book II., No. 7. If any musical reader will compare the two he will at once recognize the kinship; the key, the length and the modulations being identical. But Mozart makes an altogether different affair out of it, Bach treating his subject in a sedate manner in canon, while Mozart makes it full of jollity.

Yet we never can reconcile ourselves to the rapidity with which all modern conductors take the Mozart fugue theme. No auditor can follow its figures in the helter-skelter pace at which it is played. But no amount of speed can cause our strings to blur, and the whole overture was most brilliantly and very rapidly played. It may be recalled, in this connection, that Mozart did not care greatly for the flute, and even in "The Magic Flute" did not give that instrument much prominenee. He once wrote a flute and harp concerto, however (milk-and-water), but that was inspired by his empty pocketbook—and he did not get paid for it after all. The overture was much applauded and deserved to be. The introduction to the Mozart overture seemed, to us, exaggerated in its contrasts.

It is a grateful task to record the triumph of an American composer. John Alden Carpenter, in the "Adventures in a Perambulator," has introduced a baby into the musical repertoire that is as successful as, and much more natural than, Richard Strauss's heavily-scored infant who lives in a family where they had double-fugues at 7 o'clock in the morning—probably for breakfast.

It was programme-music, and the meditations of the baby, which are printed in connection with the score, were properly reproduced in the programme-book, so that each auditor was enable to dilate with the proper emotion; it was gloriously good fun, and masterly music as well. What a pompous and slow-moving policeman the bassoon made! How perfectly the xylophone reproduced the aggressive tones of the street-organ (not a hurdy-gurdy, by the way), and with what charming vagueness the fragments of these things floated through baby's dream at the close!

But, exhilarating as it is to find a good humorist among modern composers, it is still more gratifying to note that the scoring here is most skilful and that the treatment of the themes is indicative of a high musicianship. "The Lake", the one earnest movement of this Suite, shows a delicacy of treatment that suggests Debussy at his best—not the Debussy of "La Mer." We do not think, however, that "Dogs," the succeeding movement, is graphic or especially remarkable. Mr. Carpenter might have remembered how Gluck pictured the dog Cerberus, in "Orpheus," by glissando effects (sliding) upon a contrabass string. It is much more graphic than Mr. Carpenter's canines.

But we are so charmed with the suite that we feel that picking any flaw is almost hyper-criticism. Nevertheless we revel most in the humor of the movement falsely entitled "Hurdy-Gurdy." Dr. Muck joined the first two movements together, which, we think, only mystified the audience. The interpretation was not superior to that of the New York Symphony orchestra, given in Boston under Walter Damrosch, a few weeks ago. There are a few "Leit-motiven" in the composition, and the figures representing the Nurse, the Perambulator and its wheels, the baby, and the policeman, can readily be followed. The work has so recently been given in Boston that great length of comment seems superfluous save to state again, emphatically, that the American composers who take themselves with such deadly seriousness might learn a lesson from this work, and Chadwick's "Tam O'Shanter," which latter ought also to be heard in Boston soon.

The work was greatly applauded, the orchestra finally rising in response.

St. Saens' Violoncello Concerto was also music without any aggressive or radical tendencies, and it served to display our excellent new violoncellist, Mr. Joseph Malkin. We have but recently spoken of the work of this artist in these columns and there is little more to tell save to renew the encomiums then written. Mr. Malkin has a broad and sympathetic tone. He makes technique his servant instead of being its slave. He is pure in intonation, even in the highest positions, and is absolutely sure in skips, runs or double-stopping.

There is a little too much of embroidery in this concerto, but for all that it displays the solo instrument well, and it has some very effective themes. Mr. Malkin was greatly applauded, and the orchestra and conductor deserved to share in this, for the ensemble was excellent.

Then the usual Christmas exodus began. We were very sorry for this, since the best work of the concert followed.

The Organ Concerto came last and ended this most enjoyable programme. Of course the name of Rheinberger was sufficient guarantee that there would be no modern tricks played with the musical Art in this work. There are but few concertos for organ and orchestra in existence, and very few composers can blend the two forces into a really effective form. Guilmant has done it, but he leans a little towards the confectionery side of music, and sometimes his movements become a trifle cloying in consequence. But this work of Rheinberger's is virile from first to last. There is plenty of contrast, too, and, of course, melody is not discarded.

It has become the custom, "in these most brisk and giddy-paced times," to size up Rheinberger's compositions as "Kapellmeister-musik," music of the pedantic brain altogether, but we could name more than one of his works in which romance is present.

To us this concerto was a keen delight. It did one good to breathe the clear, classical air once more. Good logical development of figures was there, especially in the finale, and the Andante had a dignity which was in fine contrast with the sprightliness of the finale. The playing of the horns in the second movement was especially good, but the forces were in perfect ensemble almost all through.

Mr. Marshall played with artistic effect and the registration was chosen with tast and intelligence. The organ sounds especially well in Symphony Hall, and we were glad to hear the instrument in a prominent role for once. The pure contrapuntal touches were very effective, and Mr. Marshall did splendid manual and pedal work in the final Cadenza. Altogether this concerto was the most effective work of the concert, and we hope that few auditors will miss its glories in the concert tonight.

DECEMBER 25,

BOSTON JOURNAL

SYMPHONY PLAYS HOLIDAY PROGRAM

Baby Carriage Suite by Chicago Composer Is Warmly Applauded.

There was a holiday atmosphere at the Symphony concert yesterday, due to the unusual presence of two soloists and to the first performance under Dr. Muck's direction of the enthusiastically heralded symphonic suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," by John Alden Carpenter, which was first played here last month by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The program for the Christmas concerts embraces Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, the baby-carriage suite, the Saint-Saens 'cello concerto in A minor, with Joseph Malkin as soloist, and the Rheinberger concerto for organ, horns and strings, with John P. Marshall presiding at the seldom heard organ.
It is a typical holiday list o with the Carpenter tone pic
ing as so many plums in th
Among the new works pr
Dr. Much in recent years none quite so pleasing, to all classe lovers, as the suite depicting nursling's adventures in son reservation stocked with cor lier policemen, yelping dogs a hurdy-gurdies. The suite h aginative distinction chara much of the new French m warmth of feeling and sens that give it a place of its ow should be proud of this am poser.
Too many novelties are more than caviare even to phony public these days, but this "pram" music was enthusiastically applauded yesterday. Mr. De Voto, the pianist, shared deservedly in the ovation the orchestra received.

The same program will played again tonight.

Next week the new number on the program will be Ernest Schellings' "Symphonic Variations," for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself as soloist. Dr. Muck will conduct the third Brahms symphony for the first time in Boston. The final number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 25,

BABY MUSIC BETTER THAN ITS PROGRAM

Carpenter's Perambulator Suite Repeated.

Messrs Marshall and Malkin Heard in Solo Performances.

Who is the author of the program of Mr Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," which stands as a preface to the score? No name appears, Some sage in infantile psychology is hiding his light. Such induction as to the first human percepts amounts to uncanly perception, to downright divination, to the chronic symptoms of genius.

Walter Damrosch and his New York Symphony Orchestra first made the music known here several weeks ago. It was at once apparent to be charming, spontaneous, apt and imaginative in invention and denoting a high degree of skill in treatment, and this notwithstanding the "program," available in advance from the first performance in Chicago and said to be the composer's inspiration.

This is curious. His writing is permeated with the spirit of play, with the exquisite lightness of touch and graceful humor which envelops the peopled realms of the imagination. There is no literal suggestion of the foolish attempts at naivete, the silly twaddle of these amusing episodes of dogs and policemen, whose relation to the score is no more

Modern French [illegible] been found in the style. It is true the whole tone scale is frequently heard. At the previous performance there were suggstions of pages other than those of Mr Carpenter. It is clear that beside listening to the hurdy gurdy play snatches of popular masterpieces, his infant of the perambulator must have been wheeled into a performance of "The Girl of the Golden West."

The opera was produced in Chicago, which is Mr Carpenter's home, the year all progressive cities joined in swelling the tribute to the house of Ricordi. Fragments of the opera are in the air in the first two sections: Setting Out and The Policeman. In the fourth division, "The Lake," which begins much in the mood and idiom of the "night scene" in "Louise," there is a figure reminiscent of the music of the barroom scene for Rance and Minnie. Nor is that all of Mr Carpenter's allegiance to Puccini. There are allusions to "La Boheme," a passage similar to that of and three muted trumpets in fifths, and measures reminding of the early part of the third act.

Burlesque is widely avoided in translating the various observations of the journey. Although it must be admitted the child was old beyond his years, he might have misconstrued the policeman's motives had he discovered him in a surreptitious flirtation with his nurse. To depict a policeman conniving with a nurse girl through orchestral speech would have been difficult, not to say indecent. The policeman in this case speaks through the bassoon. This is incongruous, for the bassoon is not of Celtic origin.

But to resume. The musical observations are not painfully literal. There is no suggestion of labeled pictures in a primer. The hurdy gurdy is treated with exquisite wit, with an admirable sense of realism blended with the ideal. This is the apotheosis, the magnificat, the sublimation of the hurdy gurdy. Such an instrument would not be barred from the residential streets of our best people. "The Lake" has a quietly rhapsodic character. So with Dreams music, which charms irrespective of printed directions. Dr Muck interpreted the suite with sense of this charm. Some might make it more delineative, more unsophisticated, more frank, but he played it as a score of much poetic beauty.

Rheinberger's concerto for organ, with John Marshall as soloist, with strings and three horns is music of academic clearness and order. The organ is used with a distinctive sense of its powers. There is fugal treatment of ideas of less dignity than their development. Mr Marshall's performance was marked by fluent technic, by a nice sense of registration and of dynamic proportion. The cadenza was tastefully played.

Mr Malkin was soloist in Saint-Saens' first concerto in A-minor for cello and orchestra. A creditable appearance, although one not distinguished either in technic or in beauty of style. In the opening overture to "The Magic Flute," Dr Muck exhausts the possibilities of the broad tempo of the Adagio, and the irregularly accented notes in the brilliant fugue.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Established:

SCHELLING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. KARL MUCK has made an interesting program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15. With the exception of the charming little symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the program is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," Ernest Schelling's new symphonic variations for orchestra and piano and the diabolically clever Scherzo of the Frenchman Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

ERNEST SCHETLING

Novelties always arouse great interest among music lovers and Mr. Schelling's new symphonic variations are a novelty in the full sense of the word, for they have just had their first performances in Boston. Mr. Schelling has written with extraordinary skil and fancy. They are not a piano concerto in any sense of the word, for he makes the piano an integral part of the orchestra, and having written the variations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in view, he has given incidental solos to all the leaders of the various sections. Mr. Schelling will play the piano part.

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E flat major	Hayd
Tone Poem—Death and Transfiguration	Straus
Symphonic Variations	Schellin
The Sorcerer's Apprentice	Duk

John Alden Carpenter

Music of Substance

…t—it is a significant fact not due to …ormance, but to the compositions …mselves—that if we deduct the great…s of Mozart's music, the honest …ic without heaven-storming origin…, and yet what substance it has! …ic that showed to remarkable ad…ntage by the side of either Car…enter's or Saint-Saens'! The sturdy thematic material, the firmness of the … structure, the broad, clear writ…ng, the effective organ part and the excellent scoring for the strings and …rs make for an exceedingly brave …unding composition. All this makes splendid music, music of the Yule-tide, music we would fain hear at more frequent intervals than in the past, music, incidentally, which bears witness to the extraordinary strength and vitality of good polyphonic composition of the German school. Mr. Marshall played in a brilliant and musicianly manner.

Dr. Muck, as usual, wielded a masterly baton in the performance of the concertos as well as the earlier music of the programme.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 25

TWO SOLOISTS HEARD IN AMERICAN WORK

JOHN CARPENTER RECORDS TRIUMPH

"Adventures in a Perambulator" Pleases—"Magic Flute Overture" Brilliantly Played

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

Mozart "Magic Flute Overture"
Carpenter "Adventures in a Perambulator" Orchestral Suite
St. Saens Violoncello Concerto A minor
Soloist, Mr. Joseph Malkin
Rheinberger
Concerto for Organ, Horns and Strings
Soloist, Mr. John P. Marshall

A most agreeable programme, just suited to usher in Christmas Eve, and every note of it within the bounds of intelligibility. The very first number plunged into "medias res" with its chattering, light-hearted fugal exposition, the theme of which we suspect Mozart took from Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," Book II., No. 7. If any musical reader will compare the two he will at once recognize the kinship; the key, the length and the modulations being identical. But Mozart makes an altogether different affair out of it, Bach treating his subject in a sedate manner in canon, while Mozart makes it full of jollity.

Yet we never can reconcile ourselves to the rapidity with which all modern conductors take the Mozart fugue theme. No auditor can follow its figures in the helter-skelter pace at which it is played. But no amount of speed can cause our strings to blur, and the whole overture was most brilliantly and very rapidly played. It may be recalled, in this connection, that Mozart did not care greatly for the flute, and even in "The Magic Flute" did not give that instrument much prominence. He once wrote a flute and harp concerto, however (milk-and-water), but that was inspired by his empty pocketbook—and he did not get paid for it after all. The overture was much applauded and deserved to be. The introduction to the Mozart overture seemed, to us, exaggerated in its contrasts.

It is a grateful task to record the triumph of an American composer. John Alden Carpenter, in the "Adventures in a Perambulator," has introduced a baby into the musical repertoire that is as successful as, and much more natural than, Richard Strauss's heavily-scored infant who lives in a family where they had double-fugues at 7 o'clock in the morning—probably for breakfast.

It was programme-music, and the meditations of the baby, which are printed in connection with the score, were properly reproduced in the programme-book, so that each auditor was enable to dilate with the proper emotion; it was gloriously good fun, and masterly music as well. What a pompous and slow-moving policeman the bassoon made! How perfectly the xylophone reproduced the aggressive tones of the street-organ (not a hurdy-gurdy, by the way), and with what charming vagueness the fragments of these things floated through baby's dream at the close!

But, exhilarating as it is to find a good humorist among modern composers, it is still more gratifying to note that the scoring here is most skilful and that the treatment of the themes is indicative of a high musicianship. "The Lake", the one earnest movement of this Suite, shows a delicacy of treatment that suggests Debussy at his best—not the Debussy of "La Mer." We do not think, however, that "Dogs," the succeeding movement, is graphic or especially remarkable. Mr. Carpenter might have remembered how Gluck pictured the dog Cerberus, in "Orpheus," by glissando effects (sliding) upon a contrabass string. It is much more graphic than Mr. Carpenter's canines.

But we are so charmed with the suite that we feel that picking any flaw is almost hyper-criticism. Nevertheless we revel most in the humor of the movement falsely entitled "Hurdy-Gurdy." Dr. Muck joined the first two movements together, which, we think, only mystified the audience. The interpretation was not superior to that of the New York Symphony orchestra, given in Boston under Walter Damrosch, a few weeks ago. There are a few "Leit-motiven" in the composition, and the figures representing the Nurse, the Perambulator and its wheels, the baby, and the policeman, can readily be followed. The work has so recently been given in Boston that great length of comment seems superfluous save to state again, emphatically, that the American composers who take themselves with such deadly seriousness might learn a lesson from this work, and Chadwick's "Tam O'Shanter," which latter ought also to be heard in Boston soon.

The work was greatly applauded, the orchestra finally rising in response.

St. Saens' Violoncello Concerto was also music without any aggressive or radical tendencies, and it served to display our excellent new violoncellist, Mr. Joseph Malkin. We have but recently spoken of the work of this artist in these columns and there is little more to tell save to renew the encomiums then written. Mr. Malkin has a broad and sympathetic tone. He makes technique his servant instead of being its slave. He is pure in intonation, even in the highest positions, and is absolutely sure in skips, runs or double-stopping.

There is a little too much of embroidery in this concerto, but for all that it displays the solo instrument well, and it has some very effective themes. Mr. Malkin was greatly applauded, and the orchestra and conductor deserved to share in this, for the ensemble was excellent.

Then the usual Christmas exodus began. We were very sorry for this, since the best work of the concert followed.

The Organ Concerto came last and ended this most enjoyable programme. Of course the name of Rheinberger was sufficient guarantee that there would be no modern tricks played with the musical Art in this work. There are but few concertos for organ and orchestra in existence, and very few composers can blend the two forces into a really effective form. Guilmant has done it, but he leans a little towards the confectionery side of music, and sometimes his movements become a trifle cloying in consequence. But this work of Rheinberger's is virile from first to last. There is plenty of contrast, too, and, of course, melody is not discarded.

It has become the custom, "in these most brisk and giddy-paced times," to size up Rheinberger's compositions as "Kapellmeister-musik," music of the pedantic brain altogether, but we could name more than one of his works in which romance is present.

To us this concerto was a keen delight. It did one good to breathe the clear, classical air once more. Good logical development of figures was there, especially in the finale, and the Andante had a dignity which was in fine contrast with the sprightliness of the finale. The playing of the horns in the second movement was especially good, but the forces were in perfect ensemble almost all through.

Mr. Marshall played with artistic effect and the registration was chosen with tast and intelligence. The organ sounds especially well in Symphony Hall, and we were glad to hear the instrument in a prominent role for once. The pure contrapuntal touches were very effective, and Mr. Marshall did splendid manual and pedal work in the final Cadenza. Altogether this concerto was the most effective work of the concert, and we hope that few auditors will miss its glories in the concert tonight.

76

DECEMBER 25.

BOSTON JOURNAL

SYMPHONY PLAYS HOLIDAY PROGRAM

Baby Carriage Suite by Chicago Composer Is Warmly Applauded.

There was a holiday atmosphere at the Symphony concert yesterday, due to the unusual presence of two soloists and to the first performance under Dr. Muck's direction of the enthusiastically heralded symphonic suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," by John Alden Carpenter, which was first played here last month by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The program for the Christmas concerts embraces Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, the baby-carriage suite, the Saint-Saens 'cello concerto in A minor, with Joseph Malkin as soloist, and the Rheinberger concerto for organ, horns and strings, with John P. Marshall presiding at the seldom heard organ. It is a typical holiday list of … with the Carpenter tone pic… ing as so many plums in th…

Among the new works pr… Dr. Much in recent years none quite so pleasing, to all class… lovers, as the suite depicting nursling's adventures in sor… reservation stocked with co… lier policemen, yelping dogs … hurdy-gurdies. The suite h… aginative distinction charac… much of the new French m… warmth of feeling and sens… that give it a place of its ow… should be proud of this am… poser.

Too many novelties are … more than caviare even to … phony public these days, but this "pram" music was enthusiastically applauded yesterday. Mr. De Voto, the pianist shared deservedly in the ovation the orchestra received.

The same program will … played again tonight.

Next week the new number on the program will be Ernest Schellings' "Symphonic Variations," for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself as soloist. Dr. Muck will conduct the third Brahms symphony for the first time in Boston. The final number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 25,

BABY MUSIC BETTER THAN ITS PROGRAM

Carpenter's Perambulator Suite Repeated.

Messrs Marshall and Malkin Heard in Solo Performances.

Who is the author of the program of Mr Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," which stands as a preface to the score? No name appears. Some sage in infantile psychology is hiding his light. Such induction as to the first human percepts amounts to uncanny perception, to downright divination, to the chronic symptoms of genius.

Walter Damrosch and his New York Symphony Orchestra first made the music known here several weeks ago. It was at once apparent to be charming, spontaneous, apt and imaginative in invention and denoting a high degree of skill in treatment, and this notwithstanding the "program," available in advance from the first performance in Chicago and said to be the composer's inspiration.

This is curious. His writing is permeated with the spirit of play, with the exquisite lightness of touch and graceful humor which envelops the peopled realms of the imagination. There is no literal suggestion of the foolish attempts at naivete, the silly twaddle of these amusing episodes of dogs and policemen, whose relation to the score is no more apparent than [illegible]

Modern French characteristics have been found in the style. It is true the whole tone scale is frequently heard. At the previous performance there were suggstions of pages other than those of Mr Carpenter. It is clear that beside listening to the hurdy gurdy play snatches of popular masterpieces, his infant of the perambulator must have been wheeled into a performance of "The Girl of the Golden West."

The opera was produced in Chicago, which is Mr Carpenter's home, the year all progressive cities joined in swelling the tribute to the house of Ricordi. Fragments of the opera are in the air in the first two sections: Setting Out and The Policeman. In the fourth division, "The Lake," which begins much in the mood and idiom of the "night scene" in "Louise," there is a figure reminiscent of the music of the barroom scene for Rance and Minnie. Nor is that all of Mr Carpenter's allegiance to Puccini. There are allusions to "La Boheme," a passage similar to that of and three muted trumpets in fifths, and measures reminding of the early part of the third act.

Burlesque is widely avoided in translating the various observations of the journey. Although it must be admitted the child was old beyond his years, he might have misconstrued the policeman's motives had he discovered him in a surreptitious flirtation with his nurse. To depict a policeman conniving with a nurse girl through orchestral speech would have been difficult, not to say indecent. The policeman in this case speaks through the bassoon. This is incongruous, for the bassoon is not of Celtic origin.

But to resume. The musical observations are not painfully literal. There is no suggestion of labeled pictures in a primer. The hurdy gurdy is treated with exquisite wit, with an admirable sense of realism blended with the ideal. This is the apotheosis, the magnificat, the sublimation of the hurdy gurdy. Such an instrument would not be barred from the residential streets of our best people. "The Lake" has a quietly rhapsodic character. So with Dreams music, which charms irrespective of printed directions. Dr Muck interpreted the suite with sense of this charm. Some might make it more delineative, more unsophisticated, more frank, but he played it as a score of much poetic beauty.

Rheinberger's concerto for organ, with John Marshall as soloist, with strings and three horns is music of academic clearness and order. The organ is used with a distinctive sense of its powers. There is fugal treatment of ideas of less dignity than their development. Mr Marshall's performance was marked by fluent technic, by a nice sense of registration and of dynamic proportion. The cadenza was tastefully played.

Mr Malkin was soloist in Saint-Saens' first concerto in A-minor for cello and orchestra. A creditable appearance, although one not distinguished either in technic or in beauty of style. In the opening overture to "The Magic Flute," Dr Muck exhausts the possibilities of the broad tempo of the Adagio, and the irregularly accented notes in the brilliant fugue.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date..........
Established:

SCHELLING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

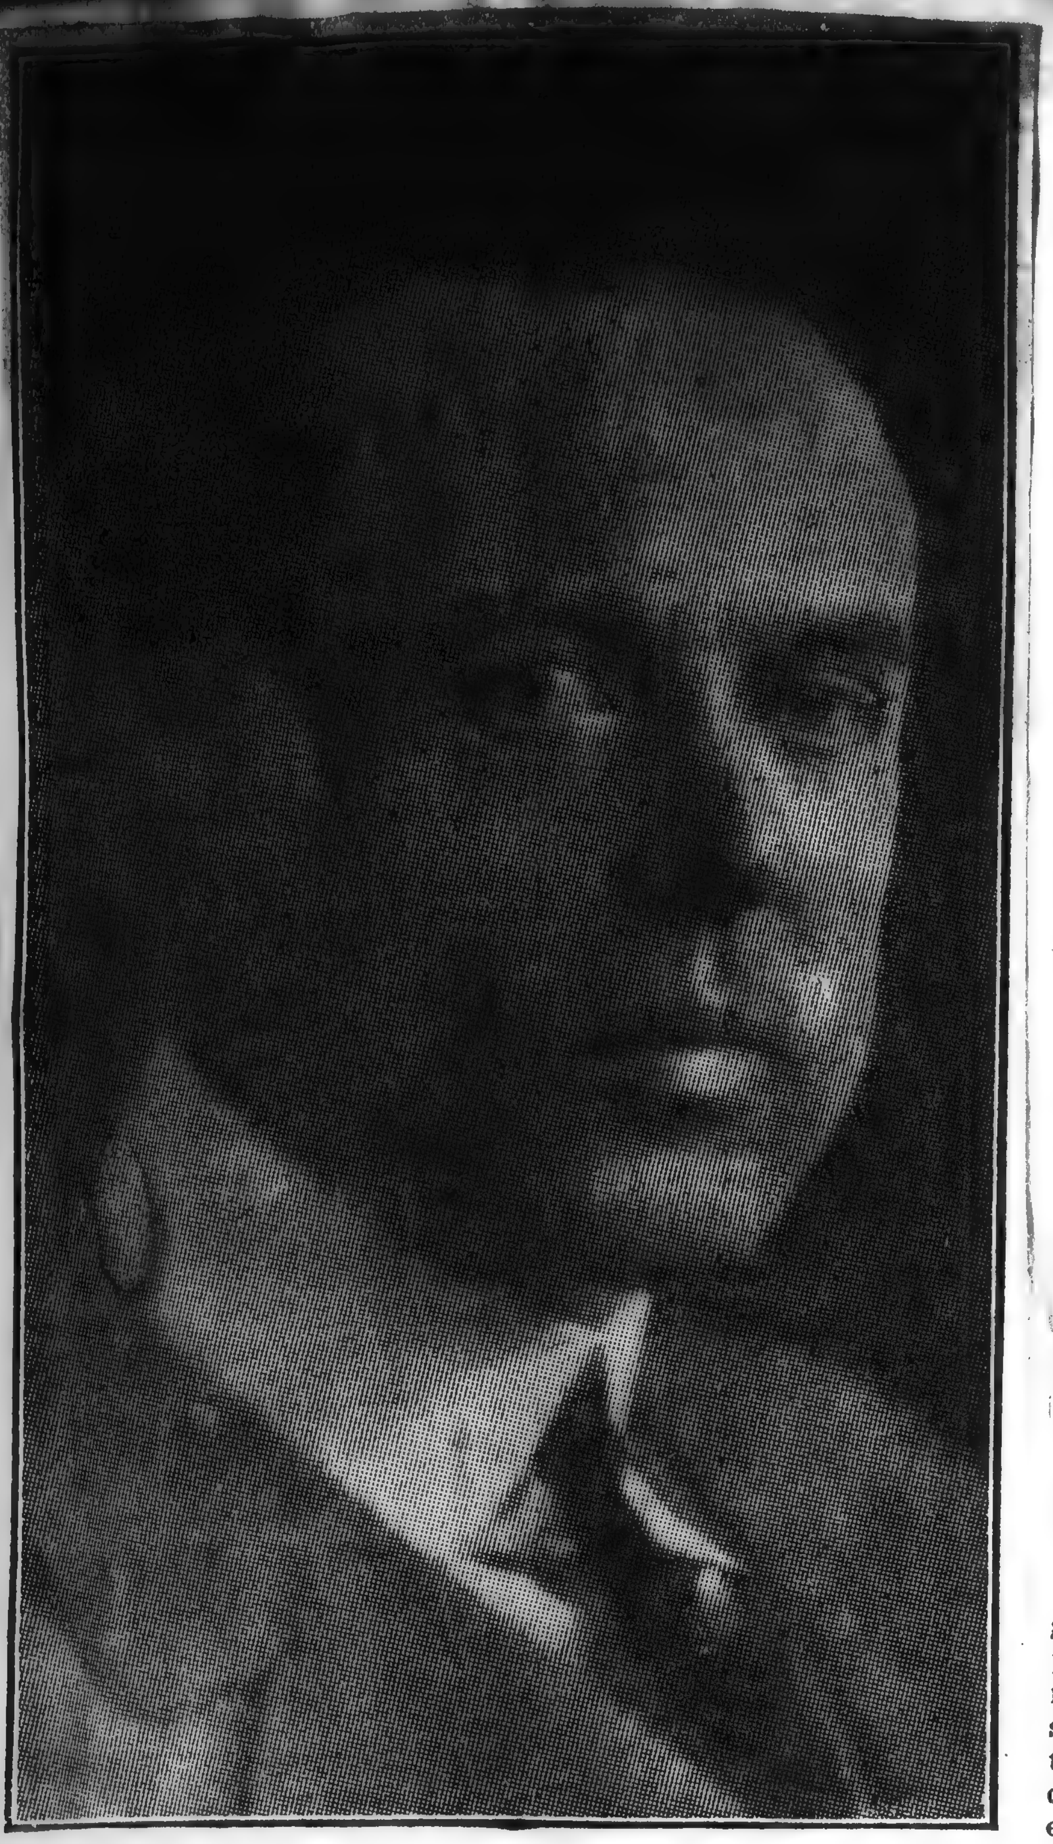
DR. KARL MUCK has made an interesting program for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening at 8.15. With the exception of the charming little symphony of Haydn in E flat, No. 1, the program is decidedly modern, including what many regard as the greatest tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," Ernest Schelling's new symphonic variations for orchestra and piano and the diabolically clever Scherzo of the Frenchman Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

ERNEST SCHETLING

Novelties always arouse great interest among music lovers and Mr. Schelling's new symphonic variations are a novelty in the full sense of the word, for they have just had their first performances in Boston. Mr. Schelling has written with extraordinary skill and fancy. They are not a piano concerto in any sense of the word, for he makes the piano an integral part of the orchestra, and having written the variations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in view, he has given incidental solos to all the leaders of the various sections. Mr. Schelling will play the piano part.

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E flat major..........Hayd
Tone Poem, Death and Transfiguration..........Strau
Symphonic Variations..........Schelli
The Sorcerer's Apprentice..........Duk



John Alden Carpenter

Music of Substance

But—it is a significant fact not due to performance, but to the compositions themselves—that if we deduct the greatness of Mozart's music, the honest music without heaven-storming originality, and yet what substance it has! Music that showed to remarkable advantage by the side of either Carpenter's or Saint-Saens'! The sturdy thematic material, the firmness of the tonal structure, the broad, clear writing, the effective organ part and the excellent scoring for the strings and horns make for an exceedingly brave sounding composition. All this makes splendid music, music of the Yule-tide, music we would fain hear at more frequent intervals than in the past, music, incidentally, which bears witness to the extraordinary strength and vitality of good polyphonic composition of the German school. Mr. Marshall played in a brilliant and musicianly manner.

Dr. Muck, as usual, wielded a masterly baton in the performance of the concertos as well as the earlier music of the programme.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 25

TWO SOLOISTS HEARD IN AMERICAN WORK

JOHN CARPENTER RECORDS TRIUMPH

"Adventures in a Perambulator" Pleases—"Magic Flute Overture" Brilliantly Played

By Louis C. Elson

PROGRAMME

Mozart "Magic Flute Overture"
Carpenter "Adventures in a Perambulator" Orchestral Suite
St. Saens Violoncello Concerto A minor
Soloist, Mr. Joseph Malkin
Rheinberger
Concerto for Organ, Horns and Strings
Soloist, Mr. John P. Marshall

A most agreeable programme, just suited to usher in Christmas Eve, and every note of it within the bounds of intelligibility. The very first number plunged into "medias res" with its chattering, light-hearted fugal exposition, the theme of which we suspect Mozart took from Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," Book II., No. 7. If any musical reader will compare the two he will at once recognize the kinship; the key, the length and the modulations being identical. But Mozart makes an altogether different affair out of it, Bach treating his subject in a sedate manner in canon, while Mozart makes it full of jollity.

Yet we never can reconcile ourselves to the rapidity with which all modern conductors take the Mozart fugue theme. No auditor can follow its figures in the helter-skelter pace at which it is played. But no amount of speed can cause our strings to blur, and the whole overture was most brilliantly and very rapidly played. It may be recalled, in this connection, that Mozart did not care greatly for the flute, and even in "The Magic Flute" did not give that instrument much prominence. He once wrote a flute and harp concerto, however (milk-and-water), but that was inspired by his empty pocketbook—and he did not get paid for it after all. The overture was much applauded and deserved to be. The introduction to the Mozart overture seemed, to us, exaggerated in its contrasts.

It is a grateful task to record the triumph of an American composer. John Alden Carpenter, in the "Adventures in a Perambulator," has introduced a baby into the musical repertoire that is as successful as, and much more natural than, Richard Strauss's heavily-scored infant who lives in a family where they had double-fugues at 7 o'clock in the morning—probably for breakfast.

It was programme-music, and the meditations of the baby, which are printed in connection with the score, were properly reproduced in the programme-book, so that each auditor was enable to dilate with the proper emotion; it was gloriously good fun, and masterly music as well. What a pompous and slow-moving policeman the bassoon made! How perfectly the xylophone reproduced the aggressive tones of the street-organ (not a hurdy-gurdy, by the way), and with what charming vagueness the fragments of these things floated through baby's dream at the close!

But, exhilarating as it is to find a good humorist among modern composers, it is still more gratifying to note that the scoring here is most skilful and that the treatment of the themes is indicative of a high musicianship. "The Lake", the one earnest movement of this Suite, shows a delicacy of treatment that suggests Debussy at his best—not the Debussy of "La Mer." We do not think, however, that "Dogs," the succeeding movement, is graphic or especially remarkable. Mr. Carpenter might have remembered how Gluck pictured the dog Cerberus, in "Orpheus," by glissando effects (sliding) upon a contrabass string. It is much more graphic than Mr. Carpenter's canines.

But we are so charmed with the suite that we feel that picking any flaw is almost hyper-criticism. Nevertheless we revel most in the humor of the movement falsely entitled "Hurdy-Gurdy." Dr. Muck joined the first two movements together, which, we think, only mystified the audience. The interpretation was not superior to that of the New York Symphony orchestra, given in Boston under Walter Damrosch, a few weeks ago. There are a few "Leit-motiven" in the composition, and the figures representing the Nurse, the Perambulator and its wheels, the baby, and the policeman, can readily be followed. The work has so recently been given in Boston that great length of comment seems superfluous save to state again, emphatically, that the American composers who take themselves with such deadly seriousness might learn a lesson from this work, and Chadwick's "Tam O'Shanter," which latter ought also to be heard in Boston soon.

The work was greatly applauded, the orchestra finally rising in response.

St. Saens' Violoncello Concerto was also music without any aggressive or radical tendencies, and it served to display our excellent new violoncellist, Mr. Joseph Malkin. We have but recently spoken of the work of this artist in these columns and there is little more to tell save to renew the encomiums then written. Mr. Malkin has a broad and sympathetic tone. He makes technique his servant instead of being its slave. He is pure in intonation, even in the highest positions, and is absolutely sure in skips, runs or double-stopping.

There is a little too much of embroidery in this concerto, but for all that it displays the solo instrument well, and it has some very effective themes. Mr. Malkin was greatly applauded, and the orchestra and conductor deserved to share in this, for the ensemble was excellent.

Then the usual Christmas exodus began. We were very sorry for this, since the best work of the concert followed.

The Organ Concerto came last and ended this most enjoyable programme. Of course the name of Rheinberger was sufficient guarantee that there would be no modern tricks played with the musical Art in this work. There are but few concertos for organ and orchestra in existence, and very few composers can blend the two forces into a really effective form. Guilmant has done it, but he leans a little towards the confectionery side of music, and sometimes his movements become a trifle cloying in consequence. But this work of Rheinberger's is virile from first to last. There is plenty of contrast, too, and, of course, melody is not discarded.

It has become the custom, "in these most brisk and giddy-paced times," to size up Rheinberger's compositions as "Kapellmeister-musik," music of the pedantic brain altogether, but we could name more than one of his works in which romance is present. To us this concerto was a keen delight. It did one good to breathe the clear, classical air once more. Good logical development of figures was there, especially in the finale, and the Andante had a dignity which was in fine contrast with the sprightliness of the finale. The playing of the horns in the second movement was especially good, but the forces were in perfect ensemble almost all through.

Mr. Marshall played with artistic effect and the registration was chosen with tast and intelligence. The organ sounds especially well in Symphony Hall, and we were glad to hear the instrument in a prominent role for once. The pure contrapuntal touches were very effective, and Mr. Marshall did splendid manual and pedal work in the final Cadenza. Altogether this concerto was the most effective work of the concert, and we hope that few auditors will miss its glories in the concert tonight.

[76]

DECEMBER 25,

BOSTON JOURNAL

SYMPHONY PLAYS HOLIDAY PROGRAM

Baby Carriage Suite by Chicago Composer Is Warmly Applauded.

There was a holiday atmosphere at the Symphony concert yesterday, due to the unusual presence of two soloists and to the first performance under Dr. Muck's direction of the enthusiastically heralded symphonic suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," by John Alden Carpenter, which was first played here last month by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The program for the Christmas concerts embraces Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, the baby-carriage suite, the Saint-Saens 'cello concerto in A minor, with Joseph Malkin as soloist, and the Rheinberger concerto for organ, horns and strings, with John P. Marshall presiding at the seldom heard organ. It is a typical holiday list of offerings, with the Carpenter tone pictures serving as so many plums in the pudding.

Among the new works presented by Dr. Much in recent years none has proved quite so pleasing, to all classes of music lovers, as the suite depicting a Chicago nursling's adventures in some lakeside reservation stocked with comical cavalier policemen, yelping dogs and rattling hurdy-gurdies. The suite has the imaginative distinction characteristic of much of the new French music, but a warmth of feeling and sense of humor that give it a place of its own. Chicago should be proud of this amateur composer.

Too many novelties are something more than caviare even to the Symphony public these days, but this "pram" music was enthusiastically applauded yesterday. Mr. De Voto, the pianist, shared deservedly in the ovation the orchestra received.

The same program will played again tonight.

Next week the new number on the program will be Ernest Schellings' "Symphonic Variations," for piano and orchestra, with the composer himself as soloist. Dr. Muck will conduct the third Brahms symphony for the first time in Boston. The final number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Airs."

BOSTON GLOBE—

DECEMBER 25,

BABY MUSIC BETTER THAN ITS PROGRAM

Carpenter's Perambulator Suite Repeated.

Messrs Marshall and Malkin Heard in Solo Performances.

Who is the author of the program of Mr Carpenter's suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," which stands as a preface to the score? No name appears, Some sage in infantile psychology is hiding his light. Such induction as to the first human percepts amounts to uncanny perception, to downright divination, to the chronic symptoms of genius.

Walter Damrosch and his New York Symphony Orchestra first made the music known here several weeks ago. It was at once apparent to be charming, spontaneous, apt and imaginative in invention and denoting a high degree of skill in treatment, and this notwithstanding the "program," available in advance from the first performance in Chicago and said to be the composer's inspiration.

This is curious. His writing is permeated with the spirit of play, with the exquisite lightness of touch and graceful humor which envelops the peopled realms of the imagination. There is no literal suggestion of the foolish attempts at naivete, the silly twaddle of these amusing episodes of dogs and policemen whose relation to the score is no more apparent than [illegible]

Modern French [illegible] been found in the style. It is true the whole tone scale is frequently heard. At the previous performance there were suggestions of pages other than those of Mr Carpenter. It is clear that beside listening to the hurdy gurdy play snatches of popular masterpieces, his infant of the perambulator must have been wheeled into a performance of "The Girl of the Golden West."

The opera was produced in Chicago, which is Mr Carpenter's home, the year all progressive cities joined in swelling the tribute to the house of Ricordi. Fragments of the opera are in the air in the first two sections: Setting Out and The Policeman. In the fourth division, "The Lake," which begins much in the mood and idiom of the "night scene" in "Louise," there is a figure reminiscent of the music of the barroom scene for Rance and Minnie. Nor is that all of Mr Carpenter's allegiance to Puccini. There are allusions to "La Boheme," a passage similar to that of and three muted trumpets in fifths, and measures reminding of the early part of the third act.

Burlesque is widely avoided in translating the various observations of the journey. Although it must be admitted the child was old beyond his years, he might have misconstrued the policeman's motives had he discovered him in a surreptitious flirtation with his nurse. To depict a policeman conniving with a nurse girl through orchestral speech would have been difficult, not to say indecent. The policeman in this case speaks through the bassoon. This is incongruous, for the bassoon is not of Celtic origin.

But to resume. The musical observations are not painfully literal. There is no suggestion of labeled pictures in a primer. The hurdy gurdy is treated with exquisite wit, with an admirable sense of realism blended with the ideal. This is the apotheosis, the magnificat, the sublimation of the hurdy gurdy. Such an instrument would not be barred from the residential streets of our best people. "The Lake" has a quietly rhapsodic character. So with Dreams music, which charms irrespective of printed directions. Dr Muck interpreted the suite with sense of this charm. Some might make it more delineative, more unsophisticated, more frank, but he played it as a score of much poetic beauty.

